CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS, THIRD SESSION.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 7, 1915.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. FITZGERALD as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the gift of life, its wonderful opportunities and far-reaching purposes, the earnest of that personal immortality which Thou hast woven into the warp and woof of our being, which through faith, hope, love, lifts us in our better moments up even to the throne of Thy divinity, and fills our hearts with longing, hopes, and aspirations; forces, though unseen, which are ever moving us on to the betterment of conditions in our homes, in society, in governments, in religion.

We are here on this sacred day to memorialize the life and character of two Members of this great body who, though dead, still live in our hearts and in the works they wrought as servants of the people. Make us strong to emulate, wise to pursue, earnest, faithful, that we may achieve and leave the impress of our personality behind us and be worthy of the gifts Thou hast bestowed upon us. May we look forward with those to whom the departed were near and dear in the unbroken continuity of life which shall bring us to them in the realms of larger light, life, and purity; through Him who taught us the way, and the truth, and the life. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVES PAYNE AND MERRITT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order of the day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. CALDER, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That Sunday, February 7, 1915, be set apart for services upon the lives, characters, and public services of Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE and Hon. EDWIN A. MERRITT, late Representatives from the State of New York.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

House resolution 725.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that an opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of the Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York, and to the memory of the Hon. EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of their eminent abilities as distinguished public servants, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the families of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Speaker, SERENO ELISHA PAYNE, our fellow Member, and a distinguished statesman, was, on December 10, 1914, to our great loss and bereavement, suddenly called from his sphere of usefulness in the House of Representatives of the United States, where for more than a third of a century he had served his State and his country with great distinction and honor.

He was born at Hamilton, N. Y., June 2, 1843, was graduated from the University of Rochester in 1864, was admitted to the bar in 1866, was city clerk of Auburn, N. Y., 1868–1871, was supervisor of Auburn, 1871–72, was district attorney of Cayuga County, 1873–1879, was president of the board of education at Auburn 1879–1882, and was elected a Member of the House of Representatives to the Forty-eighth Congress, where he served continuously with the exception of the Fiftieth Congress to the time of his death. He had been recently elected to the Sixty-fourth Congress.

He was appointed a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House December 10, 1889, in the Fifty-first Congress and served as chairman of that great committee from January 20, 1899, to 1913. By a strange coincidence he was a member of the committee for exactly a quarter of a century. During his service in Congress he assisted in the preparation of five great tariff measures. He was an ardent believer in the Republican doctrine of protection. By many his views on the tariff question were not correctly understood. He was not, as was popularly supposed, a high or extreme protectionist. He believed that the organization of great industries in this country which lessened competition between manufacturers made it necessary to readjust our tariff rates. On the fundamental principles of protection he never wavered, but was ready at all times to readjust the tariff rates to meet changing conditions. As chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House he prepared the last Republican tariff measure, which bears his name. In all of its schedules it did not express his individual views, but the provisions in it for a maximum and minimum tariff were framed by him and marked that measure as a great advance in the tariff legislation of the country. To the preparation of that measure he devoted untiring energy, skill, and labor. He was an acknowledged authority on all questions relating to the tariff and fiscal policies of the United States.

He was active in the councils of his party, twice served as chairman of the Republican State convention of New York, and was a delegate to the Republican national conventions of 1892, 1896, 1900, 1908, and 1912.

In recognition of his ability as a statesman he was appointed a member of the American-British Joint High Commission in January, 1899.

Thus for nearly half a century SERENO E. PAYNE was identified with the public life of his State and country. His career was marked by integrity of character, firmness of purpose, and adherence to principle. He commanded the respect of members of all political parties and the affection of a large circle of friends by a blameless, useful, and honorable life.

It was my privilege 10 years ago to be elected to Congress from a district in the State of New York, and on entering upon my duties here I felt it was incumbent upon me to pay my respects to Mr. PAYNE, who was the dean of the delegation. In all of these years I found him not only a party associate, but a warm personal friend, willing at any time to help guide the younger men in their efforts to secure consideration for legislation in which they were interested. In all these years I came to know him intimately.

His good wife, with whom he had lived for over 40 years, was called to the better world two years ago, and her death seemed to leave a void in his life. While he continued his activities in the House those who knew him well observed in him a marked change.

When I entered the House of Representatives in the Fifty-ninth Congress Mr. PAYNE had as his associates from the State of New York in the House such distinguished men as the late Vice President Sherman, Alexander, Wadsworth, Littauer, Dwight, Fassett, Driscoll, Parsons, Bennet, Olcott, Vreeland, GOULDEN, Cockran, FITZGERALD, Cocks, Andrus, Ketcham, Bradley, Draper and Law—all men of high character and large influence in the determining of the important legislation of that day. All but Representative FITZGERALD and myself have left the service here and some have passed to the great beyond. Of the Republicans from New York State who served in that Congress I am the only one left, and so I am accorded the privilege to speak of Mr. PAYNE'S leadership of these great men. I was honored by the Speaker when selected as one of the committee to accompany Mr. PAYNE'S remains to his old home in Auburn, a beautiful city in the great agricultural section of central New York. Mr. PAYNE was known there to every man, woman, and child. He was truthfully the first citizen of the city. It was a bleak December day; the streets were covered with snow, and over the whole city there hung the dull gray veil of sorrow, which only the death of a man well beloved and widely known will make itself felt.

The church of which he was a member and officer was thronged with his saddened friends, and the splendid eulogies of the two distinguished clergymen who officiated at his funeral service portrayed faithfully the life work and the noble character of the deceased.

I recall distinctly the rendering by the Rev. Dr. Cyril of Tennyson's beautiful poem, Crossing the Bar:

Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no moaning of the bar,
When I put out to sea,

But such a tide as moving seems asleep,
Too full for sound or foam,
When that which drew from out the boundless deep
Turns again home.

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark!
And may there be no sadness of farewell,
When I embark;

For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crost the bar.

Though the flood did bear him far upon the boundless deep of life and strife, his devotion to the Christian Church and his years of service to his fellow men and to his country will bear him safely over the bar to face the great Pilot who so gently bade him sleep at the close of his working day.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to read the following letters from two of Mr. PAYNE'S former associates in the House of Representatives.

From former Representative McCall, of Massachusetts:

I served with Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE for 20 years in the House of Representatives. For 14 years of that time I was with him upon the Ways and Means Committee. I understand that he had a longer period of service upon that committee and was also for a longer time its chairman than any other man in our history. In my opinion Mr. PAYNE has never been surpassed by any of his countrymen in his broad and at the same time exact knowledge of all matters relating to tariff taxation. His mind was a great storehouse of facts, which upon occasion he would state in lucid order and in a way that would give the strongest possible support to the principles of taxation in which he believed. He was resolutely high minded and firm and never easily swerved. One could not know him well without deeply respecting his ruggedness of character and his ability and accomplishments. He was one of the notable figures in the history of the House and was identified in a responsible way with much of the most important legislation of more than a quarter of a century.

Sincerely, yours,

S. W. MCCALL.

From former Representative Bennet of New York:

How rapidly after all the personnel of Congress changes. When Mr. PAYNE passed away the other day the last representative of the old red-carnation group, which was so powerful when you and I came to Congress 10 years ago, disappeared from this Congress. Mr. PAYNE was an American good to have known; a product of a time when partizanship was more intense throughout the country; an active leader in the struggle for the supremacy of our party for nearly a quarter of a century; a believer in our party principles; another one in that long and honorable list of American statesmen who had power over millions of money; lived modestly always and left no great estate. One of the triumphs of our institution is the number of our politically powerful men in public office who have so lived and died.

If it could be planned in advance, one could wish for no more useful career than Mr. PAYNE'S was; a man of ability, successful professionally, with a comfortable environment, a staunch believer in the principles of his particular party and in their advocacy as a patriotic duty, he was able to devote the bulk of his mature years and his great ability to a sturdy fight for that party and those principles.

In both 1912 and 1914 I had the pleasure of campaigning in Mr. PAYNE'S District and was impressed by the affection and respect which the people whom he had served so long had for their Congressman.

I am personally glad that at the close of this busy American life there was no twilight zone of sickness, or material decay of the faculties, and that he was occupied to the last in the business of the House, in which for so many years he had been one of its most useful members.

Yours, very truly,

WILLIAM S. BENNET.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying to the effect that it is folly to reserve kind words about a man until after he is dead, and that they should be uttered while he still lives. I have always acted on that dictum. In some preliminary remarks in my five hours' speech on the Payne tariff bill, March 24, 1909, I made the following remarks:

"I desire to congratulate the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE]. I do it from the bottom of my heart. He has now become a great historical personage. The history of the United States can not be written now and leave out the name of SERENO E. PAYNE, of New York. He takes his place in the company of Henry Clay, Robert J. Walker, Justin S. Morrill, William McKinley, William L. Wilson, and Nelson Dingley as father of a great tariff bill, which must be referred to as long as men discuss the tariff in the United States, which, judging the future by the past, will be until Gabriel blows his trumpet.

"There is another thing on which I congratulate the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and I do it as honestly as I did the other, that during the course of these hearings, and by his nine and one-half hours' speech, he has knocked higher than a kite the idiotic theory of Dr. Osler.

"Be it understood that I am not complaining in any degree whatever because he spoke nine and a half hours; it was a superb vindication of his physical and mental strength, and under the circumstances of the case and the character of the speech he was making, explanatory and defensive, answering a good many questions from this side, and carrying on an extended debate with his political confreres on that side, I do not see how it could have been shorter; and what is more, I am not dead sure but that it was the wisest thing he could have done from a political standpoint, because a good many Republican gentlemen, having fired their shots, will not want to make speeches on the bill.

"While I am making these preliminary statements—and I do not think I am wasting time in making them—I want to say a word about the Committee on Ways and Means. I say now that no 18 men—because there were only 18, Mr. Granger being sick with the disease which finally proved fatal to him—no 18 men, Democrats and Republicans both, in the history of this country ever did harder, more tedious, or more fatiguing work than the 18 members of the Ways and Means Committee did in these hearings.

"Think of it! We began at half-past 9 in the morning and worked until 1 o'clock, took an hour for lunch, then worked until 7 o'clock, taking an hour for dinner, as we call it in the city and supper in the country, and worked until 11 and 12 o'clock at night; keyed up, on edge, tussling with intellectual men who had facts in their possession about the tariff which they were determined not to give up, while we were determined that they should stand and deliver.

"The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is nearly old enough to be my father. I have always been credited with having an iron constitution, but I believe that he came out of the exhausting work fresher than I did, which was an absolute marvel to me.

"One other thing about that committee. In my time I have done many things to earn a living, among them every species of farm work, clerking in a country store, teaching in all sorts of schools, from a log-cabin schoolhouse in Kentucky to the presidency of a college in West Virginia, editing a newspaper, and practicing law. For three days I was a sort of a special deputy sheriff in Cincinnati, guarding a defaulter. I have tried a multitude of cases in court, including betwixt 1,000 and 2,000 criminal cases, ranging from murder and highway robbery to assault and battery and petty larceny; but nowhere, at no time, under no circumstances have I ever performed any other labor so exhaustive of nervous energy as I performed at these tariff hearings. I am not complaining. We simply did our duty; but I have no doubt that it shortened all our lives. We not only worked like galley slaves while other people were taking their ease, but we tried to ascertain the truth."

These were my honest sentiments in March, 1909. They are my sentiments in February, 1915. They will remain my sentiments so long as I live. I can not improve on them now.

There is little to add, except one incident demonstrating how we sometimes misjudge each other. Everybody knew that Mr. PAYNE was a man of ability and a strong debater. Those of us who had opportunity to study him closely knew that he possessed a vast store of information, particularly on the tariff. No wonder, for he was a student and partcipated in five revisions of the tariff. In debate he was irritable and brusque to such an extent that he frequently hurt the feelings of Members who interrupted him in his speeches. I did not like the way in which he sawed me off on several occasions and for a long time had it in my heart to catch him in the right situation and assail him hip and thigh.

Finally, however, I was placed on the Committee on Ways and Means, of which he was chairman. During the Christmas holidays succeeding I was in New England and New York on a lecture tour. When I entered a parlor car in New York, en route to Washington, I had Mr. PAYNE as a fellow passenger. He came and sat down by me and gave me a cordial welcome to his committee. He talked to me all the way here, and as I had never talked with him 10 minutes privately before that trip, I was amazed to discover that he was a most pleasant gentleman, an unusually fine raconteur, and that his stock of personal and interesting reminiscences seemed inexhaustible. He spoke most entertainingly of Thurlow Weed, William H. Seward, Horace Greely, Horatio Seymour, Gov. Morgan, Roscoe Conkling, Samuel Sullivan Cox, Henry J. Raymond, and other New York worthies of a past generation. Those five hours were not only delightful, but also instructive to me and added much to the sum total of my historical knowledge. That trip laid the foundation of a close personal friendship between Mr. PAYNE and myself, which grew stronger and more tender with the passing years till the day of his death. He was the most distinguished Member of the House to die in harness, as no doubt he wished to die, after the death of Gov. Dingley, his immediate predecessor as chairman of the great Committee on Ways and Means. The House decreed him a public funeral, as was eminently proper, and we mournfully parted company with the honored and well-beloved father of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the generous tribute which has just been paid to Mr. PAYNE by the distinguished and beloved Speaker of this House is characteristic of the gentleman from Missouri, the Speaker, and also, I am pleased to think, is characteristic of American politics.

The Republicans of this House and elsewhere also deeply appreciate the courtesy and respect which was paid to the memory of Mr. PAYNE by the Democratic majority in this House in according to him a public funeral and exercises held in this Chamber while the House itself was in session. I think that had not occurred before the funeral services of Mr. PAYNE's predecessor as Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. Dingley.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to dwell upon the public services of Mr. PAYNE. They are written in the legislative pages of this body, as well as in the five tariff bills which were enacted while he was a member of the Ways and Means Committee. Three of these tariff bills were Republican bills, in which he was one of the men who framed the bill. Two of them were Democratic tariff bills, in which he actively participated in opposition.

I came into this House at the special session when the Dingley tariff bill was passed. Coming from a great city with many industries affected by the tariff legislation, it became my duty to frequently ask questions, privately, of the members of the Ways and Means Committee. I know, as everybody knows, that Mr. PAYNE when he was very busily engaged in work sometimes was rather brusque in manner, but it became my habit when I wanted to know anything about that bill to go to Mr. PAYNE. He was always courteous to me, was always able to give the information asked for, and I became rather deeply attached to him from a distance. I did not enjoy his close personal friendship. For years I used to watch Mr. PAYNE and Mr. Dalzell as they would leave the House and go to luncheon together. They were both high up on the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. PAYNE for a series of years chairman of the committee. The close friendship between the two was remarkable. Both were very active in the House and both very attentive to their duties in the House. They frequently went to luncheon together, sometimes taking somebody else with them. These, of course, are purely side lights upon his character.

When I became the Republican leader in the House in the last Congress, knowing as I did that much of the feeling toward the Payne bill and also toward Mr. PAYNE throughout the country was unjustified, in so far as his personal desires were concerned, I gave especial attention to the consulting of Mr. PAYNE, and very early learned that no one could have a better adviser as to the use of common sense than Mr. PAYNE. During the last two summers the House remained in session during the entire summer. It became the habit of Mr. PAYNE and myself and some others, whenever the opportunity afforded, to take a little fresh air on the outside and forget the cares of state by going to the ball game. Mr. PAYNE, strange to say, with all of his enthusiasm for work, with his great knowledge and study relating to legislative matters, with his solemn tones in debate, was a lover of decent outdoor sports and was very fond of baseball. As we sat together in the front row of seats in this Chamber during the consideration of the Underwood tariff bill, every day while there was a ball game in progress in the city of Washington, and usually anywhere else, in the midst of strong and sometimes somewhat bitter partisan debate on items in the tariff bill, the telephone clerk on the Republican side of the House would quietly drop down a number of times during the debate and inform Mr. PAYNE how the score stood. Mr. Speaker, that is what makes men men. That is characteristic of great men. He enjoyed the fight while the people on the outside were enjoying life. He liked to have other people happy, and when he was with them personally, in personal conversation, there was no man more delightful, more good tempered, more entertaining than was Mr. PAYNE. His name will live in the history of legislation, but to those who knew him best he will live in their memory as a sweet-tempered, wholesome, and enjoyable character.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to serve with our late associate, SERENO ELISHA PAYNE, who was unexpectedly called to his reward in December last. Coming from the same State and for many years a trustee of the Soldiers and Sailors Home, at Bath, N. Y., near his home, and meeting many of his friends and constituents there, I learned much regarding his home life. As a friend and neighbor, he was ever true and helpful; as a citizen, ever loyal and patriotic.

He faithfully served his district in Congress for 30 years, ever mindful, not alone of his devoted people whom he loved, but of the interests of those of the State and Nation. His services to the good people of Auburn and of Cayuga County as district attorney, city clerk, and president of the board of education, with that of a Member of Congress, in all of which he showed a high purpose, a civic pride, and a faithful devotion to duty, endeared him to his home people. That is the best test of work well done and of high moral worth; of his splendid services here, the country is familiar. No man stood higher in the esteem of his associates than did SERENO E. PAYNE. For 10 years of my service here he was the able, vigilant, courteous majority leader. While he dealt our side hard blows frequently, he was always a gentleman, always kindly hearted and willing to respect the rights and opinions of others.

Of him it will be said, "None knew him but to love him." The day of his untimely death I sat by his side talking about old friends that had passed away. He seemed in his usual good health, cheerful and smiling.

In praising him for the work accomplished in this House, and congratulating the country upon his achievements, we are forced to lament his taking off at a time when he could be of so much more value. We can mourn for him with the same feelings that we mourn the loss of Lincoln before he had given to his country all of which he was capable.

We applaud the man and his work to-day while sadly lamenting his loss to us. We are met to pay a last tribute of honor and respect to a beloved fellow worker whose character we admired and whose rugged honesty was inspiring.

His death has left a void that can not be filled, and his deeds, his kindness, and loving, cheerful disposition will ever live in the minds of his friends and associates. Well may we exclaim:

"Shall I say that what Heaven gave Earth has taken?
Or that sleepers in the grave
Reawaken?
One sole sentence can I know,
Can I say:
You, my comrade, had to go,
I to stay."

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, we have met to-day to pay a willing tribute to a great leader, a worthy son of the great Empire State, and a wise, just, and patriotic American, the Honorable SERENO E. PAYNE, who died at his post of duty after 30 years of faithful and efficient service in this House. That his record was above criticism and reproach is attested by his unfailing success in 16 elections in a district made up of a sturdy, conservative, and highly intellectual constituency.

His life was full of useful activities and for more than a quarter of a century he had a prominent part in writing many of our wisest and best laws; his good deeds as a citizen and public servant were countless. No man in this House, composed of a membership of 435, and coming from every State and Territory, and our islands in the distant seas, has a record which excels that of our departed friend and colleague. He was a prominent figure in the Republican national conventions which nominated three of our greatest Presidents, McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft, and an active and influential leader in framing and passing the many useful, progressive, and patriotic laws during their administrations. As a Member of this House he played a conspicuous part in the preparation and enactment of the three great tariff laws which bore the names of McKinley, Dingley, and Payne. If you will impartially study the history of our country during the life of these great measures, you will proclaim the most marvelous commercial growth and development of our country—not one section of it, but North, South, East, and West, every State, Territory, city, village, farm, and home. Prosperity and happiness was in evidence on every hand and in every nook and corner of the Republic. The wonderful strides in every line of industry, of every human endeavor, the matchless progress of this great Republic in foreign and domestic trade, in population, wealth, greatness, and glory; in all things that go to make us a great and envied people, fell to our happy lot during the period covered by the administrations of Presidents McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft, and under the operation of tariff legislation in which Mr. PAYNE had an important part in creating. The men he aided in nominating and electing to the Presidency, and the laws he materially assisted in making, gave to the American Republic its happy, golden epoch, and showered upon its people countless blessings. More opportunities, more contentment, more progress, more prosperity, and more happiness crowded into this period of our country's history than can be named to the credit of any tariff legislation in the entire history of our country.

What a debt we owe as a people; what a debt due from our Nation to the grand old man whose memory we honor on this occasion. No words, no tongue, can truly tell the lasting obligation we owe to our late colleague. He led a life filled with usefulness, not alone to his faithful and devoted constituents, but to the country at large.

Mr. Speaker, the great Empire State has furnished a long line of able, useful, and distinguished men to the American Republic, in peace and in war, and the impartial historian in giving their names and recounting their great, useful, and patriotic deeds will place high on the list the name and fame of SERENO E. PAYNE. He was faithfulness itself in his attendance as a Member of this House; in his committee and departmental work; in caring for his correspondence, for the interests of his immediate constituents; nothing of an official nature, great or small, escaped his attention. There was never a more worthy, zealous, industrious, hard-working member. He left a faithful and illustrious record which should influence and inspire all of us. It would be to our credit and the benefit of those we represent if we would, in the discharge of our duties, follow the splendid example he left behind.

I saw much of Mr. PAYNE during the past six years in this House, and for a portion of the time we lived under the same roof. We almost daily, during the past two years, occupied adjoining seats in the front row on the Republican side of the Chamber. My admiration, interest, and fondness for him was ever increasing, and his sudden death was a painful shock and great loss to me. He was a kind, genial, whole-souled, companionable man, and though a leading statesman and great leader he was plain and unassuming.

As an admiring friend, as a representative from a Southern district which for 60 consecutive years has sent a protectionist to this body, I offer my simple but sincere tribute of respect, admiration, and esteem for our able, worthy colleague, for New York's honored son, for the Nation's invincible champion, and defender of the American protective system, who I rejoice to know lived to see his great life work—the Payne tariff law—approved and vindicated in the hearts and thoughts of the American people.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the night of December 10, 1914, SERENO E. PAYNE was found dead in his room with the open Bible beside him. "The gentleman's time had expired."

The personality, which for 71 years had borne and honored the name of SENERO E. PAYNE, had gone into the region where we dimly suppose character is the only means of identification.

Tariff questions, of which he was one of the most profound and practical students of his time, no longer concerned him. "Life's candle had burned out."

He had carried with him on his journey down to the very instant of transition the only guide vouchsafed humanity on earth.

All the honors which the years had brought to him and all the malice of political misrepresentation were as nothing to him as he sat there quietly in the austerity of death, with dead eyes looking into the mystery of eternity just revealed to him.

A little later his body lay in state in the Hall of the House of Representatives, with a jungle of flowers around it, where the temporary occupants of places of dignity had gathered to do him honor, but to PAYNE these things were as nothing.

Here he had gained his greatest triumphs, here he had undergone his discipline, here he had gained his reputation, and here his body lay in state for a little time on its journey to the grave.

He was a lawyer and had gained eminence in his profession.

He was a statesman and had been honored time and again by the party with which he was associated.

He first came to Congress in 1883 and served continuously, except during the Fiftieth Congress, until his death.

He was chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries from 1895 to 1899, and in that position rendered valuable service; but his chief work in Congress was in connection with the tariff.

He went upon the Ways and Means Committee in 1890, served there until his death, and was its chairman from 1899 until 1910, when the House became Democratic.

His was the longest chairmanship of the Ways and Means Committee in the history of the country, and his the longest membership of that committee.

He helped to frame the McKinley law of 1890.

As a minority member of the Ways and Means Committee he opposed the Wilson law of 1894.

He was senior member of the Ways and Means Committee when the Dingley law of 1897 was enacted.

He was chairman of the committee which framed the Payne-Aldrich law of 1909 and ranking minority member of the committee which reported the law of 1913.

He helped to frame the war-revenue act of 1898, and as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means helped to frame the Porto Rican tariff law of 1900, the Philippine tariff law of 1902, its revision in 1908, and the Cuban reciprocity law of 1903.

"At all times a man who will do faithfully needs to believe firmly." Mr. Payne had convictions.

His services ran through an era of change the magnitude of which was not perceived by those who were a part of it. He lived in an age in which the accumulated science of the past was constantly applied to improved means of production, manufacture, transportation, and exchange.

In the performance of his duties he helped to give shape to national policies in an era of geographical and trade expansion, in which men combined their capital to produce at central points commodities to supply increasing areas of trade created by increasing facilities of transportation and communication. This movement was not confined to America, but extended throughout the commercial world.

The era of his legislative services was a part of a world-wide adjustment to the rapidly increasing use of steam, supplemented by electricity, the rapidly increasing use of machinery, and the rapidly increasing adaptation of the corporate form of management to industrial enterprises.

In his public service he was a practical, working, constructive personality in a tariff world.

He helped to put in legislative form the tariff policies of a party, based upon its conviction that it is better for us to keep our own capital and labor employed than it is to keep the capital and labor of foreign nations employed; that it is better for us to keep our money in use and circulation among ourselves than to send it abroad in exchange for commodities which we can make and produce as well as foreigners; that it is better to maintain the standard of American citizenship by protection of American labor and American industry than it is to lower the level of American citizenship by lowering the wages of American labor.

He had seen the country pass from the simple to the complex.

In the language of Goldwin Smith, he had "seen the collapse of many a political waterspout and the ebb of many a political tide."

There was nothing sensational about Mr. PAYNE. He never posed. He was incapable of posing. He never advertised. He had no press agent. He did his work.

He was brave, honest, robust, unpretentious, truthful. His eloquence was the eloquence of logic and of facts ably stated.

As Cromwell is reported to have said, "If the words were true words, they could be left to shift for themselves." He feared God and was without any other fear.

It is a saying of Guizot that "one must have been of great worth indeed to deserve not to be forgotten," and the name of SERENO E. PAYNE is indelibly written into the history of our country among the names of its practical patriots.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I would feel that I had failed to perform a duty that I owe to the memory of our dear friend, SERENO ELISHA PAYNE, were I not to add a brief tribute to his memory.

Residing in the adjoining congressional district, and being whole-souled, generous, and earnest in his nature, he could not fail to have friends in all the counties near where he lived, and consequently he was invited and on several occasions accepted invitations to advocate the cause of his party in my home town years before I met him in this hall. My early recollections of him are of the pleasantest character. Genial in temperament, he was a delightful man to meet, and evidently enjoyed becoming acquainted with young men.

His popularity with the people is indicated by the long succession of honors in his career. He received preferment in his home city and county before he came to Congress, more than 30 years ago, and no matter what the issue was against his party, his personal strength and popularity were always sufficient to insure his return to Congress. Here he advanced steadily in influence until he became the chairman of the most influential committee in the House, the great Ways and Means Committee, showing that his merit was duly appreciated and that his ability was recognized.

While Mr. PAYNE was a partisan, he was honest in the discharging of his duties, as was evident in the framing of the great tariff bill which bore his name. It is but fair to state that the bill, as written by him, was a far fairer measure than it was when it became law, and that the changes made in it were generally contrary to his wishes and against his protest.

His death has removed one of our ablest and most popular Members, and in his death Congress and the country have sustained a severe loss.

It fell to my sad lot to be one of the congressional party that journeyed to Auburn to attend his funeral. The ceremonies were held in the Baptist Church where he had worshiped when at home throughout his entire life. They were simple, beautiful, and impressive, and everybody who was present on that occasion must have been impressed with the belief that SERENO ELISHA PAYNE throughout his life had tried to live according to the Divine command.

The loss of such a man is of great consequence to any country. Never in the history of our country have we needed Christian statesmen more than to-day, men who fear God and walk with him, as our former colleague did. In these days when men often rush madly after wealth, position, and power, God is too often forgotten. It can be truthfully said of our departed friend for whom these memorial eulogies are offered that he was a Christian statesman. His departure is sincerely mourned as a national loss, and among those who associated with him and those who knew him best his memory will be cherished as a loyal and delightful friend, a congenial associate, a patriotic and devoted servant to his people, and a lover of his country.

Death came to him without warning.

He so lived that when his summons came to join
The innumerable caravan which moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
He went not, like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, we meet to-day in memory of a man whose life was spent in bestowing on his fellow countrymen the blessings of opportunity. He believed the greatest good that can be done to a healthy man is to give him a chance to earn his living and the greatest calamity that can befall him is to take from him his opportunity for daily work. With this idea ever in mind, he was able to crystallize it into laws that brought happiness to millions of Americans.

Length of service in this House is a conspicuous honor achieved by few, and never except by deserving it. And on all the bright roll of famous American representatives it is hard to find a name that shines with greater luster than that of SERENO E. PAYNE. He had within him a remarkable combination of fitting qualities that a discerning constituency were fortunate enough to recognize. The people of Mr. PAYNE'S district in electing him to a generation of membership here did a service to the country which is beyond human power to calculate, for they gave a great man the rare opportunity to carry to full fruition the results of broad constructive statesmanship. The present Speaker of the House gave him nothing more than just recognition when, on March 24, 1909, he said that Mr. PAYNE had become a great historical personage, and that—

"The history of the United States can not be written now and leave out the name of SERENO E. PAYNE, of New York. He takes his place in the company of Henry Clay, Robert J. Walker, Justin S. Morrill, William McKinley, William L. Wilson, and Nelson Dingley, as father of a great tariff bill, which must be referred to as long as men discuss the tariff in the United States, which, judging the future by the past, will be until Gabriel blows his trumpet."

It is not difficult to see why Mr. PAYNE achieved this proud eminence. He never for a moment forgot the one great, central, overwhelming fact that this country can be happy and prosperous only by giving steady employment to its people at ample compensation. He knew, always, that it is folly to try to buy too cheaply if thereby an American is deprived of employment. His great mind was like a beacon light, forever warning of the hidden rocks that lie beneath the frothy breakers of free trade. He knew the disaster that always comes to a country when it takes bread from the mouth of labor at home by trying to buy abroad for less than free and manly labor is entitled to receive. To this basic principle of protecting American manhood in the right to earn a living he applied the resources of his luminous mind and wonderful memory. He served his tariff apprenticeship under Thomas B. Reed, William McKinley, and Nelson Dingley. He saw the ruin wrought by the visionary pilotage of William L. Wilson, when the industrial progress of this country suffered a head-on collision with bankruptcy, poverty, and starvation. He saw the values of railroad stocks shrink from par to 12 cents on the dollar, and the armies of the destitute recruited to millions of men as the result of bad tariff legislation. He saw the revenues of the Government fail and the Treasury balance shrink to a deficit because of the theorizing folly of those who guided the legislation of this Nation.

Then he saw that army of hunger drive from power in this Capitol the enemies of prosperous employment, and he saw those hosts of misery change to millions of contented, hopeful, happy workers. He saw those depleted properties prosper once more till their stocks rose again to par. He saw the Treasury of the Nation filled again, and confidence shed its sunshine over all the land.

And then, with the years of plenty, he saw the old men who knew these things pass away and young men arise who dreamed of power and who beheld rainbows in the clouds. He saw his party torn asunder in the effort to present to the country two Presidents at once, and he saw the dreamers again hold high place. Thus it was given to him to witness, in his own legislative career, a complete cycle, from the industrial destruction wrought in 1892–93 to the industrial stagnation and depression in 1913–14. And he was the only Member of the House of Representatives who survived the vicissitudes of those changing times. Of those Members who voted for the McKinley bill in this House in 1890, Mr. PAYNE alone remained to vote against the Underwood bill in 1913.

Mr. PAYNE'S devotion to the principles of protection was the foremost fact of his legislative career. His knowledge of the details of the subject was amazing. How vast that knowledge was, and how untiring his industry, no one can fully realize, except those of us who had the privilege of serving with him on the great Committee on Ways and Means. He also knew much about many other subjects, but he did not talk a great deal. His greatest speeches were five in number—on the McKinley, Wilson, Dingley, Payne, and Underwood bills, respectively. If every other speech ever made in Congress on the tariff should be lost, those five speeches by Mr. PAYNE would enable the statesmen of the future to trace the tariff history of the United States, and the principles laid down by him would unerringly point the way to individual and national prosperity. He was not a polished orator in the rhetorical sense, but he had a remarkably direct and forcible way of stating things. He went directly to the heart of his subject, and so commanded instant attention. Thus, he began his speech on the Dingley bill, on March 23, 1897, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, that we need more revenue would seem to be so self-evident a proposition that no man who has by accident or design been elected to a seat in Congress would dare deny it. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. De Armond], who has just taken his seat, or my colleague upon the committee from Tennessee (Mr. McMillin) would take pains some evening to consult the proprietor of the corner grocery store in the little villages in which they live, they would find that experience had taught this man in business that even a small groceryman, running his business for four years by borrowing at the end of each year sufficient capital to keep his head above water, could not forever continue in that condition of borrowing.

And as I have been reading that speech, delivered nearly 18 years ago, it has seemed to me, Mr. Speaker, that it must have been written to apply to the conditions that exist to-day. I can not forbear to read one more brief extract. Listen:

For some reasons, I could never exactly understand why, the people desired and obtained a change. They said it made no difference about the House of Representatives if it did go Democratic; that the Senate would stand a bulwark against any tariff tinkering by the incoming administration. They were careless, and bitterly have they repented that carelessness in sackcloth and ashes since that fateful day. We had a Democrat in the White House; we had a Democratic House of Representatives, and finally, on the 4th of March, 1893, it was determined that we had a Democratic majority at the other end of this Capitol.

Confidence forsook the people. Business men began to pale before the prospect of that administration. Manufacturers dare not make their stock of goods for the succeeding market, and wage earners found that their employment and wages were uncertain under the new order of things. There was a prospect of lower duties; there was a prospect that if merchants could hold off their importations they might get them into the country at a less rate of duty. Importations ceased. Buying ceased, and under the influence of that administration, which was coming in like a black cloud over the industries of this country, they succeeded in cutting down the income under the McKinley bill so that for the year ending June 30, 1894, there was a deficiency of $69,000,000 in the revenue.

Twelve years to a day after that speech was delivered, Mr. PAYNE completed the most remarkable oratorical effort that any of us has ever heard in this House, when, in a speech nine and one-half hours long, he explained in detail the Payne tariff bill, and answered freely every question put to him by every Member of the House, until all had asked him what they pleased. It was this exhibition of mental and physical vigor that led Mr. Speaker CLARK to say:

There is another thing on which I congratulate the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and I do it as honestly as I did the other, that during the course of these hearings and by his nine and one-half hours' speech, he has knocked higher than a kite the idiotic theory of Dr. Osler.

Mr. PAYNE was a delegate to six national Republican conventions, and in 1912 made an appeal for harmony and obedience to convention law which, if it had been heeded, would have prevented the split that elected Mr. Wilson.

Mr. Speaker, time will not permit reference to the many incidents that crowd the memory of the older Members of the House, which remind us of the wisdom, the kindliness, the ever-present sense of humor that characterized our beloved friend, whose greatness we are only beginning to realize.

One of the greatest poets of antiquity boasted, truthfully, that he had by his own words put forth a monument more enduring than brass and higher than the Pyramids. The public utterances of Mr. PAYNE, preserved in our RECORD, form a monument to his memory, the magnificence of which will be recognized by our descendants when countless years have flown.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, there are special personal reasons why I should have a few words of tribute to pay to the memory of SERENO E. PAYNE. Mr. PAYNE represented my home county of Oswego in the Forty-ninth Congress, and again in the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses, after which a new apportionment was made. During that time he introduced several bills of local interest to my townsmen. Mr. PAYNE told my small son, when he met him last spring, that he was the fifth generation of my family he had known. He had not been in my home city of Oswego for 25 years until Thanksgiving eve, only a few days before his death, when he addressed a Republican dinner in what proved to be his last public speech.

For the last year or two of his congressional career Mr. PAYNE was known as the "father of the House," being the oldest member here in point of service. But his few Republican colleagues from the State of New York liked to regard him more intimately as the father of our delegation. We did not merely call him that, but we treated him as such, and he was very good to us. If we had troubles of any sort or difficult problems to solve, we took them to Mr. PAYNE, who was always ready to listen and to give a kindly word. Relieved of the great responsibility he had been carrying as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, he found time to enjoy things he had not had time for before. We had many meetings of one sort or another, and my visits with Mr. PAYNE will ever remain among the most precious memories of my stay here.

SERENO E. PAYNE was a busy man during all his stay in Congress. He never spoke unless he had something to say, yet the records show that he made over a thousand speeches in the House. He began his committee service on two inconspicuous committees, but for the last 20 years he served on the Committee on Ways and Means, and for 12 years he was its chairman. In this position he gave his name to a great tariff bill, not only because he was chairman, but because he really did the work of writing the bill as it passed the House. When he talked to the House about the tariff, he did not need a note or a written speech. He had all the facts in his wonderful mind ready to use as was necessary. He was the Republican floor leader under three Presidents—McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft—and did valiant service for our party in that capacity. Only four days before his own death he announced on the floor the death of our colleague, Representative Merritt, and on the very day he passed away he spoke briefly on the schools of Washington. Truly it can be said of him that he died as he would have wished—in the harness and serving the country until the very last hours.

SERENO E. PAYNE was a keen partisan. He believed in parties and in party government. He believed in his own party, and his best thoughts were for its advancement. The great men of the party for years past were his intimate friends, and he was repeatedly honored in its councils, State and National. For many years the State platforms of the Republican Party in New York were largely written by him, and in 1908 he was chairman of the committee on resolutions at the national Republican convention.

While it was as an expert on the tariff and allied questions that Mr. PAYNE was best known throughout the country, a study of the bills introduced by him shows his interest and activity in many other questions. He was the author of the Spanish-American War revenue act. Many years ago he introduced a bill for the American registry of foreign-built vessels owned by Americans, similar to that passed last summer. He was the author of a number of other bills relating to our merchant marine and the local needs of his district received his constant attention. For many years he gave unsparingly of his time, not only during the sessions of Congress but in the recesses as well, to the tariff, and it was as a result of this great labor that he was able to become, perhaps, the greatest authority on this question in Congress.

SERENO E. PAYNE was a splendid example of the kind of men we need in American public life. He performed his duties unflinchingly. He did not care for what has come too frequently to be regarded as associated with our officeholders—literary bureaus, political agencies, and the many other helps—which so many deem necessary for the obtaining of applause and favor from the public were unknown to him; yet his district and his colleagues in the House of Representatives continued to honor and revere him for 30 years. He believed in organization, but he did not need help from any organization to hold his office. If he had personal ambitions, he was never willing to compromise or temporize to attain them. He did not know how to associate personal gain with the holding of public office. He won his fights because he led them armed with personal honesty, unswerving devotion to principle, and unremitting adherence to what he deemed the best interests of the country.

The great leaders in the House of Representatives, of all parties, who served with Mr. PAYNE on the Committee on Ways and Means and so grew to know him intimately can best testify as to the value of his services to the country. They had almost daily opportunity to see the evidences of his splendid mind and his thorough grasp of the many problems coming before that committee.

Those of us from his own State and of his own party who have been closely associated with him in the present Congress bear witness as to his nobility of character, his loyalty and his devoted friendship, and to the kindly interest he always took in the junior members of his delegation.

Although we shall miss his eloquent voice from this Hall and although his sympathetic heart will never beat again, his memory will remain with us for years to come and SERENO E. PAYNE will stand out as a type of the great men who have occupied seats in the House of Representatives and have played the most important part in its deliberations. He was not only honored and trusted to an unusual degree, but he was well beloved by all those who knew him. He had the dignity which goes with a lofty character, he had the sympathy which goes with an understanding mind and a feeling heart. He had that abiding faith in the future of his country which goes with lofty patriotism. He kept the faith.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Speaker, on the 10th of last December there came to a close the long and useful life of SERENO E. PAYNE. It had been a life in which much had been accomplished both for his generation and for his country, and it is most fitting that we, his companions and friends, should pause for a moment and pay tribute to his most illustrious memory.

I think I can say without fear of contradiction that Mr. PAYNE represented the highest type of American manhood. A man of tremendous force of character and energy, combined with a love and capacity for hard work, he gave his life and his talents to his country with no expectation of reward except the conscientious belief that he was bettering the conditions under which the great American people lived.

He was a violent partisan and a hard fighter, but recognized by friend and foe alike as a fair fighter. During his long years of service he had had to do with all the great constructive legislation of the last generation, and on account of his great mental capacity and capabilities for hard work his mind was a veritable storehouse for accurate and intricate information on almost any legislative subject, but particularly with legislation that referred to economic questions; and this information which he had been a lifetime acquiring was freely given to friend and foe alike. There are many men in this House on both sides of the aisle who felt that they could freely go to Mr. PAYNE and ask and receive information which otherwise it would have taken long and laborious work to have acquired, and many times this information has been used against him on the floor in the argument of a party adversary.

I doubt if there is a man on the floor on either side of the aisle that did not feel that he had sustained a personal loss when Mr. PAYNE went to his final reward. His life and accomplishments can well be taken as the example and guide of any young man who is about to enter public life, for while a bitter partisan, no one ever questioned his absolute honesty of conviction and his own great personal honesty and integrity.

Personally he was a kindly and fatherly gentleman; one who was universally beloved by his colleagues in the New York State delegation, and especially so by the younger men whose counselor and guide he always was. He would spend hours refreshing his memory to give accurate information to some of us younger men who lacked the experience and the knowledge to enable us to ascertain facts and figures, and he did it all with a cheerfulness that won for him our highest esteem and affection. We shall miss his cool, dispassionate judgment, his wise counsel, his unerring sagacity, and his vast information. His life is a valuable lesson to the boys of America. It illustrates fully that genius is the capacity for hard work. Brilliancy often discourages patient toil, while natural genius is ever a failure without eternal vigilance and constant effort.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with SERENO E. PAYNE was of such comparatively short duration that I hesitate to speak of him in the presence of men who have known him long and intimately, many of whom have worked with him in the preparation of great measures and have fought with him in great legislative and political battles. I had perhaps met him once or twice at conventions in the State of New York, but can hardly say that I knew him until this Sixty-third Congress met in special session in the spring of 1913. Mr. PAYNE was for years a friend of my father, and I naturally sought him for advice and counsel when I became a Member of this House, and during the long summer of 1913, when the House of Representatives was waiting upon the action of the Senate and few Members were in Washington, except members of the two or three committees concerned in the pending legislation, I was much with him and came to feel toward him a strong affection. From his conversation, with its reminiscences of men and of former legislative and political events of importance, I learned much that was invaluable. His mind was richly stored with information upon all public questions, and he was always kindly and patient and ready to answer the many inquiries of a novice like myself.

Nothing impressed me more than Mr. PAYNE's high patriotism and devotion to principle. He was a man who voted on every question that came before him as a Member of Congress in accordance with his own convictions. His example and his able and forceful expressions of the reasons for his convictions have been an invaluable tonic to the small minority of Republican survivors in this Congress. To them, and especially to the Republicans of the New York delegation, the death of SERENO E. PAYNE was an irreparable loss, and the loss is felt only in less degree by men of other parties.

The Sixty-third Congress is in very large degree a Congress of new men, and the new men naturally became acquainted with each other a little more easily and rapidly than with the men of longer service. As I began to know Mr. PAYNE well I became particularly interested in the expressions of opinion of the younger men about me concerning him. There were men from the West, Progressives, Democrats, and even Republicans, who came into this Congress with the firm conviction that SERENO E. PAYNE was a "tool of the interests," an advocate of "special privilege," in league with the "malefactors of great wealth," etc., and they looked upon him with great suspicion. Mr. PAYNE had been grossly misrepresented in the heat of the campaign of 1912 by publications and political orators, and it is extremely gratifying to know that he lived long enough to live down those misrepresentations among all who had an opportunity of knowing the man and of knowing the truth about him and about his work. Several of the younger Members whom I have mentioned told me long ago that they had completely changed their opinions when they came to know Mr. PAYNE. Their feeling of suspicion soon broke down, and with further acquaintance they came to respect, to admire, and to love the grand old man who had endured undeserved abuse so patiently and so uncomplainingly, preserving his serenity with his readiness to serve undiminished.

A well-known Democratic Member of this House, first elected to the Sixty-second Congress, told me recently that he knew full well that he would never have been elected to Congress if the Payne tariff bill had become a law as Mr. Payne and his colleagues prepared it and first passed it through the House of Representatives. No one could fairly have questioned, he said, the fact that the original Payne bill was a full compliance with the Republican platform pledges of 1908.

The State of New York has lost a great leader in the death of Mr. PAYNE. I doubt if the public men of the State have realized the full worth of his counsel and influence. His courageous advocacy of good men and good measures often turned the scale at conventions and conferences of great importance, and his was frequently the influence which really accomplished things for which other men received most of the credit. He looked to the accomplishment, to the service he could render, not to the applause.

[Mr. FITZGERALD addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, when I became a Member of this House in 1898 Mr. PAYNE had been designated as Speaker by Speaker Reed, and he administered the oath of office to me. Speaker Reed was not present on that day, as I was then informed, because he did not wish to attach his name as Speaker to the bill which admitted the Hawaiian Islands to the United States. Within one hour from the time Mr. PAYNE administered the oath to me the yeas and nays were ordered, and I voted for the admission of the Hawaiian Islands, and I have always considered it one of the best acts of my life. I was assigned by Speaker Reed to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which committee Mr. PAYNE was then chairman. I have been a member of that committee ever since that time. The committee were considering a ship-subsidy bill when I became a member, and I became very much interested in the testimony presented in that interest. In the succeeding Congress a ship-subsidy bill was reported to the House which passed this body subsequently, but it failed of passage in the Senate because of a filibuster similar to the one that is now meeting the project of a ship-purchase bill which originated with the President of the United States.

I became somewhat familiar with Mr. PAYNE on account of being associated with him on the committee and because we were nearly of the same age, and both of us had been lifelong Republicans. We talked matters over together very freely. In 1880 I was sent as a delegate to the Republican convention, which was one of the memorable conventions, where the contest was between Grant and Blaine and which finally resulted in the nomination and election of President Garfield.

During the activities of that campaign there appeared in the opening to be some doubt as to whether the Republican Party would be successful. The result of the campaign of 1876 was of such a complex character that the question of determining the result of the election was settled by the appointment of an electoral commission, and on account of the controversy resulting therefrom there seemed to be some grave doubt as to whether the Republican Party would be successful in that campaign; but a chance remark spoken by the Democratic candidate in the campaign, wherein he stated that the tariff was a local issue, made an entire change on the face of the situation. My own city, which never has cast a majority for any candidate except a Republican candidate, was at that time in a realm of doubt, but upon that expression of Gen. Hancock the Republicans thought if it were a local issue they would make it a local issue, with the result that my city gave a very handsome majority for President Garfield, and the tariff issue overshadowed all other questions in the general issue of the campaign throughout the country. Mr. Payne and myself frequently spoke of the general result of that election, and of the vital issue that determined it. Neither of us believed that the tariff question would cease to be a controverted question between the contending political parties until long after our days on earth should be numbered.

The only time in the life of the Republican Party since 1854 that the Democratic Party has ever been able to have a plurality in that great manufacturing city was in the campaign of 1912, when the Republican Party was divided.

I recall another time when Mr. Payne presided in this House. In February, 1899, there was a very severe snowstorm, the most severe that I had ever seen, although I had lived in the North all my life. There were about 50 members who came to the House that day, and I was one of that number. I had an experience that I never had before. I froze both ears in that storm.

Mr. PAYNE was elected Speaker for that day, Speaker REED not being present. The means of conveyance for Members to come to the Capitol were very limited. Some Members came in tip carts, but I walked, a track having been broken by the street railroad company, although they could not move any cars. I watched Mr. PAYNE's career in this body with a great deal of interest. In the matter of the Payne-Aldrich tariff act, as it is known, if Mr. PAYNE himself could have written that tariff bill according to his own ideas, it would have been a very much broader bill even than it was when he reported it to the House. After it passed from this House to the Senate many changes were made in that bill which caused the principal difficulties and misunderstandings which aroused severe opposition that the friends and believers in the bill could not seem to overcome. But I recollect particularly that Mr. PAYNE stated when presenting the bill to the House that it would be a great revenue producer, and he said also that it would be a means of opening up our foreign trade. Every word he had stated in his remarks before the House was fully verified by the results of the bill that was finally enacted into law, for we had the greatest development of our industries and the largest domestic trade under that bill, and the largest foreign trade, that has every been recorded in the pages of history.

In the lapse of time I became chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House. I did not hold that position long, for the change in the political status of this House in 1910 caused me to be retired from the chairmanship; but I have still remained a member and have taken an active interest in the work of that committee, and I frequently conferred with Mr. PAYNE during this session of Congress in regard to the ship-purchase bill that was reported out of the committee in September, 1914, and that still remains, safely reposing in the Committee on Rules of this House awaiting, I presume, action in the Senate.

I never had written a minority report in opposition to any legislation in that committee until I wrote the minority report upon this shipping bill providing for Government ownership, for the reason that the gentleman who now presides over that committee, and who was associated with me during the time that I was chairman of that committee, Judge ALEXANDER, of Missouri, had been so fair and open in all the work that he presented in the committee that I deemed it unwise to make factious opposition to any legislation that he thought was for the best interests of this House and of the country.

My association with the Members of this House has been extremely pleasant. I have always been a strong believer in the policy of protection to American industries, of which Mr. PAYNE was the ablest advocate.

I was assigned by the Speaker to the sad duty as a member of the committee to attend the funeral and to pay the last tribute of respect to Mr. PAYNE at his home. When we left this city it was a very bleak day. There was a hard rainstorm, and it was very disagreeable indeed. When we arrived at his home city we found the ground covered with snow, the cold rather more extreme and severe than we had found it here. We were received by a committee of citizens, who demonstrated to us the affection and esteem they bore to Mr. PAYNE in that dear old city where he lived, and where he had received so many honors during his long and honorable career.

The schools on the day of his funeral were closed, as were also the business houses of the city, as a mark of respect to his great work and his active life among his people for so many years. I noticed Mr. PAYNE when he came into the House in December last year at the opening of this Congress and recognized that he seemed quite considerably changed, that he did not have his usual vivacious appearance, and yet when he participated in debates he seemed to be full of vigor and was able to handle himself with great credit to himself and the membership of this House.

I was very glad to hear the present Speaker of this House repeat what he said after Mr. PAYNE had finished his remarks in presenting the Payne bill to this House in 1909. It showed the broad spirit that the present Speaker has, and it was a very creditable tribute to the able and distinguished work that Mr. PAYNE did in the preparation of that bill and in the presentation of it to this House. I never have seen a bill of any character presented during my experience here that demonstrated such carefulness in its preparation, nor have I seen such a knowledge of all the material things contained in that great bill as was demonstrated by Mr. PAYNE during the nine and one-half hours that he occupied in laying out the beginning and continued to develop to the end of that great tariff bill.

His name will go down in history as one of the great men of this country. His work will live and it will be examined and used in the legislation which will yet be placed on the statute books when time and season shall bring about a change of policy of administration regarding the great questions of the tariff.

I am glad to come here to-day to pay this tribute of respect, love, and veneration for this beloved man, who passed away so suddenly and who finished his work in this House, where his triumphs and successes had been the greatest.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Mr. PAYNE the House mourns the loss of one of its oldest, ablest, and best beloved Members; his family loses one whom they had every reason to love, respect, and honor; and the country one of its most useful, upright, and valuable citizens.

It was my good fortune to know Mr. PAYNE well during my entire service in the House. He was one of those then in commanding position in the House I found kindly and considerate when I entered as a new Member nearly 20 years ago.

The acquaintance then made ripened into a regard which increased, at least on my part, continuously with the passing of the years; for our late friend was a man who, above all things, wore well. The better one knew him the better one liked him and the more one appreciated his sterling qualities.

SERENO E. PAYNE will be most widely and longest remembered as the author of the Payne tariff bill, though his work in connection with that legislation was but a fragment of the great volume of his highly important, long-continued, and valuable service in the House.

Our friend suffered the fate that seems the lot of most sponsors for tariff legislation. He lived to see the measure that bore his name criticized, misrepresented, and anathematized the country over; to become a veritable football of politics in a time of extraordinary political upheaval and disruption. While all of this must have been very painful to him, he gave comparatively little outward sign of his regret and disappointment.

The bill was not everything that Mr. PAYNE would have had it, as we well know. Things might have been very different had it been more nearly in accord with his views. He was not, however, given to criticizing those whose views had differed from his own, in the enactment of the legislation; and at no time seriously doubted the fundamental soundness of the measure.

This is neither the time nor the place to discuss the merits or demerits of legislation; but I am sure that no one, whether they agreed with him or not, ever begrudged our departed friend the satisfaction that he felt, for a considerable time prior to his death, in what he believed to be a practical demonstration of the soundness of the bill which bore his name and of the unwisdom of its repeal.

There are many of the finest products of nature that improve with age. In the main they are products that were always good, always wholesome, and time slowly, gradually, and almost imperceptibly enriches, mellows, and strengthens them. It pleases me to think that this desirable development which nature reserves for her best and rarest products was exemplified in the life and character of our friend. We always knew him as honorable, upright, conscientious, able, loyal, and as the years passed there came to him, it seems to me, in increasing measure a kindly philosophy, which embraced all mankind, and a wider tolerance of the views and opinions of others, however widely they differed from his own, than characterized his earlier and more active years.

There is a wide difference of opinion among men as to what constitutes the most desirable theater and setting for our last days on earth and our answer to the inevitable summons to another sphere of activity; but the better judgment of mankind seems most to incline to an experience of usefulness and helpful activity until the hour of our departure shall strike, and to the hope of a peaceful and painless passing into the shadows.

From this viewpoint of a desirable ending to a life of usefulness our late friend was most fortunate indeed in the manner of his approach to and his passage through the portals. To the very day of his death he occupied his accustomed place in the halls of legislation, with a mind as clear and logical and a memory as dependable as ever; with a body free from any serious taint, malady, or weakness of age. Thus, without lingering pain or illness, with honors thick upon him, in the midst of useful labors, respected by all, loved by those who knew him best, a good man, a faithful citizen, a devout Christian, having lived more than the allotted span of life and set an example which we may all well emulate, he passed to his reward.

Blessed are those whose ways are the ways of uprightness, whose days are days of usefulness, and who, answering the last summons, die in the Lord. Thus lived and thus died our friend.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I only wish to say a word or two as a personal tribute to a friend. I came back to Congress on the 7th of December, and on the 10th of December Mr. PAYNE passed away, dying in harness and in the service of his country as truly as any soldier; and if it is sweet and fair to die for one's country, his was that end.

He was devoted to that service. Nothing turned him from it. We could say of him, as was said of another, that he was not greedy for gold or feverish for gain, but went about his work knowing that "man's honest will must heaven's good grace command."

I had known him for 16 years. When I met him first he was in his prime, just over 50, buoyant in life, broad in mind, strong in courage, large in heart, what can be truly called a great and not a small man—great in every respect that makes a man.

So he remained, as our friend from Wyoming has just said, only mellowing with time into a kindliness that was felt by every Member of this House and that made them all his friends.

There was a difference when I came back. He seemed to be thinking more of the past; he seemed always to have in his mind the touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still, and we did not so much lament when we found that he was gone where he could be happy once more.

There is one trait of his character that has not been touched upon. We know that he was unselfish and devoted. His self-abnegation in his devotion to duty was very marked.

I really had forgotten, until I looked over the old records of the House, that he had been the senior member of the Committee on Ways and Means when his party came into power in 1895, and that he was not then made the chairman of that committee. But no man would have found that out from anything that he said or did. His devoted friendship to that great man, Nelson Dingley, who was put at the head of that committee, was a marked and wonderful thing in all of his service from that year down to the time of Mr. Dingley's lamented death. Mr. PAYNE thought nothing of self. He went on with his work and came into his own. He proved the adage, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." And as years went on, and now that he has gone to his reward, we can also say of him more forcefully than of most others that we have known here, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, SERENO E. PAYNE has passed. In his passing the credit side of this great body has been more than ordinarily diminished. He occupied and filled a place which caucus action, conference decree, or official appointment could not confer.

He was the "Father of the House." But we who knew him did not dwell upon his age or length of service. He had been the chairman of the greatest legislative committee in the republics of the world. He was its ranking minority member when the summons came. He was not usually referred to as either of these. Supporter and opponent, the press and public, knew him as SERENO PAYNE. These positions he adorned; him they did not exalt.

Four years I knew him as a young Member to whom on occasion he had kindly spoken. However, public print and picture had given me an estimate of him which was not greatly modified by personal contact.

Eulogies are spoken and epitaphs carved for men who have opened new fields, evolved new theories, or directed revolutions. SERENO PAYNE'S fame will not be so stated. His just claim for remembrance and distinction will rest largely upon the careful study, clear conception, and enthusiastic advocacy of that already existant which he believed to be sound and knew to be good. He might properly be characterized a defender of the faith rather than a reformer or crusader. Had he been a military man he would have chosen to defend the home and citadel rather than campaign for foreign conquest.

In this great body are all conceivable shades and colors of forensic talent, sometimes rising to genius—the word painter, the master of pathos, the adept at sarcasm and invective, the reveller in humor and wit, the student of detail, the repository of history, the cold, uncompromising logician, the magnetic personality, and the dramatic declaimer. SERENO PAYNE had his distinctive power. He stood at the head of this House in the comprehensive mastery, with ability to deliver with maximum force the controlling facts affecting the controversy. A Jove-like presence, a lifetime of study behind him, confidence in the rectitude of his cause, he carried conviction to his colleagues which often swept over and beyond the party aisle.

During the last campaign I was asked by a newspaper of his district for something that PAYNE had done for the farmers that it might be published in his behalf. I sent a copy of that part of the law bearing his name, relating to that industry in whose prosperity he was always concerned. It was sent; not as what PAYNE had said, but the highest evidence of what PAYNE had accomplished and believed in. I remember well the rich glow of pleasure which suffused his face when I told him what had been done. His statute, their experience; he was content to abide their judgment.

Partisan? Yes. The great characters of the nation nearly always have been. Narrow in partisanship? No. His partisanship seemed to be of that degree and extent to make a compact, virile, responsible organization, a reliable and efficient means for the accomplishment of his country's good.

The culminating accomplishment of his career, the great law which bears his name, modified in another body beyond his wishes, became the storm center of criticism which would have broken a weaker man supported by a less loyal constituency. My four years in this House witnessed a marvelous change which must have, in recent months, been gratifying to Mr. PAYNE. That law anathematized by partizans, ridiculed by opponents, undefended by friends—SERENO E. PAYNE stoutly stood for its general wisdom and expedience. Since the last vote of confidence which his people gave him, he remained long enough here to see that no more reproaches were cast upon that measure, and when he last defended it his defense remained unanswered. I do not at this time discuss its merits or demerits. What I have said was intended to show the pride and satisfaction he must have felt upon the apparent reversal of public sentiment upon a work to which he had given the best of a life of industry, honesty, patriotism, and far more than ordinary mental power. Like the lawgiver of old, he was denied entry to the land of promise—restored power of his party—but the full view from Nebo's height must have been gratifying, indeed.

He was steadfast in his confidence that people when well counseled would arrive at a wise judgment. He was more so in the ultimate mercy, righteousness, and judgment of the great Father whom he served and adored. His last hour was in communion with Him "who doeth all things well." The sacred Book was open before him when his eyes were sealed from earthly vision, but were opened to the endless beauties and sublimities of the eternal.

In that Book he found solace for his sorrow, comfort for his bereavement, inspiration for his conflict, hope for his ambition, and faith in the promise of that final reward which awaits a well-spent life.

His life has been an object lesson to all who would serve their country, and the circumstance of his death adds the final touch. It makes the Christian statesman the highest appellation we can give to those who serve their State or country.

Mr. WALLIN. Mr. Speaker, a deserved tribute in memorial of the late SERENO E. PAYNE is a task for men who knew him more intimately than did I and whose command of terms of admiration, whose opportunities for close inspection and familiarity with his many strong and noble characteristics were better than my own.

Before I came to Congress I knew Mr. PAYNE slightly and, in common with all thinking men of the State of New York, ranked him as one of our most able and sturdy citizens. His work in this House early attracted attention and grew more and more conspicuous as he laid before the country his views, especially as to the question of the revenues, on which he became an expert.

Out of his close study and wide experience he gave us the Payne tariff law, and the day it was signed was undoubtedly the proudest and most satisfactory period of his lift as a legislator. His work had its reward in the tide of prosperity which swept over this nation as a result of his labors and the expression in practice of his long, patient, and careful study and effort. He was justly jealous of this measure and defended it ably and convincingly on many occasions on and off this floor. Though superseded by a hostile administration and majority, it to-day stands and will ever stand as a monument to him, its originator as one of the most successful, most clearly drawn, most comprehensive and able documents of its character enacted in the history of the United States Congress.

Closer acquaintance and relation convinced me that one of Mr. PAYNE'S strongest qualities was faithfulness. He was faithful to every detail of life great or small. His attendance in this House to within a few hours of his death was an example of this great and admirable attribute which he possessed. As a husband and father he was faithful, loving, generous, and wise. As a friend he was helpful, ready, and kind. Always gentlemanly, solicitous, and quick to comprehend, he gave to his acquaintances more than he received of courtesy, gentleness, and consideration.

In a word, Mr. PAYNE was a man whose personality and accomplishments impressed themselves upon those whom he met in an unusual and pleasant manner. Deceit or equivocation he had not. He was an aristocrat of the old school, but never an autocrat in any sense. Success did not elate him beyond the ordinary plane, and failure did not place upon him, either in face or in mind, the mark with which it sometimes delights to disfigure an otherwise noble nature.

SERENO PAYNE has been taken from us. He has been called home by a Father All Wise and Omnipotent. His going is a loss to his district, his family, his friends, and, through this House, to the Nation. No really great man, such as was he, can pass away without leaving not only aching hearts, but a void in affairs which is a long time in the filling and a wound which is not soon healed. Particularly is this the case with a man of Mr. PAYNE'S character and disposition. His daily life, sunny, radiating with friendship and kindness, we shall always admire and never forget. As a legislator, as a factor in affairs of his country, and at his home, his career was at once an example and an inspiration. He was no laggard. He shouldered responsibilities and made history. Broad was his mind, keen his foresight, and brave and manly his course along right lines. His constituents recognized his good qualities and his prominence and returned him here to serve them and the country with but one break, for over a quarter of a century.

Peace to his ashes. We shall, indeed, miss him.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, our modern conception of human greatness sometimes induces us to underestimate the public services of the great men who are around and about us, and to unduly exaggerate the merits of those whose fame has been made illustrious by time and history, although in the glibness of an admiration for those of our contemporaries whose patriotic or partisan services we may for the moment extol, it is often the practice to borrow and apply the adjectives without regard to a fine discrimination which distinguishes the man who is truly great. And yet to-day there are great men rendering public service with as much patriotism and as much ability as is generally and historically conceded to those who have gone before, the difference being that they are less conspicuous in the popular mind to-day because they are more numerous than they were a century or more ago.

Of SERENO E. PAYNE there are critics who might say he was not a great man. Our modern spirit of iconoclasm, and that familiarity which makes it impossible for the modern mind to realize that greatness of human intellect, like the growth and development of the world's resources, exceed all in preceding centuries, may in some degree account for it. But that SERENO E. PAYNE possessed elements of greatness which, upon the strength of his recorded works, at some belated day may give him that niche in history which is vouchsafed to few, may not be denied.

Mr. PAYNE was a product of American soil and he grew up and developed in the environment surrounding his place of birth. He advanced step by step, after the fashion of the typical American boy, until he was sent to be a spokesman for the people in the House of Representatives. His long and faithful services here brought to him a distinction for industry and devotion to the public welfare that all men might envy. He led the charge to victory, and in many battles received and turned the assault. He stood for the principles in which he believed and so well sustained them that the whole Nation came to look upon him as a champion to be relied upon in times of adversity as well as in times of prosperity. He had the public confidence. What greater honor can come to an American citizen than this?

Before I came to Congress, having faith in the economic principles for which Mr. PAYNE contended, I had come to regard him as one of the great men in our national life. He was the central figure of the Ways and Means Committee, shaping tariff legislation. I had read of him as one who could keep his own counsel; as one who could be intrusted with the custody and determination of questions vital to the welfare of industries and communities, and who could yet turn aside those who would disturb or thwart the work of his committee, with a smile. When I arrived in Congress and found it was necessary to consult Mr. PAYNE upon many questions affecting the welfare of industries in my city and State, I found him in fact the strong, firm character about whom I had read, but courteous withal and determined that the scales of justice as between the conflicting elements should be evenly adjusted. I had occasion to observe the careful and painstaking work which he took upon himself to do in the shaping of the Payne tariff law. It was in the completion of this task that he again revealed those elements of greatness which even the minority members of the committee, on more than one occasion, conceded to him.

If there be those who believe that Mr. PAYNE was not entirely satisfied with the great work to which his name has been attached, let it be remembered that the effect of the Payne tariff law, no matter how men may have differed as to its separate schedules, was not to detract from the progress or prosperity of the country, but to advance it to its highest state of achievement.

When the Payne law was repealed and the general who had led the hosts to victory was called upon to cover the retreat he was still forceful, still brave, still great. He did not hesitate to defend the principles for which he stood, even though defeated, but took up the gage of battle and cheerfully and faithfully continued to fight just as he did when the tide was in his favor.

Mr. Speaker, it was an honor to serve on the Ways and Means Committee with SERENO E. PAYNE. When I was added to the minority in that committee I took up the work with respect and reverence for our distinguished leader. To him it was necessary to appeal upon disputed points. To him it was wise to go when troubled by doubts. And, oh, what a relief it was, when controversies arose in committee or on the floor of the House, to have this towering giant of the protective policy rush to the rescue. In such emergencies his knowledge and experience were invaluable. Though I came to know Mr. PAYNE far better than I had hoped, the genuine respect I entertained for him in the beginning continued until the end. The better I knew him, indeed, the greater I respected him. And when, on the morning after his death, I gazed upon his rigid body as it lay in his apartments in this city, majestic even in death, I was grateful that I had served with him, for I felt that a great public servant—one who would long be remembered—had been called to his reward.

And when, Mr. Speaker, you were pleased to add me to the committee to escort his mortal remains to the beautiful town of Auburn, to be laid away under the sod and the snow in the local hilltop cemetery, I knew I was not mistaken. For in the town where his early life had been spent and in the church where he worshiped I had witnessed the poignant regret and sorrow of a people who knew him best and whose trust in him had never been shaken. Monuments to great men may tower high in public places where the multitude can come to do them reverence, but no memorial of granite or bronze is more to be desired than the love and esteem of the "home folks"—and these, we learned on that sad journey, had been earned, and retained through all his earthly battles, by our lamented colleague, SERENO E. PAYNE.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. Speaker, we have met this morning in memory of a great man—one whose greatness was shown at its best by the manner in which he lived his life from day to day and from year to year, performing each day his full and exact duty as he saw it in all its details. He was a devoted husband and father, a steadfast friend, a public-spirited citizen, a conscientious official, and representative of the people.

SERENO ELISHA PAYNE was born at Hamilton, N. Y., in 1843, and was graduated from the University of Rochester, N. Y., in 1864. In that institution it was his privilege to study under a remarkable teacher, Martin B. Anderson, then president of the university, and he was fond of quoting a precept of that eminent educator, "Bring something to pass, young man," and how thoroughly he absorbed and lived up to that injunction his after life is proof. He was admitted to the bar in 1866, and thereafter practiced his chosen profession in the city of Auburn. In 1868 he became city clerk and held that position until 1871, when he served as supervisor for one term. From 1873 he was for six years district attorney of Cayuga County, and in the many important cases he tried he was noted for the skill and fairness he showed as prosecuting officer. He was then, in 1879, elected president of the board of education of Auburn, and after holding that office for three years he was chosen for what proved to be his life work—Representative in Congress; and with the exception of one term he was returned regularly and had been reelected again in November, 1914.

His alma mater and Colgate University honored him and themselves by conferring upon him the degree of doctor of laws.

In all the offices he held before coming to Washington he did his work so thoroughly that each was but a stepping stone to the next, and this early acquired habit of complete devotion to the task at hand proved to be the secret of his success here.

For 25 years a member of the great Committee on Ways and Means, he studied and became an expert on the subject of the tariff. In the preparation of the McKinley and Dingley bills he was an important factor, and as chairman of the committee he framed the bill in 1909 which bore his name. No better illustration of the mental and physical endurance of the man could be given than the labor involved in preparing in one lifetime three tariff bills and his complete mastery of such an intricate and complex subject. But this capacity for close study and persistent application might not have brought to him preeminence in this subject had he not been blessed with a most retentive memory.

Mr. PAYNE was a master of debate, always ready and sometimes in his zeal giving hard blows, but I believe his adversaries, though vanquished, seldom bore him lasting grudge for their defeat.

It was my good fortune to secure a seat next his when I became a member of this body, and what had been but an acquaintance ripened into a true friendship, and, as opportunity served to let me know him better, I readily understood how he had attained the predominating position he enjoyed in the councils of the Republican Party, of which he was always a staunch and devoted member, and also how he came to have so many friends in the ranks of both parties.

His public life had been so long and had been lived in such an eventful period of our country's history that an evening passed in his company when he was wont to review the events in which he had taken part was always one of deep interest, and his audience was certain to be thrilled by his recitals. I deem myself singularly fortunate in having enjoyed many such evenings in the past four years.

He is and will be missed by many friends, but the memory of his life and deeds will be cherished by those friends, and they will have the consoling thought that he died without protracted illness or suffering, retaining to the end his full mental vigor and the power to enjoy with them the simple pleasures of which he was so fond.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE EDWIN A. MERRITT, JR.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Speaker, a man who rises to distinction above his fellow men does so by reason of some exception as a public servant and as a man, and this question of the value of a man in the public service is the question I desire to discuss briefly in connection with EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., whose memory we revere in the ceremonies to-day.

Mr. MERRITT entered the Sixty-second Congress to fill the vacancy caused by the death of another great man from New York State, Hon. George R. Malby. He took his seat at the convening of the short session of the Sixty-second Congress in December, 1912. He had been elected to the Sixty-third Congress and, recognizing his unusual ability as a legislator, he was selected by the Republican membership in the House to represent them on the Committee on Rules. Just at that period, however, he was taken ill and was unable to render very much service. Last November he was reelected to the Sixty-fourth Congress, although at the time confined to his home. In December he passed away at his home in Potsdam, in the northern part of New York State.

Mr. MERRITT's public service was largely performed in the Legislature of the State of New York. He began his service as a member of the assembly in 1902, and served in that body continuously for 11 years. For much of that time he was the Republican leader of that body, and in his last year of service was speaker of the assembly. It was my privilege to become acquainted with Mr. MERRITT during the first year he was a member of the legislature, and I learned to regard him as a very strong character. He devoted himself to mastering all the State's business. He familiarized himself with the intricacies of the different departments. He was easily the best informed man upon the needs of government in New York State during his period of service. I can recall a conversation with former Gov. Hughes, now a member of the Supreme Court of the United States. He told me that the man who was most helpful to him in the matter of the State's finances was our deceased friend. I have heard him often discuss New York matters of great moment. When he rose to speak it was with the fullest of information, and when he presented a case it was with a wealth of illustration. Not only his supporters but his opponents profited by his industry and his painstaking labor.

The people of a community can receive and deserve no higher encomium for their intelligence, their integrity, steadfastness, and patriotism than by their continued and hearty support of such a man as Mr. MERRITT, who for many years was afforded an opportunity for such public service. He earned and received and appreciated it, and the people reaped their full reward by the dedication of a rare life solely to their welfare. The close of such a long, useful, and honored life could not arouse a poignant sorrow, except as one would sincerely mourn that such a departure is the divine dispensation and that such a friend has finally left us.

To his dear old father, a hero of our great war between the States, now an old man, and to his loving wife and daughter, all of us here extend our heartfelt sympathy, and in their sorrow I am sure it will be some comfort to them to feel that their beloved one had the confidence and esteem of the strong men with whom he had come in contact during his years of service for the State and the Nation.

I do not know to whose memory could be more fittingly applied this tribute to a moral hero:

He never failed to march breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break;
Never thought though right were worsted
Wrong would triumph;
Held we fall to rise, are beaten to fight harder,
Sleep to wake.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I did not know the late EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., intimately. He came to this body in the last session of the Sixty-second Congress, and attended, so far as he was able, the first session of the Sixty-third Congress. His reputation in the State of New York was very high, as he had given his services to the State from 1896 until 1912. He had served his town as supervisor for 7 years, his assembly district in St. Lawrence County for 11 years, and the last 4 years he was the Republican leader in that body. When he was elected to Congress, he occupied the position of speaker of the assembly. He was one of the best informed men in the State, regarding affairs that affected that Commonwealth, and had his health permitted, he would have undoubtedly taken high rank in the Congress of the United States. He was a successful man in political work because he loved to work. He was interested in legislation and enjoyed the game of politics. He worked hard and the success of his career is due not only to his ability and his education, but in great part to his industry. He did not succeed because he was lucky. He succeeded because he worked—constant work and close attention to duties.

I was one of the delegation who attended his funeral at his former home, Potsdam. A finer tribute could not have been rendered than that which took place there, that cold December day, when the pulse of business was still, and people gathered from many parts of northern New York, Albany and New York City, as well as from the National Capital, to offer their last tribute of respect to one whom they had learned to love and admire. The services were of the most dignified character. It was remarked that those who participated and those who attended seemed to be filled with a personal obligation which they were endeavoring to discharge in the most fitting manner possible.

A man of the life, character, works, and faith of EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., does not die, for in the words of an unknown author—

There is no death; the stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore,
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forevermore.

There is no death; an angel form
Walks o'er the earth with silent tread;
He bears our best-loved things away,
And then we call them dead.

Born into that undying life,
They leave us but to come again;
In all, in everything, the same,
Except in grief and pain.

And ever near us, though unseen,
The dear immortal spirits tread,
For all the boundless universe is life;
There are no dead!

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, Mr. MERRITT was not as well known to his colleagues as he would have been had not the hand of illness fallen upon him early in his service here. However, he was a man of such strong personality that he gained for himself in a few months a position that it often requires years of service of men of more than average ability to secure. At the beginning of his second term he was appointed a member of the Committee on Rules, one of the most important committees of the House, and in some respects the most important. Membership upon this committee is eagerly sought, and usually attained only after many years of service. Mr. MERRITT's appointment, however, was recognized by all who knew him as being due to his special qualifications for service in this important place. As a leader in his great State, as speaker of the New York Assembly, he had not only a special knowledge of parliamentary law, but intimate knowledge of the many important subjects of legislation.

He attended only a few of the meetings of the Committee on Rules, for the illness which caused his death came upon him shortly after his appointment to that committee; but in the meetings he did attend he so impressed himself upon his colleagues, that we have a keen realization of what the committee, the House, and the country has lost by his death. He was a man of but few words, as we knew him, but when he did speak we knew that it was from a mature and well-considered judgment, formed after carefully considering all sides of the question involved. His modesty, his kindliness, and his wise counsel we shall always remember. The House has lost a valuable member, his State and country a faithful servant.

[Mr. FITZGERALD addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. HAMILTON of New York addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., represented the largest district in area in the State of New York. It was the great Adirondack district, comprising the counties of Clinton, Essex, Franklin, and St. Lawrence. Mr. MERRITT was in touch with the district as thoroughly as a Representative could have been. The leading manufacturing interest was in the making of paper, and he was an officer or stockholder in several companies. It is the hunting and fishing ground of New York State, and Mr. MERRITT knew the woods and waters well. He knew the wants of his people by intimate association with them, and tried to see that they were filled. He was a born leader whether in public or private life, and his people in his own home county of St. Lawrence honored him by sending him eleven terms to the State legislature, and, afterwards, the congressional district twice elected him to the House of Representatives.

EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., was a big man; that was the impression he left on all who met him. Not alone a big man physically for he had a giant's frame and strength, but proportionally big mentally. It was just the strength of body and mind that one would expect, knowing his splendid father, who still lives at the family home, and knowing the kind of men who succeed in the north country where courage and perseverance and ability to fight are brought into daily play. He was the typical giant of the north.

But few men at Washington came to know Mr. MERRITT well. He was not here long before he was attacked with what proved to be a fatal sickness. But he was here long enough to study out things and long enough for his friends to realize that if he were continued in service, as he would have been, he would have been as successful and useful a Member to this House as he had proved to be at Albany in the assembly of the State of New York.

At Albany Mr. MERRITT spent the best years of his career. Elected to the assembly in 1902, in 1908 he became leader of the majority in that house, under Speaker James W. Wadsworth, just elected to the United States Senate. In 1912 he was elected speaker of the assembly. In these two offices he left his mark on all the leading legislation passed by the legislature. Our highway law and our public-service law were matters of careful study to him, and not a bill passed the assembly with which he was not familiar. The men who served with him during these 11 years, even if all of them could not agree with him on various questions, all respected Mr. MERRITT as a leader and loved him as a friend. The State of New York, without regard to party, paid tribute to him at his death.

EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., was brave, generous, loyal, and true. He will long live in the affectionate regard of those who knew him, and they will not cease to mourn for him. He has passed on to rest, but his hold on the hearts and affections of his friends is undiminished.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, it is a sad commentary upon human affairs that life must end, not always in youthful maturity or ripened old age, but sometimes at that period when it is best equipped for useful public service. The career of our late colleague, Mr. MERRITT, at the bar and in the legislature of the State of New York, had prepared him for those higher duties which are imposed upon a Representative of the people at the Nation's Capitol. In good part and with becoming enthusiasm he had entered upon that work. One of his first assignments was to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, of which I am a member. It was there we began to know him better and to understand him and the purposes which animated him in coming to the House. His legislative experience and the readiness and ability with which he took up the duties assigned him, gave promise of excellent future service. He was of the minority of the Immigration Committee and the benefit of his counsel and advice had just begun to be appreciated when word came of his illness. Then followed the last sad message. Our colleague had passed from the responsibilities placed upon him by his constituents to that higher service which none may resign. Mr. MERRITT was stricken when we were beginning to avail ourselves of his mental powers and his legislative experience. What may we say of so sudden a taking off? It was not our way, nor is it for us to complain. The grief we share with those who knew and loved him best may in part be assuaged by the satisfaction we have in knowing that the work he did here was well and faithfully done. In tribute to his memory we can truthfully say what is most commendable of the public servant, that the silver cord which bound our colleague to his earthly task was broken when the best that was in him had been dedicated to the public weal.

Mr. WALLIN. Mr. Speaker, to-day it is mete to pay tribute to EDWIN A. MERRITT, who died while in the service of this House. Mr. MERRITT was a man of such pronounced physical attainments that rash would he have been considered who should have forecasted his demise at a period so early in his career. Strong as he was bodily, his mentality was fully as great. For years a member of the New York Legislature, he soon took rank with the leaders in that capital and the State, and was everywhere looked upon as unquestionably among the most able of his colleagues, both as an originator and a framer of legislation. From a modest newcomer in the assembly, in less than 10 years he had worked his way up until he attained the leadership of that body and acquired an acquaintance and distinction with the public men of the State enjoyed by few in recent years.

Mr. MERRITT was well educated, graduating from Yale College in 1884. He was possessed of a comprehensive mind and mental attainments which soon marked for more than ordinary heights in his chosen field. How well he fulfilled the early expectations of his many home friends the record shows. His influence in public affairs was always toward the right. He was forceful and ardent in his labors and once having formed his opinion nothing could change his position save proof that his conclusion was wrong. He was man enough to realize that every question has two sides and his ambition was to be in the right, whether the matter was one relating to public or private affairs. His rapid development as a statesman was a matter of gratification, especially to those whose good fortune it was to know him intimately, and thus, when he was selected to fill in this body the place made vacant by his former leader and associate, the Hon. George R. Malby, his constituents were commended for their recognition of those abilities which make for good representation in the councils of the Nation.

Mr. MERRITT'S service here was brief, but it was sufficiently long to premise a brilliant and useful career in the House, when a fatal malady attacked him and he gradually succumbed to the inevitable. When his life went out a bright light was extinguished and a wide circle mourned. The sympathy of an Empirical State and of his colleagues in this Chamber from every State in the Union was extended in their sorrow and affliction to the members of his family, and it is now we place on the record our tribute of appreciation and recognition of his ability and worth in every walk of life, and our expression of grief that he will be with us no more.

Of him, as of another, it may be said:

> A man that Fortune's buffets and rewards
> Has ta'en with equal thanks.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I consider it indeed an honor to pay my tribute to the memory of the Hon. EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., a truly great and remarkable man. Probably no man in this body knew Mr. MERRITT as intimately as I, having been associated with him in legislative work for over a decade, and during that time having been his intimate friend.

He was a giant in stature, with a mental equipment to match. The surroundings of one's youth have a great influence upon the habits and characteristics of life. Mr. MERRITT was raised among the rugged foothills of the Adirondacks. He came of a hardy race of pioneers, men who had blazed the trail into that north country, and his natural character of mind and body was that of the hardy, capable, self-reliant pioneer. Endowed with a brilliant mental equipment which was polished and trained by his education at Yale, his was indeed a mind that was fitted to grasp and deal with the complex questions that confronted him during his legislative career.

He entered public life early in the struggle of the people to control vast corporate interests. He had given this question much study and thought, and he had very certain and pronounced convictions, as years before the final creation of a commission to regulate public-service corporations, I had discussed this matter with him and understood his views. He believed in the power of the Government, and believed that that power should be exercised to regulate, and regulate for the people's interests. The first legislation along this line which he drafted was legislation which made the then existing railroad commission in the State of New York, a State charge instead of having the expenses of the commission paid by assessment on the railroad corporations. This proposed legislation was misunderstood and defeated, but I well remember Mr. MERRITT'S remarks concerning it, when he said that no adequate regulation can be had when the regulators are paid by the corporations that are to be regulated.

Soon after the defeat of this bill he was a dominant figure in an investigation regarding the conditions of the gas companies of New York City, and drew and introduced a bill which created a gas commission, and saw his theory put into effect by seeing the expenses of the gas commission paid by the State. He was a great admirer of Gov. Charles E. Hughes, Gov. Hughes attaining wide public recognition on account of having been counsel for this investigating committee. When Mr. Hughes was elected governor, it was natural that Mr. MERRITT should be the man selected to draw the public service corporations bill, which was to regulate the great corporate interests of our State. He saw what few men see, his theory, which had been called impractical only a few years before, put into full force and operation in the great State of New York.

He had the most accurate mind of any man that it has ever been my privilege to be intimately associated with; few spectacular flights of brilliancy, but his mind always worked like an accurate, well-oiled machine. His final determination and opinions were universally accurate, so much so that his opinions and judgment were eagerly sought by his friends and acquaintances. He gave the best years of his life to the service of his State, and there is no question but what the same energy and ability expended in private life would have brought him tremendous personal advantages.

He left his decided imprint upon the policy of the State of New York, and knowing him as I did, I am absolutely certain that had he lived his tremendous force of character would have made the same imprint upon the policies of the national legislation.

Personally, he was a most lovable man. The primitive surroundings of his youth strengthened his regard for friendship, and a man that was his friend was indeed fortunate, for there was no sacrifice that he would not make for that friendship. One of his strongest characteristics was his entire and absolute loyalty to his friends. He was big-hearted, generous, intolerant of the petty meannesses of little minds, but always tolerant of honest convictions although differing from his.

He was a man of unlimited courage, the kind of moral courage that permitted him to stand by his friends if he thought they were right, and to stand by his convictions on public questions although those convictions were at the moment unpopular. The most dominant characteristics of his nature, to us who knew him well, were his accuracy of judgment and his unflinching courage; characteristics that are indeed rare. I doubt if there was a man in the State who had more friends than Mr. MERRITT, and these friends were not confined to his political associates, but numbered many of his political adversaries, all of whom recognized that he was a hard, courageous fighter, but that he always fought fair. He had the gift of so many able men, of illustrating a point or administering a rebuke with an anecdote, which was always to the point, and many times illustrated the point and made unnecessary the harsh and cutting statement that must have been uttered had it not been for the milder way which he used to accomplish the same result.

In the death of Mr. MERRITT the National Legislature loses the influence of a great, big, broad-minded, able man, and we who knew him well lose an esteemed and loyal friend.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to print in the Record the proceedings of the memorial services held in honor of the late EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., in the assembly chamber at Albany, N. Y., on January 20, 1915, and also to include the proceedings of the public memorial services held at Potsdam, N. Y., on December 14, 1914.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The proceedings referred to are as follows:

EXERCISES IN MEMORY OF HON. EDWIN A. MERRITT, JR., AT ALBANY, N. Y.

Exercises in memory of Hon. EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., held in the assembly chamber, State capitol, Albany, N. Y., Wednesday evening, January 20, 1915, 8 p. m., Hon. Thaddeus C. Sweet, speaker of the assembly, presiding. In the presence of Hon. Charles S. Whitman, governor of the State of New York, and the members of the senate and the assembly.

Speaker SWEET. Prayer will be offered by the Rev. W. J. Hamilton, of Potsdam, N. Y.

Rev. HAMILTON. We will read a part of the Ninetieth Psalm:

"Lord, Thou hast been our refuge, from one generation to another. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever the earth and the world were made; Thou art God from everlasting and world without end. Thou turnest man to destruction; again Thou sayest, Come again, ye children of men. For a thousand years in Thy sight are but as yesterday; seeing that is past as a watch in the night. As soon as Thou scatterest them they are even as asleep; and fade away suddenly like the grass. In the morning it is green, and groweth up; but in the evening it is cut down, dried up, and withered. For we consume away in Thy displeasure and are afraid at Thy wrathful indignation. Thou hast set our misdeeds before Thee, and our secret sins in the light of Thy countenance. For when Thou art angry all our days are gone; we bring our years to an end, as it were a tale that is told. The days of our age are threescore years and ten; and though men be so strong that they come to fourscore years; yet is their strength then but labor and sorrow; so soon passeth it away, and we are gone. Oh, teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."

So endeth the lesson. Let us pray.

Direct, O Lord, in this and all our doings with Thy most gracious favor, and further us with Thy continual help, that in this and all our works, begun, continued and ended in Thee, we may always glorify Thy holy name, through Jesus Christ, our Lord.

O merciful God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the resurrection and the life, in whom whosoever believeth shall live, though he die, and whosoever liveth and believeth in him shall not die eternally; who also has taught us, by His holy apostle St. Paul, not to be sorry, as men without hope, for those who sleep in Him. We humbly beseech Thee, O Father, to raise us from the death of sin unto the life of righteousness, that, when we shall depart this life, we may rest in Him, and that, at the general resurrection in the last day we may be found acceptable in Thy sight and receive that blessing which Thy well-beloved Son shall then pronounce to all who love and fear Thee, saying, Come, ye blessed children of My Father, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world. Grant this, we beseech Thee, O merciful Father, through Jesus Christ, Our Lord.

O most merciful Father, who hast been pleased to take unto Thyself the soul of our brother, grant to us who are still in our pilgrimage and who walk as yet by faith that having served Thee with constancy on earth we may be joined hereafter with Thy blessed saints in glory everlasting, through Jesus Christ, our Lord.

O Lord, who by Thy death didst take away the sting of death, grant unto us, Thy servants, so to follow in faith where Thou hast led the way, that we may at length fall asleep peacefully in Thee and awake up after Thy likeness, through Thy mercy, who livest with the Father and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end.

O God, whose days are without end and whose mercies can not be numbered, make us, we beseech Thee, deeply sensible of the shortness and uncertainty of human life, and let Thy holy spirit lead us through this valley of misery in holiness and righteousness all the days of our lives, that, when we shall have served Thee in our generation, we may be gathered unto our fathers in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a reasonable religious and holy hope, in favor with Thee, our God, and in perfect charity with the world. And all we ask through Jesus Christ, our Lord.

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name; Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

Speaker SWEET. Those who were associated with him as a member of assembly, who served under his helpful direction as speaker, and those who are familiar with his faithful and intelligent service in the State and National Legislatures, meet to-night to honor the memory of EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr.

Those who served with him can bear witness to his high qualities of mind and heart and to his charming personality, which drew around him at all times a band of faithful and admiring friends and which endeared him to all his associates. Possessed of great mental vigor and physical strength, he used to the best of advantage in his long service in the assembly and in the House of Representatives his intellectual powers in the highest interests of the State and of the Nation.

We can not lose sight of such a man, the work he performed, or the influence he exerted upon the interests and activities of the Commonwealth. He had a wide knowledge of the affairs of state. He was interested in its financial, commercial, and educational welfare, was always active in promoting all measures which had for their object the uplift of the people, and throughout his legislative career was a faithful and energetic public servant.

He exerted an influence among his associates which they will long remember, and all who believe in the power of education and honor to advance the integrity, usefulness, and power of good citizenship will cherish his memory and hold his example in loving remembrance. It is character only which lives, and his character, combined with honorable public service, can not be forgotten.

Selection, "Lead, Kindly Light," by double quartette, composed of the following: Sopranos, Mrs. Charlotte Bord Gilbert, Miss Alice E. Taylor; contraltos, Mrs. Edith Cleghorn Weaver, Mrs. Edna Herrick Peck; tenors, Ben Franklin, George W. Franklin; bassos, Roy H. Palmer, John N. Edwards.

"Lead, kindly light, amid the encircling gloom,
Lead, Thou me on!
The night is dark, and I am far from home,
Lead Thou me on!
Keep Thou my feet! I do not ask to see
The distant scene; one step enough for me.

I was not ever thus, nor prayed that Thou Shouldst lead me on;
I loved to choose and see my path; but now
Lead Thou me on!
I loved the garish day; and, spite of fears,
Pride ruled my will. Remember not past years.

So long Thy power has blest me, sure it still Will lead me on
O'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent, till
The night is gone;
And with the morn those angel faces smile,
Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile."

Speaker SWEET: It has been the purpose of your committee to conduct the exercises of the evening in harmony with the life led by our departed brother and friend, and we have invited as the speakers of the evening his former and closest associates. I take great pleasure in presenting to you the first speaker of the evening, Hon. Frank L. Young.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen: Memorial services are as old as recorded history, and even in the days before written history the memory of leading men in every land and clime was perpetuated in the manner characteristic of their country.

In his oration on the Athenian dead, Pericles, after speaking eloquently on the characteristics of his country, the elements which had made it great, and the resources of its strength, stated of the men who were being memorialized, the honored dead, "Such did these men prove themselves as became the character of their country."

In every land there is an ideal manhood, expressed or unexpressed. This ideal is composite, made up of the opinions of all the different grades of men and of every school of thought, and yet is, on the whole, capable of definition.

The man who receives honor is the man whose life and work are most consonant with the ideal of the country in which he lives. To be true to such an ideal means honor and renown. In no land has such honor ever been purchased by wealth. It comes along from service, self-sacrifice, and patriotic devotion to duty. In every land honor and renown are accorded to every citizen who fills his life with service, self-sacrifice, and patriotism in any walk of life, public or private, civil or martial.

No one can point out the source of the American ideal of manhood. Like our people, the source of our ideals seems to have been drawn from every part of the civilized globe. In them are to be discerned the religious teachings of all denominations, the self-sacrifice of the early founders of our Republic, who were willing to endure anything that they might enjoy freedom of conscience, and the courage and bravery of the early colonists whose bold patriotism compelled them to take up arms to fight for a place where their ideals might be worked out in human conduct.

From whatever source this well-recognized American spirit came, in these days and times it expresses itself in self-reliance, fair play, and the giving of equal opportunity. We visualize the American ideal in the self-reliant man who asks no favors but demands an opportunity as his right; in the self-sacrificing man who is willing to spend and be spent that good may prevail; and in the patriotic man who, under heaven, finds his country's demand superior and undeniable.

The American ideal demands honesty, clean living, fair dealing, equal opportunity to all, industry and devotion to her institutions, and the American citizen who is true to that ideal, who is alert, active, unrestrained, and devoted in the performance of his duty, the American people have always crowned and will always continue to crown with honor.

And as men who have lived consistently and honorably up to that ideal pass away, the hearts of the American people are proud to acknowledge their service with the highest measure of praise, and, whether or not their memorials consist of statues or other material constructions, they earn and they possess an indestructible memorial in the hearts and affections of the American people.

We are now observing a simple memorial service in appreciation of a really great man, who was more than a friend to many in this chamber who grieve with his honored father and his gracious wife and lovely daughter in their sorrow and affliction.

It is not an empty, formal service, but it is a sincere and spontaneous expression of esteem from his personal and political associates. His great soul has passed to "that bourne from which no traveler returns." We have gathered in honor of his memory because we appreciated and loved him. Weakly we say that EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., is dead—weakly, because in the friendships he established he is not dead, nor has his enduring work for the State of New York been diminished by his demise. We remember him for his wonderful powers of body, brain, and heart which he consecrated without limit to his friends and to his State. We remember him because he was an intensely human, big-brained, big-hearted man. We remember him because he fulfilled and represented the very clear and definite ideal which the American people accept as the best expression in human form of American manhood.

This ideal is beautifully and eloquently expressed in the metrical prayer of John G. Holland:

"God, give us men! A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office can not buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who love honor, men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue,
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking;
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking;
For while the rabble, with their thumb-worn creeds,
Their large professions, and their little deeds,
Mingle in selfish strife, lo! Freedom weeps,
Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justice sleeps."

The salvation and the benefits of the American Republic depend upon the fact that from time to time, in various places, exemplars of the American ideal appear to give substantial proof that our institutions and our laws are not based upon hopes that are impossible of human achievement. EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., is one such exemplar.

Useful and inspiring as were the lives of Washington and Lincoln to their own times, they have been more useful and more inspiring to the American people since.

They gave back their honors to the world,

"Their better part to heaven, and slept in peace."

For the generations which succeeded them have drawn, are still drawing, and will continue to draw useful inspiration from their works and their characters.

Doubtless history will not record the name of EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., as high on the roll of fame as the name of Washington stands, but it is true, nevertheless, that Mr. MERRITT solved greater financial problems than ever confronted our first President, and in that work for his State his rugged honesty, his spotless integrity, and his magnanimous unselfishness were as great as those of the "Father of his Country."

Nor will his name appear on the pages of American history as luminous as that of Abraham Lincoln, and yet it is a fact that in his discernment, his measure of men, his hatred of sham and hypocrisy, his faith in the American people, his courage while under attack, and in the humor which saves, he was not so unlike that martyred President.

God forbid that we should be fulsome in this service, for our deceased friend was a plain, truthtelling man, to whom such praises would have been abhorrent, but those of us who knew him best in his public life accord to him as high a place as any other statesman who ever gave his services to the State of New York.

Entering the assembly in 1902, he gave 11 years of his life to the State, and in his last year he was the speaker. During four of those years I knew him intimately, and counseled and advised with him about many topics of great importance. Without meaning to draw invidious comparisons, I want to say that he had a more comprehensive and accurate knowledge of the State's affairs than any man connected with the State government in those days. His great brain was a veritable storehouse of information, and, regardless of physical consequences, he devoted all his mental powers unselfishly and without stint to his public duty.

He came to the legislature in his mature years, in the plentitude of his physical and intellectual powers, and he immediately rose to first rank among the lawmakers of the State. It is not too much to say that in all the recent constructive legislation in this State his was a guiding, if not a controlling hand.

But in addition to these great mental powers, the possession of which has always been conceded by those who knew him, he possessed other attributes which made him a positive and beneficent force among his associates. Among these traits was his great magnanimity. Even in the heat of conflict he was generous to his opponents, caring nothing for the adventitious issues, but always looking forward to the accomplishment of his purposes with a firm reliance in their righteousness.

It was easy, too, for him to make acknowledgment of the assistance of others, and to give full credit to all to whom credit was due, notwithstanding the fact that his own prestige might not seem so great by so doing. He seemed able to forget and forgive everything except meanness and littleness of soul. But, even for such men, he almost invariably exhibited a tolerant charity.

He was never known to tear down the reputation of another that his own reputation might be thereby enchanced—a somewhat exceptional record in these days of self-constituted professional reformers.

Friendship was to him a sacred thing to be cherished and not to be lightly forfeited. I well remember an occasion when the fortunes of one of his friends, who is even now in this company, were being discussed. A bitter attack was made upon his friend, and, after listening patiently to the arraignment which was made against him, he said, with more feeling than was usual with him, "That man may be all you say he is, but I do not believe it. He is my friend. That may mean much or little to you, but it means a lot to me, and I will hear nothing further about him."

This is one instance only of the tenacity and sincerity of his friendship. In fact, I never knew him to be severe except when dealing with a fakir or a hypocrite; with his keen insight into the intricacies of human conduct, he was never deceived by them, and with remarkable swiftness he could dissect their flattering and deceitful propositions and expose insincerity in all its nakedness.

In such circumstances, his wit and humor were as keen as a rapier, and many a time have I witnessed the discomfiture and defeat of a fraud by the simple telling of a story which illustrated the point.

He was well adapted by nature and training for the very highest legislative and executive offices. I believe that circumstances prevented a proper recognition of his wonderful powers. He knew perfectly well the enmities he created by plainness of speech, which to him seemed necessary. He knew that in public life—

"Men will hate thee,
Men will love thee;
Men will flatter,
Men will slight."

but looked upon all his experiences as merely necessary, temporary incidents, and kept true to the spirit that was within him. He was willing at all times to pay the price of his popularity whenever he felt the justice of his cause.

In this brief manner I have summarized the characteristics of our deceased friend, as I saw him and understood him. He was a truly great man, worthy of all the best traditions of American manhood, entitled to full praise for the self-sacrificing and efficient service which he gave to our State. May his example be a stimulus to all of us, to prepare for that practical patriotism which gives service as well as tribute to the State!

Long may the memory of our great associate remain among us for the betterment and improvement of the American commonwealth. True to his times, and true to himself, he performed his fullest obligations both as a man and as a citizen.

"The friendly social, honest man,
Whate'er he be,
'Tis he fulfills great nature's plan,
And none but he."

The State has lost a capable servant and may well mourn for him, but the keenest loss is felt among those who personally enjoyed the honor of his friendship and the inspiration of his character.

"We shall remember him as
One who never turned his back, but march'd breast forward;
Never doubted clouds would break;
Never dream'd, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph;
Held, We fall to rise, are baffled to fight better, sleep to wake."

Selection by double quartet, "Crossing the Bar":

"Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no moaning of the bar
When I put out to sea.

But such a tide as moving seems asleep,
Too full for sound and foam,
When that which drew from out the boundless deep
Turns again home.

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark!
And may there be no sadness of farewell
When I embark;

For though from out our bourne of time and place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crossed the bar."

Speaker SWEET. Men in all walks of life may oppose one another, whether it be commercially or politically, but though opposed they may still be friends. I take pleasure in presenting to you the next speaker of the evening, the political opponent but the fast friend, Hon. Alfred E. Smith.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen: I feel very deeply honored to be permitted to speak a word at this memorial service to our late lamented friend and comrade, EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr. I met him in 1904 when I entered this chamber for the first time. He was then a prominent member on the majority side of the House. I served with him through the years until 1912, when he was elected Speaker, and in that time I developed for him as strong an affection as it is possible for one man to have for another, not of his own relationship. His many noble qualities of heart and mind endeared him to every man that sat in this chamber, and it is gratifying to see so many of them here to-night from all parts of the State to join in this gathering and to do honor to his memory.

In the memoir of his distinguished father, I read this passage from the retrospect: "Without boasting, I can truly say that in a long life which has not been free from any contests, I have never knowingly taken unfair advantage of my opponents and if I have fought hard, I have fought fairly." I thought, as I read, how forcefully this trait was impressed on the life and character of EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr. He was a strong partisan. He believed very firmly in the principles and precepts of the Republican party, but he put the good of the State first and supported any measures he believed to be in the interest of the commonweal. He was a forceful orator and drew the sword of debate with as much strength and vigor as any man that ever stood on this floor, and better than all, he left behind no sting—no bitterness.

He was a good friend. His friendship was really worth having. He helped me to success when my failure may have meant something of advantage to his party. Public life makes many fair weather friends. Many there are that shake your hand and pat your back when you are in the heyday of your power, but MERRITT'S friendship was of the kind that was more powerful when the clouds of political adversity frowned upon you.

He had a smile and a good word for everybody, from the highest to the lowest, that were connected with the busy life of the Capitol.

He loved the State that he served so faithfully. He loved to talk of its future greatness. He knew it better than any man I ever met, and was more at home in the assembly than in the larger field of activity to which he was called by an admiring constituency. He knew the legislature thoroughly—its methods, its habits of thought—and no man more jealously guarded its prerogatives. He had the most profound respect for its authority as a branch of the Government and an inflexible belief in the ultimate rectitude of its purposes.

Time there is indeed, and I could spend it in the memory of "Ed." Time and time again, he asked me to go up and stay at Potsdam, where he might show to me what he called "Our Great North Country." It shall always be to me a matter of regret that I did not see the little village until I found it plunged in mourning the day of his funeral—its business places darkened and the countryside gathered in it to pay tribute to his memory. I brought with me my eldest son, and I gave him a copy of the Red Book of 1912 and I asked him to always remember what it was that brought him on his first long journey from home.

I could talk through the night about ED. MERRITT, and all that I could say would be inadequate to express what I really thought of him. I will conclude, therefore, leaving with you this thought: "Almighty God asks nothing for nothing, and when we say to him 'Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven'—if we mean that—if it comes from the heart. He responds with a balm for every wound and a joy to balance every sorrow, and he gives to us to-night in an hour of affliction abundant consolation in that almost universal belief that Divine Providence makes all things equal and solves for the just man the mystery of death as life everlasting."

Selection by the double quartette, "Peace, Perfect Peace."

"Peace, perfect peace, in this dark world of sin?
The blood of Jesus whispers peace within.
Peace, perfect peace, by thronging duties pressed?
To do the will of Jesus, this is rest.
Peace, perfect peace, with sorrow surging round?
On Jesus' bosom naught but calm is found.
Peace, perfect peace, with loved ones far away?
In Jesus' keeping, we are safe, and they.
Peace, perfect peace, our future all unknown?
Jesus we know, and He is on the throne.
Peace, perfect peace, death shadowing us and ours?
Jesus has vanquished death and all its powers.
It is enough; earth's struggles soon shall cease,
And Jesus call us to heaven's perfect peace."

Speaker SWEET. Side by side, shoulder to shoulder, fighting the battles of State, stood EDWIN A. MERRITT, jr., and James W. Wadsworth, jr. As his closest associate and constant counselor, I present to you at this time, Hon. James W. Wadsworth, jr.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, Members of the Legislature, Ladies, and Gentlemen: The invitation to say something of the life and public services of EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., upon this occasion and in this presence touches me very deeply. It is indeed an honor which I appreciate, and I rejoice at being afforded an opportunity to testify to the high character and great achievements of that dear friend, with whom I was so intimately associated here in this Capitol.

So vivid and so deep is the impression he made during the years of that association that it seems but yesterday that he stood towering in the center aisle there, his voice reverberating through the uttermost spaces of this great chamber, welding the laws of New York. It seems but yesterday that he gathered us about him in our leisure hours and won and held our deep affection. It is difficult for us to understand that we will never again experience that inspiring and delightful human contact. And now that we long to tell the world our estimate of him, I, for one, realize that my poor words must fall far short of describing that picture of him which will reside in my mind as long as I shall live.

It can not be denied that heredity and environment are powerful factors in the formation of character and habit of mind; and in order to possess an intelligent understanding of Mr. MERRITT, we must take into consideration these elements in relation to him. His forbears were of sturdy American stock—simple, God-fearing, self-reliant, typical of the early pioneers. His father—who still lives, honored and respected by thousands of his fellow citizens in his old age—has for years been a commanding figure in northern New York. By occupation an outdoor man, who in the early days helped blaze the way through the northern wilderness, he transmitted to his son a vigor and strength of constitution remarkable even in a country renowned for its strong men, and that simplicity and directness of mental operation so characteristic of the early American. The father, true to the type, from early manhood has maintained an active and intelligent interest in public affairs. He has been a friend and confidant of leading Americans since the days of the great Civil War, has held high positions of trust and power, and has been a leader of thought and molder of opinion in that great northern country in which he has lived so long and which he loved so well.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the son whose memory we now revere drew inspiration in his early manhood from the example of his sire and found himself equipped with the same attributes of public spirit and devotion to country. Born in 1860, he attained manhood at a time when it was still possible for him to absorb a vivid conception from his father and his father's neighbors of those great principles which were fought for and vindicated in the trying days of the sixties. He absorbed readily the story of sacrifice and heroism relating to those times, and from that story he learned the great principles of human liberty upon which this Republic was founded. Through all his active life he never ceased deriving inspiration from the deeds of the generation just preceding him, and he never wavered in his admiration and reverence of the men who saved the Nation. There was no more potent influence in his life than his contact with those men. By their example he was inspired to that simple manly courage which was his predominating trait.

Graduating from Yale College at New Haven, Conn., in 1884, he joined his father at London, where the latter at that time was holding the high and responsible position of consul general of the United States. After spending a year assisting his father in that interesting and broadening atmosphere, he returned to his home in Potsdam, St. Lawrence County, and immediately embarked upon that active career to which he later gained such distinction.

Although actively engaged in business, he found time to take part in the public affairs of the community in which he lived. In fact, the stress and contention of politics and the satisfaction of public service well performed held a peculiar fascination for him, and, commencing with his election to the St. Lawrence County board of supervisors, he was continually in public life until the day of his death. His strength of mind, his clarity of vision, and his integrity soon made their impression upon the people of St. Lawrence, and in 1902 he was elected a member of assembly from the district in which he resided. From that year up to and including the legislative session of 1912 his constituents, with unwavering confidence in him as their representative, continued to send him to the State capital.

It was in this chamber the great work of his life was performed. It was in this arena that he made his name known over the length and breadth of this great State; and while he was later promoted to a wider field of activity at the National Capitol at Washington his place in history rests upon the services he rendered in the assembly.

So long was his service, so many and varied the legislative tasks which he undertook and carried to a successful completion that time will not permit upon this occasion an attempt upon my part to recite them all. With no thought of minimizing the importance of his efforts in a score of directions, it shall be my endeavor to set forth that achievement of his which colleagues considered the greatest of all and which has exercised a most profound effect upon the government of the State of New York.

It is a matter of history that the dawn of the new century was signalized by a remarkable and almost phenomenal development of the economic and industrial life of America. That period will go down in history as the one which witnessed the formation of great combinations of capital and gigantic organizations for the carrying on of industry in all its branches. The intricacies of modern civilization seem to have made this development logical and therefore inevitable. This growth, however, created evils new and unlooked for in our civic life. So powerful did these organizations become that they appeared in the minds of many to constitute a grave danger to our form of government. As they grew so did the public impression grow that unless a remedy was applied self-government would be poisoned at its source.

When MERRITT took his seat in the assembly in 1902 the first mutterings, as it were, of the storm which was to break over American politics could be heard by the discriminating ear. In later years MERRITT'S friends learned that he, almost from the day of his taking his seat in this chamber, saw the cloud upon the horizon and commenced preparing himself to take part in the solution of the mighty problem which he felt would confront the people later on. It is not necessary for me to describe in detail the rise of that great wave of public sentiment which finally brought to bear such irresistible pressure for the solution of the problem of the relations existing between the public, on one hand, and the great public service corporations, created by the public, upon the other. We know now that the demand for a remedy which was fearlessly and irresistibly made at that time had its justification in the misdeeds and abuse of power on the part of some who cynically disregarded the sensibilities and the rights of the average man.

Those of us who served in the legislative sessions of 1905–6 can never forget the tension and stress of those days when the storm reached its greatest fury. Some there were who persisted in maintaining an attitude of indifference, and declaring that it would blow over in good time. There were even some, although their number was few, who refused to admit that there was anything genuine or important in the demand of the hour. The great majority of men in public life at that time, however, realized that mighty forces were at work and that something must be done to meet the sentiment of the people—and prevent chaos.

It is true also that the great majority of men, buffeted by the contending forces and perplexed by conflicting counsel, were groping in the dark, conscious of their unpreparedness. Of all the men in the New York Legislature of those days, MERRITT seemed to have the clearest conception of the situation, and, starting almost alone in his efforts, he proceeded to lay the foundation for a great piece of constructive legislation which we believe to-day has solved the problem.

It was characteristic of MERRITT'S viewpoint toward life in general that he should believe in the power of government, and that he should contend that government should exercise its power to do a certain thing when no other agency is capable of doing that thing. For four years he had been a keen observer of the play of contending forces in and about the legislature and the State government. He weighed and analyzed the good and the bad, the useful and the useless, and when he had made up his mind to act, he knew what ought to be done and where the power resided.

His first move in the direction which he had marked out attracted little public attention, but to those who knew his purpose and his mind it was of vast significance. During the administration of Gov. Higgins MERRITT introduced a bill in the assembly providing that all the expenses incident to the support of the then existing State railroad commission should be borne by the treasury of the State instead of requiring the railroad companies to meet the expense of supervision, as was then the case. He stood almost alone in his contention. Men said, "If we are to discipline these corporations, why do we commence by relieving them of this comparatively light burden?" MERRITT'S answer was that the Government must shortly assume new powers of supervision and regulation over these corporations, and in preparation for that day the Government must free itself of any sense of obligation, however remote, toward the corporations which it proposed to regulate.

This act of Assemblyman MERRITT, while failing of success for the moment, was the planting of the seed in the legislative mind. More and more from that time men listened to his proposal and came to recognize its ultimate wisdom. Events moved quickly. The pressure was enormous. In 1905 a special committee of the legislature was appointed to investigate the distribution and the sale of illuminating gas by public-service corporations in the city of New York. The work of this committee attracted wide attention. MERRITT was one of its strongest members.

By far the most significant act resulting from this investigation was the drafting and final enactment of a bill entrusting to a State commission, known at the time as the "State Gas Commission," the function and duty of regulating the rates charged for illuminating gas and electricity by all the lighting companies of the State. The strong hand of MERRITT was readily seen in the provisions of this bill. It was his first definite proposal directed toward the solution of this great problem. Imperfect in many respects, it nevertheless amounted to a declaration on the part of the government of New York that henceforth it intended to exercise its powers.

I remember well the gratification which MERRITT derived from this acceptance of the principle which he had laid down a year before and which had met such discouragement. And I remember well the intense gratification which came to him in the following year, in 1907, when the newly elected governor of New York, Charles E. Hughes, laid such tremendous emphasis upon the necessity for a solution of this sort to be applied over a much wider field. MERRITT hastened to his support, confident that through the great influence and ability of that exceptional executive success would come, as come it did.

He was one of the responsible authors of the public-service commissions bill of 1907. He worked in collaboration with others day after day and week after week until that measure was complete. His influence can be read in every line of it. When it was enacted into law it bore his name jointly with that of Senator Page. If I may be permitted to express an opinion, this law, establishing as it did a standard of relationship between the government, representing all the people on one hand, and the railways, the street railways, the gas companies, and electric lighting companies on the other, is the greatest monument of the four years of the administration of Gov. Hughes.

MERRITT'S work did not end with this achievement. The following year the legislature appointed a special committee to investigate the feasibility of bringing the telephone and telegraph companies under the jurisdiction of the commission. MERRITT was one of the strong men on that committee and was largely instrumental in drafting the bill reported by that committee and almost immediately enacted, extending the power of the public-service commissions over the wire companies.

The student of government will admit that Mr. MERRITT, in inaugurating this great movement in 1905, assisting powerfully in its progress through 1906–1907–1908, performed a service for the State of New York of immeasurable importance and vast significance. Throughout all of that struggle, through all the varying phases of the conflict in which he took part, two of his traits of character stood out conspicuously: First, his clear courage. He never faltered; he never wavered, no matter what the obstacle. Second, his lack of vanity. He had convictions, deep-rooted and sound, but he had no false pride or conceit. He never claimed or demanded special recognition for his achievement. In fact, of all eminently successful men, men endowed with power and subject to the temptations which go with it, MERRITT was the least vain. His simplicity, directness, and his sense of humor saved him from that which has destroyed or impaired the usefulness of many a distinguished man.

In order to give some idea of the tremendous and varied work which MERRITT did in the assembly, in addition to the great achievement which I have attempted to describe, it should be noted that he was first chairman of the committee on agriculture, then chairman of the committee on general laws, chairman of the committee on railroads, chairman of the committee on ways and means, which at that time carried with it the majority leadership, and which he held for three years; minority leader in 1911, and finally speaker of the assembly in 1912.

The State will not forget the great work he did in helping to revise the highway law and inaugurating the building of improved highways through the Commonwealth. Nor will the State forget the three years of arduous service he rendered in helping to formulate the financial policy of the State as expressed in the appropriation bills. The burden he carried was enormous. Only a man of his great mental and physical strength could have stood up under it. His career in the assembly culminated in his election to the speakership.

He was permitted to hold that difficult and responsible position for but one year. The death of his long-time friend, George R. Malby, left vacant the seat in Congress held by that representative of the north country congressional district. It was inevitable that the people of that district should demand that MERRITT represent them in Washington. They did so demand and he acquiesced and accepted an election to Congress from his district.

I think it is accurate to say that he left Albany with reluctance. He felt that he was entering upon a new and strange field, although he deeply appreciated the honor and the opportunity. He was familiar with this atmosphere here in the capital where he had spent the greater part of his public life, where he had impressed himself upon the life of the State which he loved; here were his intimate friends—and their name was legion. He felt that other additional tasks awaited his efforts here; he felt that the State had not as yet solved the highway problem. He realized that the financial operations of the State were subject to vast improvement; that the question of taxation, income, and expenditure needed close study and application. He longed to address himself to this work, but his sense of duty to his people at home, his gratitude for their loyalty and friendship, compelled him to relinquish his work here and assume the duties of a national legislator.

It is a matter of record that he quickly assumed a prominent place in the House of Representatives. Although a member of the minority, his strength and wisdom were soon recognized by his colleagues, a fact which is made evident by his appointment to the great Committee on Rules of the lower House at Washington shortly after he took his seat.

He had scarcely embarked upon a career of usefulness and distinction in the National Congress when with a suddenness that is incomprehensible, he was attacked by a combination of maladies which called forth every atom of his gigantic strength and will and physique to combat. Accompanied by his faithful, loving wife, he was taken to the sanitarium at Dansville, near my own home, in Livingston County. There he waged a battle which can never be forgotten by those of us, who, from time to time, were permitted to see him. His great frame stricken and shattered to an inconceivable degree, his mighty intellect never lost its clarity, his soul never lost its courage.

For thirteen months he endured physical and mental suffering seldom demanded of a human being. Crisis after crisis was surmounted through the might of his will power. Naturally a somewhat impatient man in the ordinary walks of life, he yielded to the necessities of his fight with a confiding trust and patience which was sublime. He knew his loving family and faithful attendant were struggling bravely all through these weary months to save him, and he set himself to help them help him. The time came in the autumn of 1914 when it seemed that his efforts and those of his loved ones had been crowned with victory. With indomitable courage and implicit confidence, he started on his journey homeward. I shall never forget the day of his departure and the words he uttered on that occasion: "I have won my fight; I am going back to my people; I have work to do."

He was renominated and reelected to Congress by a constituency who had known him all his life and loved him best. The future looked bright, and then suddenly, when we were all filled with confidence that he would live to attain an even higher degree of usefulness and distinction, his malady returned in a new and unexpected form, and after a brief but heroic struggle he succumbed to the will of an all-wise Providence.

His father is left stricken and without the sustaining hand of his great son in his old age; his wife and daughter crushed with grief. Hundreds of us, his former associates, have lost a dear friend, and the realization of our loss quickens and deepens the sympathy which we extend to his devoted family in this trying hour. Our consolation must be that we men who knew him are better men and this State a better State because he lived.

Selection by the double quartette, "Beautiful Isle of Somewhere":

"Somewhere the sun is shining,
Somewhere the song birds dwell;
Hush, then, thy sad repining,
God lives, and all is well!

Somewhere, somewhere,
Beautiful Isle of Somewhere;
Land of the true, where we live anew,
Beautiful Isle of Somewhere.

Somewhere the load is lifted,
Close by an open gate;
Somewhere the clouds are rifted,
Somewhere the angels wait.

Somewhere, somewhere,
Beautiful Isle of Somewhere;
Land of the true, where we live anew,
Beautiful Isle of Somewhere."

Speaker SWEET. With the pronouncing of the benediction the services of the evening will close.

Rev. HAMILTON. The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, keep your hearts and minds in the knowledge and love of God and of His Son Jesus Christ, our Lord, and the blessing of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost be amongst you and remain with you always. Amen.

PUBLIC MEETING IN MEMORY OF HON. EDWIN A. MERRITT, JR., HELD AT VILLAGE HALL, POTSDAM, N. Y., DECEMBER 14, 1914.

An informal public meeting to pay tribute to the memory of the late Hon. EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., Representative in Congress, was held in Village Hall, Potsdam, St. Lawrence County, N. Y., on the evening of December 14, 1914. The meeting was attended by personal friends and neighbors of Congressman MERRITT. Hon. Clarence S. Ferris presided as chairman of the meeting, and Howard E. Thompson acted as secretary. Judge Ferris opened the meeting with the following remarks:

"We have come together at this time to pay fitting tribute to the memory of our deceased friend.

"For many years he had been in the public service. He had attained great influence with all with whom he was associated. His services to the State have left their impress on much important legislation, and our laws are better for his having had a part in framing them.

"At some future time I assume appropriate services will be held by the House of Representatives, which will emphasize and commemorate the value of his public service. However, these services must be to some extent different.

"While we, as his neighbors, appreciate his great service as a public servant, we think of him more as a friend and familiar figure in our midst, who has suddenly been removed by death. It is most fitting that we should meet here to-night to give expression of his worth, not only as a public official but as a friend whom we loved and whose death we mourn."

Dr. F. L. Dewey gave the following tribute of appreciation of Mr. MERRITT:

"Mr. Chairman, friends, and neighbors:

"We are gathered here to-night to express our sincere and honest sorrow over the demise of Hon. EDWIN A. MERRITT, Jr., Representative of this district in Congress. To each and every one of us his death brings a sense of personal loss. Long and serious as had been his illness, the announcement that his spirit had taken its flight and passed on over the Great Divide came as a surprise and a shock.

"To me he had always been 'Big ED. MERRITT,' tireless, undaunted, and invincible. Born in the foothills of our own Adirondacks, passing his boyhood life in Potsdam, he was a simple, plain north-country gentleman. Completing his course in our normal school, which owes its existence to the efforts of his father, he passed on to Yale University. Graduating there in due course, he supplemented his school and university training by travel abroad and efficient and successful work in the consular service.

"I first met ED. MERRITT in the fall of 1885. He impressed me then as a great big whole-souled fellow. We read law together in the offices of John G. McIntyre, and the association there formed led to a lifelong friendship. With his training and inherited tendencies it was natural that he should early turn his attention to the field of politics. His ability and fitness for public service were soon recognized, and once given an opportunity to prove his worth, his constituents never consented to his return to private life.

"ED. MERRITT was an educated and cultivated man. It will surprise many of his friends to know that during his long illness he passed many hours in reading the classics. Nothing gave him greater pleasure than to read or to recite a favorite passage to his friends who came to call upon him. Yet he spent his life largely among men and affairs. Never posing as an orator, he was never a 'victim of words nor a phrasesmith.' Never, as an editorial in the New York Sun read, was he afflicted with the 'pen and mouth disease.' He was simple and direct in thought and action; frank, truthful, and free from cowardice. Naturally, he had an unconscious courage. He was an excellent judge of men and measures, and never had I known a man in this State who, in the halls of legislation or in the marts of trade, won a larger or more loyal following. The attendance at his funeral bore silent testimony to this.

"Strenuous at times as were his political contests they never left bitterness or revengeful feelings with him. He was always charitable to all, and many a poor soldier or a bereft widow to-day will miss the efforts which ED. MERRITT was wont to put forth in their behalf. Not always understood or appreciated by his own townsmen, among all the multitudes who knew him in boyhood and in manhood, in private and in public life, not one can recall a mean, vindictive, or deceitful word. Sincere in his beliefs, faithful to his convictions, steadfast in his friendships, he was loyal to every cause he espoused. His life has made many men happier, his example will make many better, and his service to his constituency and to this State will endure so long as our north country shall last."

Hon. Edward A. Everett, being called upon by the Chair, responded as follows:

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, putting our thoughts in language that will properly express our feelings toward a departed friend is indeed a hard task. I first became acquainted with ED. MERRITT about 35 years ago, from an accidental meeting while enjoying an outing in the woods on Raquette River, and our relationship ripened into a friendship that was mutually enjoyed. He was of the type of manhood that brightened with use and there was always something that linked us closer together after each meeting. We were interested in the business affairs of each other, not as actual business partners, but from a true feeling of a desire to help each other. It has been truly said that character is not made in a day; neither is it possible for one to become acquainted with character that is worth while in a short period of time. The individuals who stand out in prominence the world over are the ones whose honesty and simplicity first attract you and whose gigantic ability to perform the tasks afterwards impresses you. Words of praise can be used in the description of anybody who has ceased to exist, but truthful words describing a character that had to do with all of the different phases of human nature and came through without a scar is indeed the exception. This, however, I can truthfully say concerning our departed friend and fellow townsman, 'ED. MERRITT.' His ambition may have mapped out a task that his early departure left uncompleted, but the honesty of purpose in every day's transaction is well defined in the course of his everyday life, and I sincerely offer him the following tribute:

"Here is to ED. MERRITT, born in this world of trouble and care; dies, and he goes, he knows not where, but he was a thoroughbred here and he will be a thoroughbred there."

Mr. Harry M. Ingram made the following remarks:

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is difficult for me to talk upon this occasion. I can not properly give expression to my feelings. I must be content with stating some personal facts. Had Congressman MERRITT lived until the 1st day of January next I would have been associated with him as his partner in the practice of law for six years. Except for the fact that Mr. MERRITT, then a member of the assembly, had asked me to come to Potsdam and form a law partnership, I would probably be practicing in another part of the State at this time. He wanted to maintain a law office. He told me it was a desire which he had long entertained, and in the expectation of its fulfillment he had kept together the old Dart & Erwin and the Tappan law libraries. I went to Potsdam and looked over the library and met some of the people of the village. Finally I made up my mind to locate here, and I did so. Our law firm dated from January 1, 1909. During the years we were together I learned to know Mr. MERRITT as I had never known him before. I came to realize more than ever his great broadness of mind, the vastness of his intellect, and above all, perhaps, the extraordinary kindliness and warmth of his most unusual personality. I shall always prize the recollections of my friendship with him. I feel that under the circumstances I can never regret that I came to Potsdam as I did.

"It was perhaps my fortune to have seen Mr. MERRITT in the performance of his duties at Albany more than any other person here to-night. I know the great subjects and works of importance to the people of the State with which he labored during the years, and particularly the latter years of his service in the assembly. He was regarded as the leader not only of the assembly, but, by many, the leader of the legislature. Often I have felt that the people of his home county did not at all appreciate the prominence of their representative in the legislature. I had this same feeling regarding the late Senator Malby. Malby and MERRITT were indeed a strong and powerful combination of representatives for any county to have in the State legislature at the same time. No wonder the county of St. Lawrence became so widely known in political and State affairs. These men had an unusual State-wide acquaintance. Their suggestions, advice, and counsel were sought and heeded.

"When Congressman Malby passed suddenly away, St. Lawrence County and the whole north country felt keenly its great loss, but was comforted in a measure in the thought that Mr. MERRITT remained. In the death of Mr. MERRITT, so soon after, we will feel more than ever the loss of Mr. Malby, and now that both are gone we have indeed much reason to mourn. It requires years of time for a county to prepare for public life two such men as these, strong men, influential legislators, representative citizens.

"Mr. MERRITT made a wonderful fight for life. He wanted so much to enter upon the public service again. His plans were all made for the future. We can rejoice in the fact that such a man, stricken down largely because of overwork in the service of the people, was permitted to end his days still in the service. His vast plurality at the November election and the great tribute rendered him at his funeral are worthy testimonials of the general and sincere esteem in which Congressman MERRITT was held by the voters of his congressional district and his associates in public life."

Mr. John L. Brown spoke as follows:

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I knew Mr. MERRITT very well and counted him one of my best friends. During his stay in Albany I had occasion to write him several times. Some of my letters were on matters that seemed to me quite small, and I am sure must have seemed to him very small and trivial, but I always received a prompt reply. Several of these replies I prized very highly, as they were not cold, expressionless, typewritten letters, dictated by "E. A. M.," but were personal pen written letters that make one feel that in the writer he had a friend worth while.

"In the passing of Mr. MERRITT I know I have lost, and I believe we all have lost, a big-hearted, loyal, personal friend."

Mr. Sylvester Nicolette spoke as follows:

"Mr. Chairman, I met Mr. MERRITT and began to work for him many years ago. He was always my good friend. I had many business dealings with him, and my contracts were for many thousand dollars in labor and construction work. Always I found him fair in settlement and in adjusting any questions which might arise. I can say the same also of Mr. Tappan, who was his partner in the work at Hannawa Falls. We never had any difficulties about our work. It was a great pleasure to work for such men as these. They always treated me squarely and paid me every cent owing to me for all the work I did for them. From my dealings with Mr. MERRITT I can say of him that he was the most honest man I ever knew."

Remarks were also made by Mr. John Pert, president of the village of Potsdam, Mr. F. L. Cubley, Dr. F. T. Swan, Mr. C. E. Haywood, and Mr. E. M. Perkins.

Mr. ROOT. Let it be reported.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 234) authorizing the President of the United States to convey to all neutral nations the desire of the Government for an international conference for the purpose of promoting by cooperation and through its friendly offices the early cessation of hostilities and the establishment of peace among the warring nations of Europe, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the most powerful nations of Europe have been engaged for over half a year in a terrible war of cumulative intensity and increasing destruction of human life; and

Whereas recent inventions have revolutionized methods of warfare giving rise to unprecedented situations and conditions; and

Whereas the ever-widening field of hostile operations in the war zone encroaches more and more day by day upon the common highways of commerce, inviting to complications which may at any moment entangle one or more of the neutral nations in situations of the gravest peril; and

Whereas it becomes of the utmost importance that at the earliest moment a conference of the neutral nations should be called to consider the rights of neutrals under existing conditions, to work out a policy for the preservation of their own peace, and to tender their best offices of mediation to the belligerent nations; and

Whereas we, the people of the United States, are bound to each of the warring nations by ties of blood and country, compelling in us a profound interest in the cessation of hostilities and the restoration of peace, and by inheritance are best fitted to make initial appeal to each nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be authorized to convey to all neutral nations the desire of this Government that an international conference be held for the purpose of promoting by cooperation and through its friendly offices:

First. The early cessation of hostilities and the establishment of peace among the warring nations of Europe;

Second. The consideration of uniform rules and regulations for the general limitation of armaments and the nationalization of the manufacture of all equipment and supplies used exclusively for military and naval purposes;

Third. The consideration of rules and regulations for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, artillery, vessels of war, armor plate, torpedoes, or any other thing designed to be used exclusively for military and naval purposes from one country to another;

Fourth. The ultimate establishment of an international tribunal where any nation may be heard on any issue involving rights vital to its peace and the development of its national life, a tribunal whose decrees shall be enforced by the enlightened judgment of the world;

Fifth. The consideration of plans for the federation of the neutral nations in the adoption of rules and regulations which will provide for the neutralization of certain waters and maritime trade routes, and such other and further action as shall insure, if possible, the peaceful maintenance and preservation of the sovereign rights of neutral commerce against dangers to which it is exposed through the extraordinary conditions developed by the world's greatest war; and Sixth. For such other and further action as may tend, however remotely, to establish permanent world peace.

Resolved further, That the President be authorized to appoint commissioners to represent the United States at any such conference whether called by the United States or any other nation.

SEC. 2. That in case such international peace conference shall be called by the United States or any other nation the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the expenses of the representatives of the United States at said conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not catch the request of the Senator from Wisconsin. Is it for the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; just that I might have permission to introduce it. I ask that it may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield for that purpose, but I can not yield any further. I must go on with my speech after this report is presented. I wish to be courteous to my colleagues, but I should like to go on with my speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be received. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19906) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 967) thereon.

H. R. 20933. An act extending the time for completion of the bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., authorized by an act entitled "An act to authorize the Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn.," approved August 23, 1912.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I shall discuss the pending ship-purchase bill from a business viewpoint and explain reasons for supporting it.

In order that we may have a clearer understanding of the present condition of our foreign shipping and the various causes that contributed to its decline, I shall review briefly the history of our merchant marine.

HISTORY OF AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

The early colonists of the United States were peculiarly fitted for the calling of the sea. Of English and Dutch extraction, they had in their veins the tang of the sea, and they or their immediate forefathers had braved the unknown perils of the trackless Atlantic to find a home in the New World.

They inhabited a mere fringe of the coast; to the east was the broad ocean, while to the west lay a vast wilderness swarming with savage tribes of Indians. Roads between the Colonies were few and poor, and possibly menaced by roving Indians; timber suitable for shipbuilding—pine and oak—grew in almost inexhaustible supply, while the virgin forests of the South yielded tar, pitch, and turpentine. All these things served to make the ocean the natural means of communication between the Colonies and the great highway of commerce. From intercolonial trade it was but a step to foreign commerce, and soon American vessels, braving the terrors of uncharted coasts, fierce hurricanes, and ferocious pirates, were to be found in the harbors of the West Indies. Commerce between England and the New World developed, and no port was too distant to be the destination of these daring traders. The expansion of the shipping industry is shown by the fact that in 1769 the colonists built 389 ships, aggregating 20,000 tons. Edmund Burke, in his famous speech on conciliation with America, stated that in 1772 the export trade to the American Colonies amounted to more than one-third of England's entire commerce.

But not alone for peaceful pursuits were these vessels useful. When the Revolutionary War broke out and the newborn Nation locked with its mother country in mortal combat American merchantmen became American privateersmen. It is unnecessary for me to recite their exploits or sing their praises. Their names are emblazoned in immortal characters on the manuscript of our Nation's history, and we, their children, are heirs to the fruit of their labors, a free and independent Republic. Suffice it to say that while the Continental Government had but 30 cruisers, 449 privateers swarmed the sea, capturing or destroying in two years 733 British vessels, and conveying envoys and dispatches, and carrying arms and ammunition, gold, and provisions to the struggling Colonies.

At last peace was declared and the star of the United States shone in the firmament of nations.

It has been said that the years from 1783 to 1789 were the most trying time of the Republic, and this is no less true in regard to our merchant marine.

By hostile legislation, encouragement of the attacks of the Barbary pirates, and every other possible means England endeavored to crush our commerce. Benjamin Franklin wrote that the London merchants declared "if there were no Algiers it would be worth England's while to build one." So heavy were the blows that fell upon our shipping that national encouragement became imperative, and in 1789 almost the first enactment of the new Congress was a law giving a 10 per cent preferential tariff to imports in American built and owned vessels, placing a heavy tax on tea imported in foreign bottoms, and imposing lower tonnage charges on American vessels.

The result was immediate, and our foreign commerce leaped from 123,893 tons in 1789 to 576,733 tons in 1796, an increase of 460 per cent in seven years. In that year 94 per cent of our imports and 90 per cent of our exports were carried in American vessels.

From 1793 on England and France were almost continually at each other's throats. The meteoric rise of Napoleon, the marvelous triumph of French arms upon the Continent, the fierce and sanguinary naval conflicts, and the consequent total abandonment of peaceful trading on the part of France, and the greatly diminished and harassed commerce of Great Britain, beset as were the trade routes by French privateers, opened up to American enterprise golden opportunities. The commerce of the world lay in our grasp. Of ships we had plenty, and vast fleets of American merchantmen sped to every part of the globe, carrying on the sugar trade with Cuba, importing ingots, coffee, hides, and indigo from South America, trading with the farthermost parts of the Orient, and in a word exchanging the produce of the New World and the costly fabrics of the Far East for the manufactured products of Europe. "In two years," says McMaster in his History of the American People, "almost the whole carrying trade of Europe was in their hands."

But England saw our success with envious eyes and regarded our rapidly growing shipping with a fierce hatred. We were threatening her commercial supremacy and giving indirect aid to her enemies. American commerce had to be crushed at all hazards, and drastic measures were taken toward this end. Everything was placed on the contraband list and England endeavored to blockade most of the civilized world to our vessels. Our ships and their cargoes were seized upon the slightest pretext. Napoleon retaliated in like manner, declaring every vessel which touched at any port of Great Britain to be a belligerent. England being short of men impressed into her service some 7,000 American seamen and threw every possible impediment in the way of neutral trading. The situation was graphically summed up by Thomas Jefferson in his message to Congress, advocating the famous embargo act of 1807, in which he said:

> The whole world is thus laid under interdict by these two nations—England and France—and our vessels, their cargoes, and crews are to be taken by one or the other for whatever place they may be destined out of our limits.

History records the complete failure of the embargo act, which absolutely prohibited the departure from the United States of any of our merchant vessels bound for foreign ports, and this, combined with the continued aggressions of England and France, dealt a severe blow to our foreign trade.

In 1810 we had 984,264 tons, which shrank in 1811 to 768,854. The tonnage of 1810 was not again equaled until 1847—37 years later.

A GRAPHIC PARALLEL—1800 AND 1915.

Let me digress for a moment to draw a parallel. Trade conditions existing in the beginning of the nineteenth century were almost identical with those of the present day. If we put Germany and Austria in the place of France and the allies in the place of Great Britain, the parallel is almost perfect. The supremacy of the allies upon the ocean has destroyed the vast trade of Germany, and the exigencies of this terrible war have, in a great measure, paralyzed the commerce of England and France. If we had ships, a rich harvest would be ours. A little more than a hundred years ago our forefathers took advantage of the opportunities that came to them, though the hostile legislation and unjust oppressions of England and France prevented them from reaping full benefit.

We, with equal opportunities, without a foreign merchant marine, are bound hand and foot. Not alone are we unable to send the Stars and Stripes to those ports where only the flags of England and Germany formerly flew, but the partial paralysis of our own foreign trade, due to the withdrawal of foreign vessels, has choked the great arteries of commerce and inflicted heavy loss and suffering upon all the people of the United States.

A little more than a century ago we had ships, but were too weak to protect them; now we have the power to protect, but lack the ships.

The War of 1812 again afforded opportunities for American seamen and vessels to show their worth, and during that conflict our 517 privateers captured British ships valued at $39,000,000. Indeed, without exaggeration, it can be said that our converted merchant marine bore the brunt of the naval war.

After peace was declared by the treaty of Ghent, the United States and Great Britain entered into a so-called commercial reciprocity convention, which bound them to impose no discriminating duties on ships or products in direct trade between this country and the United Kingdom. In accordance with this treaty, in 1815 Congress passed a law repealing the discriminatory duties on British vessels, and also enacted a general measure offering to withdraw all discriminating duties in favor of any nation which did the same thing. Of course this only referred to direct trade between the countries.

England, however, had reserved the right to regulate trade with her Canadian and West Indies colonies, and the ink with which the treaty was signed was scarcely dry when she absolutely prohibited any American vessels from trading with the West Indies. This put out of commission an American fleet of 80,000 tons burden.

Provoked by this and various other acts, Congress passed a law in March, 1817, forbidding the importation of goods from any foreign country except in American vessels or vessels of the country from which the goods came, with an all-important proviso, however, that the provisions of this act should not apply to those countries which did not impose similar prohibitions against us.

The act of 1815, as has been said, applied only to direct trade between this and other countries; that is, we bound ourselves not to discriminate in regard to British vessels dealing between England and the United States or French vessels plying between France and the United States, and so forth. By the reciprocity act of May 24, 1828, however, we offered to open the indirect trade on the same nondiscriminatory terms to the vessels of all foreign nations that would open their indirect trade to us. This would allow, for example, British vessels to ply between Russia, France, or South America, and so forth. and the United States, if Great Britain would permit our vessels to trade between these countries and the United Kingdom.

Under the terms of these acts we have since entered into 30 or 40 commercial reciprocity treaties with all maritime nations. These treaties forbid us to impose discriminating duties on foreign vessels or their cargoes or to grant preferential tariff rates to goods carried in American vessels. Nor, can we discriminate in the matter of port charges. This makes it impossible, without the repeal of all these treaties, for us to foster American foreign commerce by the means which we used in the first days of the Republic.

These were the golden days of American shipping. In 1847 our foreign marine totaled 1,047,454 tons, the highest figure attained till then. Our ships were to be found in every sea, battling the icy blasts of the Arctic Zone and traversing the furnace heat of the Indian Ocean. Swift-sailing packet lines, the forerunners of our great trans-Atlantic steamships, were established between England and America. Our American sailing ships and seamen were at the top notch of efficiency, but their very confidence, in a great measure, proved their undoing.

THE ADVENT OF STEAM.

Though steamboats had been invented many years previous, it was not until 1840 that any real attempt was made to establish steamship lines in transocean service.

At that time England had a highly developed iron, steel, and coal industry which gave her an initial advantage in the building of boilers and steam engines. In 1839 the British Government subsidized a trans-Atlantic steamship line, established by Samuel Cunard, to the extent of $425,000 per year, and one year later four steamships, the beginning of the great Cunard Line, began to make regular voyages on the broad bosom of the Atlantic in competition with our sailing lines. This annual subsidy was later increased to $850,000, for without Government aid it would have been practically impossible for private enterprise to initiate the experiment.

In the contest between sail and steam the latter was sure to win, but such was the confidence of American shipowners in their vessels that four years after the introduction of steam into transocean service a new sailing packet line was established between Boston and Liverpool. The contest was fierce and protracted, but unequal, and the result inevitable. The sailing lines operated until the opening of the Civil War, 20 years later, but the British lines captured a large proportion of the ocean trade. Quick to see her advantage, England subsidized the Peninsular Co., now the wealthy Peninsular & Oriental Line to the Far East, which encroached upon the business of Yankee East Indiamen. She also gave a liberal subsidy to the Pacific Steam Navigation Co., which traded on the west coast of South America.

It is true that American shipowners could build steamships just as well, though not as cheaply, as the British, but without Government aid they could not operate them successfully in opposition to the heavily subsidized lines of England. In 1845 Congress granted liberal mail subsidies to American steamship lines, and immediately American steamships sprang into being. Transocean lines were operated in active competition with British vessels; indeed, so rapid was our growth that in 11 years we drew close to the lead which our English rivals had secured in steam navigation.

In 1849 the discovery of gold in California created a tremendous demand for transportation facilities, and as cargo space in steamships was very expensive our sailing industry was given another lease of life for a half score of years. The famous clipper vessel was built to meet the emergency, and had regular routes between New York or Boston and San Francisco, though when opportunity offered they made trans-Atlantic trips. Subsidies, however, were never popular with the people of the United States, and a widely voiced outcry was made against them.

In 1856 the heavy hand of disaster fell swiftly upon the Collins Line, the largest of our trans-Atlantic carriers. Two of their four stately steamships were lost at sea, and in the same year Congress cut the subsidy in two. In 1858, in obedience to an almost universal demand, Congress altogether abolished subsidies, and this, combined with the outbreak of the Civil War, swept the flag of the United States completely from the steam routes of the North Atlantic. Our West India and Pacific mail lines, though handicapped, were not destroyed by this change in our laws. Just at this time, in 1861, England expended $4,537,223 per annum and France $2,860,000 in subsidies.

From 1847 to 1861 our foreign merchant marine had more than doubled, for in the latter year our vessels in foreign commerce aggregated 2,496,894 tons. In 1846 we carried 81 per cent of the exports and imports of the United States, while in 1861 the figures had shrunk to 65 per cent.

CIVIL WAR CRUSHES OUR MERCHANT MARINE.

But while heavy foreign subsidizing had worked disastrously to many of our new steamship lines, the main cause of the decline of our merchant marine was the havoc wrought by Confederate cruisers during the Civil War. The Florida, the Shenandoah, the Georgia, and, above all, the Alabama, under Admiral Raphael Semmes, scoured the seas and destroyed or captured hundreds of northern vessels. About 110,000 tons of shipping were destroyed by Confederate cruisers, but that represents only a small proportion of the loss they actually caused. Owing to their depredations rates of insurance rose to an exorbitant figure, merchants refused to ships their goods in American vessels, and noble merchantmen were laid up in the docks to rot or were sold outright at a heavy sacrifice to foreign traders.

On page 200 of the Report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1914 we find that from June 30, 1861, to June 30, 1865, a period of four years, 774,652 tons of American shipping were sold to foreigners—a truly colossal tonnage, more than seven times as much as was actually destroyed by Confederate cruisers.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator give us the number of vessels that were thus sold during that period?

Mr. RANSDELL. I have not the number of vessels that were sold; but the tonnage, as reported by the Commissioner of Navigation, was 774,652. The vessels actually destroyed amounted to a fraction over 110,000 tons; so, you see, the tonnage of those sold was more than seven times as great as that of those actually destroyed.

In addition to this, the North converted many of the merchant vessels into warships, and used them to blockade southern ports. Others, again, were made to serve as transports for troops, guns, ammunition, and provisions, proving invaluable naval auxiliaries. By means of these vessels, Gen. Burnside's expedition was conveyed to the North Carolina sounds, and Gen. Butler's force was sent to New Orleans. This mobility by sea gave the Union Army a great advantage over the Confederates, and should be an object lesson for us in the future. A merchant marine that can be converted into naval auxiliaries is an indispensable adjunct in time of war. But in another way did the American marine prove its usefulness. Many thousands of trained seamen were transferred to United States battleships, and thus the United States had a seasoned body of sailors upon which to draw.

All these things combined caused our deep-sea shipping to drop from 2,496,894 tons in 1861 to 1,387,756 tons in 1866, a decrease of 1,109,000 in five years. In this year we carried only 32 per cent of our imports and exports, instead of 66 per cent, as in 1861. The ships of foreign competitors naturally were also filling the vacancies caused by the withdrawal of our vessels, and the American flag almost completely disappeared from the trading routes, where once it was so well known.

SWIFT DECLINE AFTER CIVIL WAR.

After the war the people of the whole country were to a great extent impoverished by the drains of this terrible internecine conflict, and their resources were strained to the limit to repair the internal ravages it had caused. Little capital was available, therefore, to engage in foreign shipping.

Ships were now beginning generally to be constructed of iron, and British shipyards, owing to the lower cost of labor and their more highly developed iron and steel industry, could build them cheaper than American yards.

Our navigation laws prohibited the introduction of foreign-built ships into our merchant marine, and this and other provisions of these laws were a serious handicap to the American shipowner.

Another cause of paramount importance in the seventies, and even at the present day, was the fact that the wonderful internal growth of our country, the opening up of the great West, and the unparalleled opportunities for paying investments on land rendered private capital unwilling to go into the shipping business. No longer was the United States a mere strip of land on the coast; our territory stretched from ocean to ocean, and industries and enterprises unconnected with the sea occupied the attention of a great majority of our people.

From this time until 1890 there is nothing to record save a steady shrinking of our deep-sea shipping. In 1866 we had 1,387,756 tons of shipping, and in 1890 only 928,062 tons. In the former year we carried 32 per cent of our imports and exports, and in the latter only 12 per cent.

In 1891 Congress enacted a measure known as the postal-aid law, which granted a mail subsidy to certain steam vessels of the United States. While this measure worked some good, it was only by a strange combination of circumstances that it helped to establish a line of steamers operated by the International Navigation Co. and running between New York and Southampton. This company now has four ships, the New York, the Philadelphia, the St. Louis, and the St. Paul, and is the only regular American trans-Atlantic line operating in the North Atlantic.

When the War with Spain broke out 12 steamships from our merchant marine, including the 4 in trans-Atlantic service, were chartered or purchased by the United States, guns were placed upon them, and they became part of the fighting Navy of this country as commerce destroyers.

In order to transport our troops to Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, the United States was forced to purchase or charter more than 50 merchant steamers, of which about half were foreign vessels. If in a brief conflict with a third-class power the United States found it impossible to secure sufficient suitable American vessels for use as naval auxiliaries, transports, and so forth, it is evident that our facilities would be entirely inadequate and we would be under a very heavy handicap in the event of our being involved in a war with a first-class power.

From 1890 to 1914 our foreign merchant marine has increased about 142,000 tons, and in June of last year we had a shipping of 1,066,288 tons. In 1890, however, we carried 12 per cent of our imports and exports, and in 1914 we carried only 8.6 per cent, with one exception the lowest in our history.

Let me make one more comparison. In 1861 our combined imports and exports amounted to $584,995,000, of which 65 per cent was carried by our foreign merchant marine of 2,496,894 tons. In 1914 our combined imports and exports totaled the colossal sum of $4,258,504,000, of which only 8.6 per cent was transported in our deep-sea shipping of 1,066,288 tons. Since June, 1914, we have added to our foreign marine 62 vessels from our coastwise trade, aggregating 136,146 tons, and 123 vessels built abroad and recently admitted to American registry, aggregating 455,000 tons; since June, 1914, according to the Commissioner of Navigation, there have been built in the United States and registered in our foreign merchant marine, 578 vessels aggregating 123,004 tons, or a total addition since June last of 714,150 tons. This gives us a total foreign merchant marine of about 1,780,150 tons at the present time.

I have endeavored to trace the general outlines of the history of our foreign merchant marine. I have shown its wonderful vigorous growth, and its equally swift and disastrous decline. Some of the causes of these great changes have been set down, and I have reached the conclusion that is forced upon every man who carefully investigates the subject with an open mind, namely, that it is absolutely imperative that something should be done, and that promptly, to rehabilitate our waning foreign merchant marine. No longer can we remain idle and inactive while our deep-sea shipping, once the pride and glory of the American Nation, disappears from the ocean.

REPUBLICANS ARE RESPONSIBLE.

Upon whose shoulders has the blame, in great measure, rested until now? From the close of the Civil War until 1912—a period of 46 years—the Republicans held the reins of government 38 years and the Democrats 8. During all this time comparatively nothing was done to give genuine aid to our merchant marine. The short periods of Democratic control were necessarily occupied with the enactment of needed legislation in accordance with Democratic principles, and even if the Democrats are to be blamed to some extent for their inaction, it can not be denied that the great weight of the responsibility rests upon the Republicans.

Nothing they can say or do can exonerate them. But, worse than this, now that a measure has been introduced, which offers the first practical definite proposition in many years in line with a constructive deep-sea shipping policy, they have banded themselves together to obstruct its passage by means of an infamous filibuster, and have offered nothing in lieu thereof.

I see the Republican Senators smile, and I hope they will continue to smile until they offer something better in lieu thereof.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did I understand the Senator to say that it was an "infamous" filibuster?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; I think it is, under the circumstances.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is running pretty close to the rule, which does not admit of language of that kind.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not wish to give any offense to the Senator, and if that language does offend him I will withdraw it and put in the RECORD a milder term.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, Mr. President, it is a mere matter of taste; that is all.

AN INDEFENSIBLE REPUBLICAN FILIBUSTER.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, for days and days the Republicans have erupted in denunciation of this bill. They have launched their verbal thunderbolts, and the forked lightning of their eloquence has played over our heads; like a swollen stream the torrent of their frenzied oratory has rushed on, bearing upon its turgid bosom a thousand things, both connected and unconnected with the question of the upbuilding of our merchant marine. They have viciously attacked the bill from every point of view; they have thrown up their hands in holy horror at the thought of the Government, even to relieve the crisis caused by an almost world-wide war, entering temporarily upon the shipping business; and they have drawn heavily upon their almost limitless vocabulary to execrate the so-called iniquities of the measure, and then, assuming the guise of prophets, they have permitted their imaginations to take flight in the wildest realms of fancy and have predicted all manner and kind of evils that would befall the country as a necessary consequence of the enactment of the pending shipping bill. But, Mr. President and Senators, mark you, their efforts have been purely destructive, and nothing of a constructive character has been proposed. For 38 long years the Republican majority has sat here in the Halls of Congress and watched our once powerful foreign merchant marine shrink and shrivel, and though they forced through the House and Senate under whip and spur their own pet legislation on a variety of subjects, they did practically nothing to give renewed life and vitality to our deep-sea shipping. They have never built it up, and now they strive to prevent the Democrats from doing so.

I wish to call attention to the fact that in spite of their caustic criticism they have not proposed anything in lieu of the pending bill. If the Republicans are sincere in their opposition as statesmen and constructionists and not destructionists, they should propose a substitute measure. But they have done nothing of the kind. No adequate plan to upbuild our merchant marine has been suggested by them. They are eager only to destroy.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. JONES. Has the Senator overlooked the fact that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and also the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] have each offered a substitute, a whole substitute, for this bill?

Mr. RANSDELL. I have not overlooked that fact, but I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if his party is seriously supporting those two measures?

Mr. JONES. I think the Senator will find that the vote on this side will be pretty solidly behind those propositions, if they ever come to a vote.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator please state which one of them he will support?

Mr. JONES. I shall probably support both.

Mr. RANSDELL. Can the Senator support both, I ask him?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. Why is it, may I ask, that your party did not attempt for 38 years to do something and it is not until the Democrats attempt to pass a measure that you find something you can support?

Mr. JONES. The Republicans have been supporting measures during the last 15 or 20 years, but our Democratic friends were voting solidly against them and proposing nothing in return.

Mr. GALLINGER. And filibustering against them.

Mr. JONES. This is not the first time a filibuster has been used on a shipping bill, either. Not only is there a filibuster at this time on the shipping bill by the other side, but they have done it heretofore. I am rather surprised that the Senator from Louisiana, after his fulminations against filibustering, should be apparently filibustering on the proposition now before the Senate to recommit. Whether he is supporting the motion to recommit or not, he is taking the time of the Senate.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator from Louisiana is not filibustering, and you can get all the voting you want before the day is over.

Mr. JONES. Possibly we can reach a vote before the day is over, but it may be that we shall not.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I wish to ask, if the Senators are so sincere on the other side, when during the past 30 years, except in the past two years, they have been almost uninterruptedly the dominant party, why in the name of God they have not formulated and perfected something like a shipping marine measure?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I will yield in a moment. I was going to ask the Senator from Washington, if his party seriously is in favor of either the measure introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] or that introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], why it has not prepared and offered it as a substitute and given support to it as a party? Why has it not been presented to the country as a measure that the Republican Party is supporting? The country knows what the Democratic Party is supporting, and we are entitled to have a Republican substitute, if there be one, and not a measure presented by individual Senators. If the party is behind it, let it say so and present it so that the country may see exactly what it is presenting and just where it stands. I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Washington which of the coming substitutes we are to understand receives the approval of the Republican side of the Chamber, the one offered January 9, 1915, or the one offered February 2, 1915?

Mr. JONES. I will say, Mr. President, the chances are that if we get an opportunity to vote on either one of them either of them will probably have almost the unanimous support of this side of the Chamber.

Mr. WALSH. I am glad to hear that. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Washington if he will be able to tell us before the debate closes what the difference in principle is between the substitute of February 2, 1915, and the pending bill?

Mr. JONES. When I have an opportunity to do that I shall certainly take the time, and be very glad to do it.

Mr. WALSH. I shall listen to the Senator with great interest, because I have read it carefully and I am unable to distinguish the difference in principle from the bill now pending.

Mr. JONES. I am very glad to know that we are likely to get some recruits from the other side for this substitute.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CUMMINS. Inasmuch as the substitute which I have offered has been under discussion for the last few moments, I desire to say that so far as I am concerned no bill of mine will ever be offered to any caucus. I do not believe in caucuses upon legislation. I never attended one in my life, nor would I be bound by one. Therefore if I offer a measure which commends itself to a majority of the Senators I am very glad of it, but I think my disinclination, where the other Republican Senators would consider a legislative proposal and agree upon it and be bound by a majority whc may attend the conference, is the reason why my substitute is not presented as the declaration of a party caucus or conference.

I desire to say further that nearly five years ago I offered substantially the same proposal to the Senate, and if at that time the Democrats in the Senate had been willing to vote for it it would have passed the Senate. It did not satisfy a number of my Republican associates. I am very glad that in the progress of time there has been some change of opinion, so that at this time it is likely to be supported by substantially all my party colleagues and I sincerely hope by a great number upon the other side, because there is nothing in this question that has aught to do with a party organization or a partisan problem.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I will yield in a moment. I am glad to see that the Senator from Iowa is so earnestly in favor of legislating to upbuild our American merchant marine. I believe he has always been in favor of it, and I give him credit for his action not only in that particular but in many others during his career in the Senate. But he has just stated that his party associates would not help him in that measure of his and therefore it failed. They were in the majority and they could have passed it if they had wanted to do so. If that was not satisfactory to them, they knew full well that the American merchant marine had shrunk until it amounted to practically nothing, and it was their duty as the party in power in both Houses of Congress and with a President in the White House to legislate on this most important measure for the welfare of the country, and they failed to do it.

Now, I want to ask the Senator if he objects to caucuses, as he is pleased to call them, does he deny the truth of the old saying that in "unity of counsel there is much wisdom"; and if he does not refuse to go into a conference with his fellow Republicans on a great business question like this why have they not conferred, and if they have conferred is it a fact that they have agreed to support his measure?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do believe in counsel. I think there is nothing more helpful than a conference among men who may be supposed to have a common object in view. I say that I do not think there is great wisdom in that sort of procedure, but I am unalterably opposed to such a conference in a form that will bind the judgment or the conscience or the action of anybody. That is the difference between a conference in order to secure the views of those who may enter it and a conference or a caucus which ends with a binding obligation that, no matter what one may believe with regard to the measure, he must vote for it or be subjected to criticism such as we heard so volubly and so emphatically and so disagreeably uttered the other day.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I am sorry to see that the Senator does not answer my question. I do not want to force him to say whether there has been a conference on his measure or not, but I should like him, if he can with due propriety, tell us whether or not his side of the Chamber has conferred on his measure; and if so, whether they intend to present it as a substitute for this bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Louisiana wants a definite and specific answer, I will say there has been no conference; but I am interested in the subject. I am firmly persuaded of the wisdom of the substitute that I have offered, and I have taken occasion, therefore, to consult the greater number of my party associates, and in that way I have gathered their views with regard to the substitute.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, without carrying it further, the Senator and his friends seem to have conferred enough to be a unit against this bill.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], who wished to interrupt me.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Louisiana discussed the question which I intended to advert to.

Mr. RANSDELL. All right.

Mr. President, to resume. Not content with setting forth their reasons for opposing the shipping bill, if they honestly oppose it, they resort to preventive tactics that can not fail to merit the condemnation of all right-thinking men.

VARIOUS REMEDIES PROPOSED.

Various methods of rehabilitating our foreign merchant marine have been suggested, and I shall examine them briefly.

First. Subsidies: The Democratic Party is on record as being unalterably opposed to subsidies. Its principle is "equal rights to all and special privileges to none," and the Democratic platform of 1912 says explicitly:

> We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

This is in strict accord with Democratic doctrine and practice, and therefore subsidies need no longer be discussed. Even the Republicans during their 38 years of power since the Civil War either could not or would not pass a ship-subsidy bill.

I wish to say in passing, Mr. President, if they failed to pass anything else they wanted to pass, I never heard of it.

Public sentiment generally is opposed to and would not stand for subsidies.

Second. Discriminating tariff rates and tonnage charges: As I have already stated, under the acts of 1815, 1817, and 1828 we have entered into commercial treaties with all maritime nations under the terms of which we can not discriminate in favor of American vessels. The last Democratic tariff bill of 1913 contained a provision for discriminatory duties, but the Attorney General held that this provision violated our treaty obligations with many foreign nations, hence it has not been put into effect.

Third. Government guaranty of private bonds: This is nothing but another form of subsidy which is abhorrent to the principles of the Democratic Party.

Fourth. Revision of our navigation laws: This last is the only one that needs any extended discussion; but the charge has been so repeatedly made that our obsolete navigation laws have restricted the growth of our foreign commerce that I feel it my duty to set forth a few facts to refute this groundless accusation.

CONSTRUCTIVE DEMOCRATIC LEGISLATION.

In enumerating some of the causes of the shrinkage of our American shipping I mentioned briefly that formerly our navigation laws had imposed severe restrictions on the American shipowner, but on August 18, 1914, a Democratic Congress revised those laws and repealed their most objectionable features, including the provision prohibiting the entrance of foreign-built vessels into American registry, and since this legislation has been enacted by the Democrats it can no longer be urged that it is our antiquated navigation laws that hamper our foreign marine.

In examining the question of ships in American registry competing with those in foreign registry two main things are to be considered:

First. The original cost of construction, on which depends (a) interest, (b) insurance, (c) depreciation; and Second. Cost of maintenance and operation, which includes (a) officers, (b) crews or manning, (c) provisions, (d) repairs, (e) coal and oil, (f) equipment and safety appliances, (g) port charges, (h) general administration.

Without going into the various causes that have created the situation, it may be stated as a fact that it costs less to build a ship in Europe than it does here. According to Mr. Bernard N. Baker, of Baltimore, an acknowledged authority on the subject, a 10,000-ton cargo vessel costing $500,000 in Europe would cost $650,000 in the United States, or about one-third more. Mr. Baker told me personally that he secured these figures from a comparison of actual bids for the construction of the same vessel made by American and European shipyards. Previous to August 18, 1914, our navigation laws provided that ships in American registry should be American built and owned, and prohibited the registration of foreign-bulit ships.

It follows, then, that an American shipowner of a 10,000-ton cargo vessel formerly started with an initial handicap of $150,000. He lost the interest on that sum during the life of the boat, had to pay for additional insurance to cover the increased cost of the vessel, and at the end of 20 years, at which time it is estimated by marine experts a ship has outlived its usefulness and is fit only for junk, he lost $150,000 more than did his European competitor.

It is evident, then, that the foreign shipowner had a tremendous advantage at the very outset over the American, which it was difficult, if not impossible, to overcome.

Realizing this fact, the Democratic Congress last session enacted a law admitting foreign-built ships to American registry, and thereby at one swoop leveled the barriers and made possible the beginning of a real competition, so far as the original cost of the vessel was concerned.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate especially to this fact: The Democratic Senate and House had to repeal this objectionable law. Now you can go into the markets of the world and buy ships. Formerly you were forced to buy them in America with a terrible handicap against you in the greater cost of the vessels.

Let us now take up the cost of maintenance and operation and consider briefly in this connection the various items already listed:

(a) Formerly our navigation laws required that all watch officers on merchant vessels of the United States should be Americans, but by Executive order of September 4, 1914, President Wilson, by authority of the act of August 18, 1914, declared that all watch officers on foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry could be retained without regard to citizenship for a period of seven years.

As a matter of fact, however, both native and foreign officers on American vessels receive higher wages than do those on ships of other countries.

In regard to the number of officers a provision of the Hardy Act of March 3, 1913, requires on some American vessels one more officer than is demanded on corresponding foreign vessels. In the saving of this salary and because of their smaller salaries generally foreign vessels have a slight advantage.

(b) Our navigation laws impose no restrictions in regard to the nationality of the crews on American vessels, and the number is about the same as on foreign ships. The wage scale is, however, somewhat higher, and in this the foreign ship has some advantage.

(c), (d), (e), (f) In regard to the next four items, provisions, repairs, coal and oil, and equipment and safety appliances, in the long run there is little difference between the cost on American and on foreign vessels.

(g) On account of the various commercial treaties already mentioned, tonnage and port charges are the same on foreign and domestic ships practically the world over.

(h) The last item is general administration, and in this, from the very bulk of their business, the British, for example, have the better of us. The expense of running a company which has two ships is much greater proportionately than that of a company which has 20 vessels. Evidently, as our commerce increases, however, this difficulty will disappear.

We have examined briefly the various items that enter into the cost of constructing and operating a merchant vessel, and we find that the charge that our merchant marine is hampered and restricted by antiquated navigation laws is practically without foundation. Whatever cause for criticism there may have been in this direction in the past has been removed by the enlightened and farseeing action of the present Democratic Congress, which, by the act of August last, admited foreign-built, but American-owned, vessels to American registry. Since this amendment was made to our laws 123 vessels, aggregating 455,021 tons, have been admitted to American registry to date.

Let those glib critics who so freely attack our navigation laws, who make such sweeping accusations, who speak in glittering generalities, give us a bill of particulars and specify what section or sections of our navigation laws are faulty and handicap our shipping, and wherein and in what manner they compare unfavorably with the laws of other nations.

But while our navigation laws are in a good condition, the foreign shipowner, as already mentioned, has a real advantage in the matter of wages. In addition to this, our competitors—the British, for instance—have a firmly established and well-organized business; they have regular lines to all parts of the globe, and their agents are in every market of the world. Their reputation is made, and they have many customers of long standing. They have their ships, docks, and all necessary adjuncts, and many of them receive heavy subsidies from their Governments.

On page 6 of a publication issued by the Bureau of Navigation, entitled "Ocean Mail Systems and Ship Subsidies of the World," we note that the aggregate amount of subsidies and other forms of contributions granted by foreign nations to their vessels is upward of $46,000,000 per year.

By countries, the amounts of subsidies, and so forth, granted are as follows:

Great Britain and colonies	$9,689,384
France	13,423,737
Japan	5,413,700
Italy	3,872,917
Spain	3,150,012
Austria-Hungary	2,984,530
Germany	2,301,029
Russia	1,878,328
Norway	1,102,143
Netherlands	880,011
Sweden	277,752
Denmark	145,000
Belgium	55,970
Portugal	50,000
Chile	253,195
Mexico	75,000
Egypt	54,000
Brazil	1,300,000
Total	46,907,220

On the other hand, the only form of contribution by the United States to its merchant marine in 1914 was the sum of $1,406,014 as compensation for carrying mails.

All these things combined and the further fact that the attention of our people has been turned so completely away from the ocean, their activities bent in other directions and their capital invested in other ventures, make it imperative that our National Government take some action to give new impetus to our shipping industry. The past six months have afforded us a costly lesson. The value, aye, the necessity, of a merchant shipping has never been made so apparent.

EXTORTIONATE FREIGHT RATES.

The outbreak of the present war brought about a sudden withdrawal of belligerent vessels from our commerce; this caused a tremendous scarcity of cargo space, and thereby forced freight rates up to prohibitive figures. To European ports rates increased from 50 to 1,000 per cent. Thousands of tons of commodities unable to secure shipment were piled up on wharves or stored in warehouses.

In a strong report by Mr. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, to the United States Senate, published as Senate Document No. 673, Sixty-third Congress, third session, on page 15, we find that the rates on grain from New York to Rotterdam have increased 900 per cent since the outbreak of the war; on flour, 500 per cent; and on cotton, 700 per cent.

On page 14 we find that the rates from New Orleans to continental Europe, excluding Germany, on grain increased from 300 to 488 per cent and on cotton from 369 to 759 per cent. I am informed by the State Department that the present rate on cotton from New York to Bremen is $15.60 per bale and to Russia $18.85 per bale. When we remember that the rate last July to Europe was $1.25 per bale we can understand how great is the increase and how exorbitantly high freight rates are. The difficulty is not in finding markets for our products, but in securing transportation. Our small tonnage engaged in the foreign trade is entirely inadequate to cope with the situation. The vessels are earning tremendous profits, however, and it is perfectly apparent that the great opposition to this bill comes from shipowners and shipping combines. These, perhaps, are like the proverbial dog in the manger—they can not do the business themselves and yet they are unwilling for anyone else to do it. The small amount which they do handle is carried at such unreasonably heavy charges that it is said the freight on a recent cargo from Wilmington, N. C., to England and return exceeded the value of the vessel. Anyone can make the estimate for himself. On cotton, for instance, the charge is $15.60 per bale to Germany and $18.85 per bale to Russia. At those rates a ship carrying 11,000 bales to Bremen—as, for instance, the Dacia, which was purchased recently by Mr. Breitung from its German owners for $165,000—would receive $171,600 for its load of cotton; and if the same vessel had carried the cotton to Russia, its freight charge would have equaled $206,350. If we assume that the charges were equally as large on the return cargo, the amount for the round trip to Bremen would be $343,200 and to Russia $413,700, or considerably more than the first cost of an ordinary vessel of that capacity.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator what would be the value of that cotton?

Mr. RANSDELL. The value of that cotton would be something like $40 to $45 per bale in the market at Galveston or New Orleans. The last quotation I saw as to the price of cotton in Germany was 16½ cents per pound, which would make it something like $85 per bale in the market of Bremen. Previous quotations in Bremen had been considerably higher than that.

SHIPPING TRUST FIGHTING BILL.

These figures in regard to freight rates and the total for a shipload of cotton, and so forth, demonstrate how colossal must be the profits of the shipowners. The placing by the Government of a fleet of merchant vessels upon the ocean would help to supply the demand for cargo space and inevitably lower freight rates; this touches the shipping combine in its most tender point, its pocket; and here we have unearthed the moving force behind the opposition to this bill. The Shipping Trust, through the tears and blood of Europe, is wringing from the American people extortionate freight charges, and at the first suggestion of a cut in its profits, through the medium of the present shipping bill, there arises a tremendous outcry against the measure engendered and fostered by the Shipping Trust.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator explain just what is the Shipping Trust? Is it a European or an American trust?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am inclined to think it is a combination of parties in both countries. We have not had it thoroughly examined yet by any committee appointed to find out about it; but it works, as is usual in such cases, in such an elusive manner that I do not know that you could exactly put your hands on it; but that it exists there is no doubt.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did the Senator observe a few days ago that the district court of the United States for the State of New York, after hearing and inquiry, rendered an opinion that there was no such thing as an American Shipping Trust?

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not see that.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I take the liberty to remind the able Senator from New Hampshire that the ruling was not that there was not such a trust, but that the conditions of the war had practically dissolved it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; then it does not exist.

Mr. LEWIS. Intimating not that there had not been such a trust, but leaving only the conclusion to the American public as to whether or not the European war had dissolved it.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the contention, which the Senator from Louisiana is now making with great force, is that the Shipping Trust is interfering with this legislation. The only man who ever spoke to me about this bill is Mr. Bernard N. Baker, of Baltimore, who is supporting this bill, as the Senator from Louisiana has suggested.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not anyone is interfering, but I hold in my hand a letter signed by Wallace Downey, which purports to emanate from the United States Merchant Marine Association, of 15 Church Street, New York. It is addressed to R. J. Corbitt, of the Corbitt Buggy Co., of Henderson, N. C. The letter was furnished me, I may say, by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], it having been sent to him by one of his constituents. It reads as follows:

UNITED STATES MERCHANT MARINE ASSOCIATION,
50 Church Street, New York, January 29, 1915.

Mr. R. J. CORBITT,
Corbitt Buggy Co., Henderson, N. C.

DEAR SIR: We are going to ask you to do two things, because we have got to do two things:

First. We believe it a patriotic duty for every friend of the merchant marine to write to the Senators and Representatives from his State, or any other Senators or Representatives whom he can properly appeal to, to oppose the so-called ship-purchase bill (the Alexander bill) by vote and voice as hard as he can; that socialistic proposition would surely involve our country in no end of difficulties abroad and at home. Will you not do this writing?

Second. We have got to ask you to join us in our work by becoming a member of the association. This $10 membership fee, we venture to say, is about the smallest sum which any organization has ever invited you to subscribe, but we will make every dollar of it do the work of two—or ten—because we are spreading the organization and the propaganda everywhere we can just as fast as the backing of our friends will permit.

You can mail us a check for this trifling sum—becoming thereby a member of the association for one year—in the positive assurance that it will be devoted to combating this dangerous legislation and to proposing constructive and correct legislation at the right time, and in the positive assurance that we shall win, because we are right.

Will you not help us? Will you not do the writing to your Senators and Representatives? Will you not enable us to use your $10 to help make the work successful? Many are looking to us to defeat this socialistic shipping bill and then to take the lead in the constructive program. We don't shirk the responsibility, but we must have your help. Will you not give it?

Faithfully, yours,

WALLACE DOWNEY, Director.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. May I read to the Senator from New Hampshire the ruling of the court in the case to which he referred a moment ago? It is taken from the Associated Press dispatches, and is as follows:

NEW YORK, February 3.

The Government's antitrust suits against the Prince, Hamburg-American, Lamport & Holt—

Demonstrating what the Senator from Louisiana has well stated—the combination of foreign and American lines—and other steamship lines, charging restraint of trade in freight and passenger business between America and Brazil, and against the American Asiatic Steamship Co. and others whose ships ply between New York and Asiatic ports, were dismissed to-day.

In dismissing the petition against the Prince Line and its codefendants, which include a British line and two German lines, Judge Lacombe asserted the combination complained of had been practically dissolved as a result of the European war.

A dispatch from Washington quotes officials as saying an appeal probably will be taken to the Supreme Court.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for his very appropriate contribution. Continuing my remarks about the Shipping Trust: Immediately every agency is started at work, and a systematic, organized campaign of opposition is begun. Money is contributed, letters written, speeches delivered, appeals made, the catchwords of "Government ownership" and "socialism" sounded throughout the length and breadth of the land, and heaven and earth moved to prevent—what? To prevent the Democratic Party from interposing the strong arm of the United States between the oppressor and the oppressed, and dragging the hand of the Shipping Trust out of the pockets of the American people.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana permit me to interrupt him further?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has read a letter from Mr. Wallace Downey. I do not see anything bad in that letter. Mr. Downey is opposed to the present legislation, and he is using all the means at his command to defeat it. On the other hand, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce are traveling over the country at the expense of the Government advocating this legislation. I believe that that is more reprehensible than the attitude that a private citizen has taken on this bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, it seems strange, if Mr. Wallace Downey is such a patriot that he and his friends in the past have not attempted to secure some legislation to correct the awful evil under which we are suffering now. It seems strange that he does not present something at this time. He says, at the "right time" they are going to present some remedy. When will the "right time" ever come? Is not 38 years long enough? They have not done anything in 38 years.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator is courteous; and I will ask him if he will yield to me a moment further?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am very glad to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator a little while ago said that no substitutes had been offered for this bill. If the Senator will turn to a publication on his table, the Journal of the proceedings of last Friday, he will find, on page 13, that I offered a substitute for this bill and that it was laid on the table by the unanimous Democratic vote as opposed to the unanimous Republican vote in opposition to that motion; and if the Senator will turn to the proceedings at the conclusion of the Fifty-ninth Congress, he will find that a bill that I had offered similar to the substitute referred to passed the Senate, went to the House of Representatives, was slightly amended there, came back, and I made a motion to concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives, and it was filibustered to death by Democratic Senators.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask the Senator if that was a ship-subsidy bill? I have not had a chance to examine it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was a postal-subvention bill, enlarging the subventions in the act of 1891.

Mr. RANSDELL. Was it not what is commonly known as a subsidy bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was known as a subsidy bill by Democratic Senators, because whatever the Republicans offer in this direction is a subsidy, while the bill now before the Senate, which is the most abominable subsidy that was ever offered to the Senate, is not a subsidy, in the opinion of Democratic Senators.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will ask the Senator if he can draw a distinction between a measure where the Government, as the representative of the people, would get the benefit of any profits that might be made and a measure where individuals would get it, as in the case he would seek to remedy by his bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not see where the profits are going to come from, inasmuch as both the President and the Secretary of the Treasury say this will be a losing venture.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, it seems to me that there would be a very considerable profit if the business were properly handled. It is a fact well established by the official reports that the ships of the Panama Railway Co. have earned something like $735,000 in the last 10 years.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield again, I would like to suggest to him that in my own time, which doubtless will come before this bill is finally voted upon, I will show that the figures the Senator has preesnted as to the profits from the Panama Railway service are utterly illusory and that, as a matter of fact, such profits do not exist.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should be very glad to see those figures. The ones I have used were furnished to me by the highest officials of the company, and I believe them to be correct. An actual profit of $735,723 is given as the earning of the Panama Railway ships in the last 10 years.

To resume, Mr. President, this letter which I have read is an endeavor by shipowners, or their friends, to create an artificial opposition to the shipping bill. Note how cunningly it is composed:

> That socialistic proposition would surely involve our country in no end of difficulties abroad and at home.

No proof, no facts; mere assertion. The two bugbears of socialism and international complications shaken before the faces of the American people, because the Shipping Trust does not want to yield its monopoly of transportation. I shall refer later to the question of Government ownership, but suffice it to say now that it was not socialism for the United States to realize the dream of centuries and link the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by excavating at a cost of $400,000,000 that masterpiece of engineering skill and monument to American enterprise, the Panama Canal; it was not socialism for the United States to appropriate $40,000,000 to build railroads that will cross the wilds of Alaska and open up to the world the incalculable mineral treasures of that ice-clad land; it was not socialism for the United States to operate the ships of the Panama Railroad Co. at a total profit in less than 10 years of $735,723; it was not socialism for the United States to operate the Panama Railroad Co. crossing the Isthmus at a profit of $16,099,742.25 in 10 years.

Mr. President, I submit at this point a table showing the profits of the Panama Railroad Co. by years, which I should like, without objection, to insert in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

By years, the profits of the Panama Railroad were as follows:

1905	$1,079,892.92
1906	838,939.48
1907	1,430,373.44
1908	$1,710,295.03
1909	1,910,842.58
1910	1,574,409.66
1911	1,675,329.45
1912	1,997,280.80
1913	1,828,852.68
1914	1,825,919.82
4 months from June 30 to Oct. 31, 1914	227,606.39
Total for 10 years	16,099,742.25

Mr. RANSDELL. These figures are given me by Mr. Rossbottom, secretary of the Panama Railroad Co., and are a clear refutation of the charge that the Government can not operate a business profitably.

It was not socialism for the United States to pour millions of the taxpayers' money as subsidies into the pockets of shipowners during the period prior to the Civil War; but, say these Shipping Trust propagandists, it is socialism for the United States to pay out its money, get ships in return, and operate those ships in this pressing emergency for the benefit of the whole people. And that is socialism. Why? Because that is different; that pinches the corns of the Shipping Trust and will loosen its grasp on the American shipper.

But let us look a little further in this letter. Listen to this:

> You can mail us a check for this trifling sum in the positive assurance that it will be devoted to combating this dangerous legislation and to proposing constructive and correct legislation at the right time—

"At the right time!" When? This phrase has a familiar smack. It is the old yelp of the special interests and the Republican Party. It means postponement, procrastination, delay—anything but immediate action. It is this cry that has caused these long, long years of Republican inaction and has fastened the grip of the Shipping Trust upon the throats of the American people. Sirs, this is constructive legislation, this is correct legislation, this is remedial legislation, this is emergency legislation, this is necessary legislation, and the right time is now, just as soon as we can pass this measure, in the teeth of opposition conceived and encouraged by such propagandas as this.

GERMAN MARKET OPENED TO COTTON.

Mr. President, through the efforts of the Departments of State and Commerce the German market was recently opened for cotton. The American ambassador in Berlin says that a conservative estimate of the market for cotton in Germany is 2,000,000 bales, while there is also a market for 800,000 bales in Austria.

Our ambassador further states the question is now how much of a market there is in Germany, but how much cotton we can get to Germany.

In this connection I wish to say a word about the manner in which the German markets were first opened to our cotton, and to give credit to the man who was the pioneer in the movement.

When the Government official intrusted with the work of facilitating the shipment of cotton to Germany first called on the cotton exporters he was told by the largest firm that they would sell Germany all the cotton wanted, f. o. b. New York, cash against shipping documents. He went from cotton exporter to cotton exporter without obtaining encouragement. At last he saw a young man named W. L. Harriss, of the Harriss-Irby Cotton Co. He explained to Mr. Harriss that cotton was not contraband, and under the London agreement was the first of the excepted articles which would not become contraband in the future. Mr. Harriss replied, "Then my Government tells me that I can ship cotton to Germany?" The official replied, "Yes." "Then I will ship it," he said.

He shipped 6,000 bales of cotton to Germany by Goteborg, Sweden. The banks would not finance the shipment, and he took $300,000 out of his own firm to finance it. Then he chartered the El Monte, and on being told that he could ship it directly into Bremen, sent a full cargo into Bremen. He carried marine insurance himself to the extent of $175,000 on the hull. The El Monte arrived safely, and the first cotton shipped directly into Bremen in the first ship carrying the American flag into Bremen for 40 years was sent by W. L. Harriss. He has now other boats going over, including two sailboats, which must be towed for a large part of the voyage.

I believe that to W. L. Harriss is due much of the credit of getting cotton into Germany. He blazed the way and demonstrated that such shipments were possible. With what result? Shippers are now endeavoring to get boats to supply the German market, and cotton to-day, instead of selling at 6 cents, is selling at 9 cents in New York City. When we take into consideration the amount of money this increase will mean to the South, and then realize that it was one of the young Americans who came to the rescue of those Government officials intrusted with the work of opening up this market, I do not think too much credit can be given him.

In spite of all the efforts that have been made, however, there is still a tremendous shortage of ships, transportation facilities are inadequate, freight rates have risen and remain above all bounds, and the fact that is strikingly apparent is that something must be promptly done to afford material aid to our foreign merchant marine and to bring relief to our country, to enable present and future crops to be moved, for no one knows how long the war will last. The time for talking is past and the hour of action has come.

I do not know that the pending bill proposes the most effective means to help our shipping industry. If anyone can suggest something better, my mind is open to receive it. I am not wedded to this measure, but in my opinion it is the first practical proposition advanced in many years which seems to promise a meed of success, and I am for it until a better is offered.

PROVISIONS OF SHIP-PURCHASE BILL.

The shipping bill provides that a corporation shall be organized with a capital stock not exceeding $10,000,000, each share having a par value of $100. The United States, through a shipping board composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of Commerce, and three civilians, two of whom must be men of large practical experience in foreign shipping, shall subscribe to 51 per cent of this stock and a like per cent of every increase, and the remainder shall be offered for public subscription. Its purpose shall be the purchasing, chartering, constructing, maintaining, and operating of merchant vessels in the trade between the United States and other countries, and it shall begin business as soon as 51 per cent of the stock shall have been paid for by the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury shall sell what are known as Panama Canal bonds to an amount not exceeding $30,000,000, and the sum so realized shall be used to purchase or construct the vessels of the corporation. In return for these vessels the corporation shall issue to the United States its gold bonds, bearing not less than 4 per cent interest, and these bonds shall constitute a first lien on the property of corporation.

The shipping board, subject to the direction of the President, is vested with power to vote the stock of the United States in the corporation. The bill authorizes the President to charter, lease, or transfer to the corporation vessels belonging to the War and Navy Departments fit for commercial purposes and not needed by these departments in time of peace. The vessels of the Panama Railroad Co. are also authorized to be transferred.

One very important provision of the measure provides that the vessels purchased or constructed by the corporation shall, so far as the purposes of commerce permit, be of a type suitable for use as transports or naval auxiliaries, and that under certain conditions, in times of emergency, the President may take possession of such vessels, absolutely or temporarily, for use as naval auxiliaries or transports.

It is further provided that, except as stipulated in the bill, the vessels of this corporation shall be subject to our navigation laws and to all rules, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels under the principles of international law, to the same extent as merchant vessels in private ownership when duly registered under the laws of the United States.

These are the essential features of the bill. It provides for the immediate creation of that which is most necessary to our interests—the nucleus of an adequate foreign merchant marine. Never in all the history of the United States has there been a greater need for ships and more ships than at the present time, and the pending measure will place upon the ocean a fleet of modern merchant vessels, aggregating more than 600,000 tons, flying the Stars and Stripes and belonging to a corporation in which the United States Government is a stockholder, which will be able to take full advantage of the golden trade opportunities now opened to us.

NECESSITY FOR GOVERNMENT AID.

Mr. President, the opponents of the measure have made the echoes ring with the cry of "Government ownership!" They have charged that the Government is going into the shipping business, that it is encroaching upon the domain of private enterprise, that one step will lead to another, and then they flaunt in our faces the bugbear of a universal Government ownership tending toward socialism.

The gentlemen on the other side, however, permit their imaginations to run away with their good judgment. The United States does not propose to enter indiscriminately upon the proper sphere of private industry. The situation existing at the present time is unusual, and must have some prompt and efficacious remedy. In a great measure through the culpable inaction of the Republicans since the Civil War, our foreign shipping has shrunk, until now we carry only 8 per cent of our imports and exports. The unparalleled conflict in Europe, coming like a bolt from a clear sky, deprived us at one fell swoop, by the withdrawal of belligerent vessels from peaceful trading, of the major portion of our ocean carriers. This shortage of vessels has produced a terrible congestion of one of the great agencies of commerce and inflicted heavy loss and suffering upon the entire United States, especially the South. Private capital is either unable or unwilling to meet the emergency, and to relieve the situation the United States must step into the breach.

The principle involved is this: In times of pressing emergency, such as this, when a titanic war has clogged the wheels of commerce and private enterprise is either unable or unwilling to cope with the situation, it is the right and the duty of the Government, with its vast resources, to come to the rescue, at least temporarily, even to the extent of engaging in private industry, for the benefit of the whole people.

When we add to this the fact that the proposed measure will provide the nucleus of a greater foreign merchant marine of the United States, which will enable us in time to carry the larger portion of our exports and imports, as we did in days of yore, instead of having foreign shipowners earn the colossal annual freight toll of $275,000,000 paid by our foreign commerce prior to the present war; when we consider that such a merchant marine will prevent the recurrence of the present disastrous situation it can not be denied that the shipping bill is entirely justifiable and bears much promise of future good.

COOPERATION AND NOT COMPETITION.

"But," we hear our opponents say, "the shipping bill will not encourage and increase our foreign shipping. It will stifle competition. No one will go into business in opposition to the Government, and on whatever trade route you find a Government-owned ship breasting the ocean waves, there you will not find a private-owned vessel."

Mr. President, this assertion is made without proof, and I deny it flatly.

The object of this venture is cooperation and not competition. The corporation will not be so foolish as to defeat its own purpose by cutting its freight rates so low as to drive private vessels out of business. It will seek to place the American flag upon the ocean and not try to wipe it out. Its purpose will be to place freight carriers where none now exist, and where there are not enough to carry the commerce at fair rates, and when other American vessels are able and willing to assume the burden it will gradually withdraw its vessels from that trade route and place them on other less frequented fields where they can be advantageously used.

The corporation will help to supply a need and will not endeavor to crush those private vessels which are also trying to supply that need, for that would be diametrically opposed to its main object. And it will fix its freight charges at rates at which private-owned ships can profitably operate.

WE CAN SECURE SHIPS.

Another statement repeatedly made upon the floor of the Senate is that the corporation can not secure ships except those German and Austrian vessels bottled up in our ports, and that purchase of these would involve, probably, a breach of neutrality.

Mr. President, I have given this point considerable thought and investigation and am convinced that this is not the case. There are five sources from which the corporation can secure vessels:

First. The Panama Railroad Co.
Second. American coastwise vessels.
Third. Ships of neutral countries.
Fourth. Ships of belligerent countries.
Fifth. Construction of vessels.

First. Panama Railroad Co. ships: The shipping bill authorizes the transfer to the corporation of the vessels of the Panama Railroad Co. These are 9 in number and aggregate 36,500 tons, which would form a nucleus for a larger fleet.

Second. American coastwise ships: The inducements offered by greatly increased freight rates have caused a number of our coastwise vessels to register for the foreign trade, and, according to a special report of the Commissioner of Navigation, 62 vessels, aggregating 136,146 tons, have entered our foreign commerce to date. Many of our coastwise vessels are structurally fitted to engage in transocean trade between the United States and foreign countries. Surely quite a number of these spacious ships that ply between New York and New Orleans, or New Orleans and San Francisco, or San Francisco and Hawaii, or Seattle and Alaska, though coastwise vessels, are entirely qualified to engage in foreign trade. A letter to me from the Bureau of Navigation states that on June 30, 1913, there were 361 steam vessels of over 1,000 gross tons, aggregating 948,856 tons, in the coasting trade on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, and 117 steamships of over 1,000 gross tons, aggregating 282,666 tons, in the coasting trade on the Pacific coast, making a total of 478 steam vessels of over 1,000 tons, aggregating 1,231,522 tons, engaged in the coasting trade of the United States more than a year and a half ago. Since then the number has undoubtedly increased. Already 62 of these vessels, totaling 136,146 tons, have registered in the foreign trade, and there is no reason why the corporation should not secure a number of available suitable vessels from those still plying in the coastwise trade. The vacancies made in that trade by the withdrawal of these vessels can easily be filled in time by the construction of new ships or otherwise. In my judgment the shipping corporation will be able to secure from our coastwise commerce quite a number of vessels suitable for deep-sea shipping.

Third. Ships of neutral countries: Although the leading nations of Europe are at war, still there are quite a number of neutral maritime countries, whose ships, if necessary, the corporation could purchase without any suspicion of a violation of neutrality. Norway, Sweden, The Netherlands, Denmark, Italy, Spain, Greece, and Portugal all have merchant vessels that could be secured by the corporation to satisfy its immediate needs.

Fourth. Ships of belligerent countries: There are interned in the ports of the United States 57 German and Austrian vessels, with a combined tonnage of 483,600 tons. The most important thing in this connection, even if we never acquire a single one of these vessels, is that there should be no breach of neutrality. I am convinced, however, that the President of the United States, who has shown himself to be a staunch and true friend of peace, will permit no action to be taken that would in any way involve this country in a controversy with any one of the belligerent nations. Assuming, therefore, for the sake of argument, that the corporation would not secure any ships from the warring countries, I still believe that, with the nucleus of the vessels of the Panama Railroad Co., it could obtain a sufficient number of ships for its immediate needs from our coastwise trade and from neutral countries, and what further vessels it might desire at a later date could quickly be constructed by American shipyards.

Fifth. Construction of vessels: The assertion has been made by the opponents of the bill that it takes from 18 months to 2 years to build a vessel. Practical shipbuilders tell me that a freight vessel of from 5,000 to 10,000 tons can be constructed in 7 to 10 months. Mr. Bernard N. Baker, of Baltimore, informs me that two shipyards have made him offers to build 10,000-ton freighters within 10 months. The Maryland Steel Co. shipyard at Sparrow Point, Md., could build a 6,000 to 10,000 ton freight vessel in 11 and possibly 10 months. The president of the New York Shipyard Co., Camden, N. J., with whom I conferred personally, told me that they had under construction 7,500-ton cargo ships that would be completed within 8 months from the time they were begun. The Newport News Co. builds the large Southern Pacific liners in a little over 8 months, and there can be no question that within 10 months of the issuing of the orders to build, the corporation could have constructed in American shipyards a great number of freighters. It is highly probable that the need for ships will continue. There is no immediate prospect of a cessation of hostilities, and a year from now the world may still be convulsed in the throes of this terrific struggle.

As we have seen, the freight situation in the United States is very bad at the present time, exorbitant rates are being charged on cotton, and so forth, to Europe, and we have every reason to believe that it will continue to be bad for a long time in the future, certainly until the end of the war, a period of time which no one can predict.

The Napoleonic war lasted for practically 20 years; the war between the States of our Union lasted more than four years; Lord Kitchener is reported as having said that the war would be just beginning from the English point of view about the 1st of next May; and when we consider the marvelous resources of the countries engaged in this struggle on both sides, it is fair to assume that it will continue for several years. Some argue that the grain and cotton produced last fall have passed out of the hands of the farmer and say that farmers will get no benefit from this shipping measure, as their crops are now in the hands of speculators. Even if this statement be true, which I do not admit, it is also true that the farmer will have to market another crop of grain and cotton within the next 6 to 10 months, and it will be just as necessary to have shipping for the next crop as for the last. And not only will shipping be needed for our crops, but for lumber and everything else which goes to make up the colossal foreign commerce of the Nation, of which lumber, for instance, can not be carried now at any price. Plainly, then, there is, and probably will continue to be, a great need of ocean carriers, and the only practical way to secure them and to afford thereby the nucleus of a greater American foreign merchant marine is proposed by the pending ship-purchase bill.

BILL PROVIDES NAVAL AUXILIARIES.

There is another very important phase of this subject that I wish to discuss. We hear a great deal these days about the necessity for an adequate Army and Navy and strong coast defenses. Congressmen and Senators are urging the building of dreadnaughts and submarines in order that we may be prepared for a possible war. But it must not be forgotten that battleships and submarines without naval auxiliaries are almost useless, and in the event of an over-seas war, troops without transports would be worthless. Naval auxiliaries and Army transports are just as important for the national defense as an adequate fighting Navy and Army.

One provision of the pending bill specifies that the ships of the corporation shall, so far as the commercial requirements of the foreign trade of the United States may permit, be of a type suitable for use as naval auxiliaries, and the President is authorized in time of emergency to take possession of these vessels, absolutely or temporarily, for such purposes. Hence the enactment of this measure will make available a fleet of vessels that can, should necessity arise, be used as Naval auxiliaries or Army transports.

Considering the measure from the military and naval viewpoint alone, therefore, and ignoring the commercial advantages that would flow from its passage, I contend that the $40,000,000 it appropriates would be well expended in the creation of a fleet of vessels useful and, indeed, almost indispensable to both arms of the national defense in time of war. Let us be guided by the lamp of experience and take warning from the lessons taught by the Spanish-American War. During that war the United States chartered 4 merchant ships, which were converted into cruisers, and purchased 7 merchant ships, which were also converted into cruisers, and we purchased 31 tugs, 17 colliers, 27 yachts (1 yacht loaned), 16 vessels of special classes—101 vessels, at a cost of $11,418,027. Of these 101 vessels used as naval auxiliaries, the department was forced to purchase 21 from foreign nations, as an adequate number of American vessels was not available.

In his letter of January 30, 1915, to me, Hon. Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, says:

> The records of the Navy Department indicate that the purchase of foreign vessels for use as auxiliaries by the Navy at the outbreak of hostilities in 1898 was made necessary by the lack of suitable merchant vessels under the flag of the United States.

Speaking of the war, Admiral George Dewey, in a letter to the Secretary of the Navy dated November 23, 1905, says:

> Considering the unpreparedness of the Navy Department at this time as regards outlined plans for the procurement and fitting out of auxiliary vessels in time of war, the time within which this auxiliary fleet was obtained was highly commendable to the board charged with this duty, but the commanders in chief of the fighting fleets were embarrassed for lack of fast scouts and colliers, which embarrassment would have been still greater if the operations of war had been more unexpected than they were and against a more active enemy.

Is it the part of wisdom to place the United States at the mercy of foreign shipowners, who might by their refusal to sell us vessels place the United States in a most embarrassing situation?

Out of 57 vessels chartered by the War Department to transport troops during the Spanish War, 6 were secured from foreigners; and out of the 27 transports purchased for use during that war and the Philippine insurrection, 21 were obtained from foreign shipowners.

Think of it, out of 27 vessels purchased 21 were secured from foreigners.

In a special report dated December 22, 1905, Lieut. Col. Smith S. Leach says:

> For the transportation of the Santiago expedition in 1898 the Quartermaster's Department chartered every American vessel that could be obtained in the Atlantic ports during the 20 days following the declaration of war and succeeded in obtaining a fleet of 36 vessels averaging 2,500 gross tons. The official records afford ample evidence that the safe arrival was due to the good fortune of continued fine weather. A severe storm encountered would have scattered the fleet, probably with great loss of life, and would have defeated the object of the expedition. There is nothing except its successful arrival to justify its departure.

But the question naturally arises, granted that our facilities were inadequate in 1898, are we not better prepared now? Could we not now secure sufficient suitable American vessels to serve as auxiliaries and transports? Let us see.

A letter received by me from the Secretary of the Navy, dated January 26 last, states that in the event of war the Navy would require the following auxiliaries:

> Forty scout ships of great speed, of which 15 are now in service; 5 mine-depot vessels, of which 2 are now in service; 25 colliers of great capacity and speed, of which 10 are now in service; 10 tankers of great speed, of which 3 are now in service or building; 5 supply and refrigerating ships, of which 5 are now in service or building; 5 hospital ships, of which 1 is now in service; 5 repair ships, of which 2 are now in service; 6 transports, of which 4 are now in service or building; 10 dispatch boats of 18 knots, of which none is now in service and building; 10 seagoing tugs, of which 5 are now in service; 5 ammunition ships, of which 1 is now in service; 4 destroyers and repair ships, of which 4 are now in service or building.

It will therefore be necessary at the outbreak of hostilities to acquire for naval purposes, by purchase, charter, or otherwise, at least the following number of auxiliary vessels:

Twenty-five merchant vessels suitable for scouting purposes, 3 mine-depot vessels, 15 fleet colliers, 7 oil-fuel vessels, 4 ammunition ships, 4 hospital ships, 3 repair ships, 2 transports, 10 dispatch boats, 5 seagoing tugs; 78 vessels in all.

The next question is how many of these vessels could be secured from our present American merchant marine, and in regard to the most important of these classes, the following table, compiled by the Secretary of the Navy at my request, gives the best and most succinct answer:

Type.	Minimum required for charter.	Total American vessels available.	American vessels probably procurable.	Number necessary to obtain from foreign source.
Scouts: Speed at least 23 knots	25	10	6	19
Tankers: 14 knots	7			7
Colliers: 14 knots	15	23	6	9
Tankers	23	79	20	3
Colliers	77	170	43	34

From this it will be noted that we would have to secure from foreign sources 19 large scout ships of at least 23 knots speed, 7 large and swift tankers, 9 large and swift colliers, and 3 tankers and 34 colliers of ordinary speed, a total of 72 vessels which we would have to procure from foreign nations.

MILITARY IMPORTANCE OF MEASURE.

Let us turn now to the Army. In his letter of January 27, 1915, addressed to me, Hon. Henry Breckinridge, Acting Secretary of War, says:

We have found it necessary at times to ship supplies to our military forces in the Philippine Islands in foreign bottoms in time of peace; that is, when there was no abnormal military activity in the Philippine Islands.

From this letter it is evident that if the War Department has not always a sufficient number of transports in time of peace it would have to secure all additional ones made necessary by war from American or foreign merchant marines.

To move our entire Regular Army with equipment would require 53 vessels of 6,000 to 8,000 tons and 50 vessels of 4,000 to 6,000 tons, or a total of about 596,000 tons of shipping. To move that portion of our Army that could be mobilized in 15 days would require a fleet of approximately 460,000 tons.

The War Department estimates that about 155 American vessels operating out of Atlantic or Pacific ports and aggregating, roughly, 600,000 to 700,000 tons would be suitable for transporting troops, animals, equipment, and so forth. Military experts generally assume that not more than one-third or one-fourth of these could be immediately secured, the others being at sea, and so forth, and without taking into consideration the fact that many of our vessels in port would be required by the Navy, there would be available only about 200,000 to 250,000 tons of vessels as an outside assumption. This would not be sufficient to transport more than one-half of that portion of our Army that could be mobilized in 15 days, and we would be obliged to secure the other necessary transports from foreign sources. Let me mention in this connection that so short a time ago as 1907, during the Cuban intervention, out of 23 vessels chartered by the War Department 14 were foreign.

To summarize, then, in event of the outbreak of hostilities the United States would be forced to secure from foreign sources 72 naval auxiliaries and a great many Army transports. It is unquestionably the part of wisdom to take steps to create a suitable merchant marine in order that in time of war we would not be dependent upon foreign nations for one of the essentials of national defense. The pending bill will help to create this merchant marine, and, in my judgment, considered alone from the naval and military point of view, the expenditure of $40,000,000, which it provides, would be entirely justified.

Indeed, if there were no necessity for shipping legislation except to provide an auxiliary Navy and suitable Army transports, a greater expenditure than $40,000,000 would be fully warranted; and while I stand for the bill in its present form, believing it to be a wise and good measure, it would be a very decided forward step, even if it should be so changed before final passage as to provide only for suitable auxiliary ships for our Navy and transports for our Army, so constructed that in time of peace they might be used to carry the Nation's commerce to foreign lands. These vessels are liable to be greatly needed by the Navy and Army at any time, as I have shown. They are really essential to our national defense, and no true patriot can raise just objection to providing for them. If we had such a fleet now, they could be used effectively as commerce carriers, and would be of immense help in the present distressing situation. Such a fleet of auxiliary and transport ships would aggregate about 600,000 tons and cost approximately $40,000,000, practically the same in tonnage and cost as the shipping contemplated in the pending bill.

SOUTH'S VITAL INTEREST.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I wish to say that my section of the country is particularly interested in the pending ship-purchase measure. The South has suffered more than any other part of the United States from the war in Europe. Cotton is our principal crop, and the closing, to a great extent, of European markets to our great product has worked a dreadful hardship upon our people. Cargo space is so inadequate that freight rates to Germany, Austria, and Russia are upward of $15 per bale, or more than 3 cents per pound, and even at that price transportation can not be secured. This rate of over 3 cents per pound means the difference between ruin and prosperity for the cotton planter. It is needless for me to elaborate upon the situation. Everyone knows that the food products of the North and West—wheat, corn, cattle, hogs, potatoes, grain, and so forth—have risen enormously in price, while the cotton of the South has glutted the markets of the United States and is far below its true value because of the inability of our ships to carry it to foreign markets.

President Wilson in his very able address to Congress on December 8 last elucidated the situation forcibly in the following words:

The Government must open these gates of trade, and open them wide—open them before it is altogether profitable to open them or altogether reasonable to ask private capital to open them at a venture. It is not a question of the Government monopolizing the field. It should take action to make it certain that transportation at reasonable rates will be promptly provided, even where the carriage is not at first profitable; and then, when the carriage has become sufficiently profitable to attract and engage private capital, and engage it in abundance, the Government ought to withdraw.

The South realizes the necessity of an American foreign merchant marine sufficiently large to carry its products and the products of the entire United States, as the terrible war in Europe has resulted in the withdrawal of foreign vessels from our commerce.

We should, as far as possible, be independent of foreign ocean carriers in the transportation of our exports and imports, and the pending measure is the most practical means so far presented tending toward this end. I can do no better than to close by calling to your attention the prophetic words of Thomas Jefferson, the great apostle of Democracy, which are directly applicable to the existing situation. They seem dictated by the voice of a seer, for he says:

Our navigation involves still higher considerations. As a branch of industry it is valuable, but as a resource of defense essential.

Its value as a branch of industry is enhanced by the dependence of so many other branches on it. In times of general peace it multiplies competitors for employment in transportation, and so keeps that at its proper level; and in times of war—that is to say, when those nations who may be our principal carriers shall be at war with each other—if we have not within ourselves the means of transportation, our produce must be exported in belligerent vessels at the increased expense of war freight and insurance, and the articles which will not bear that must perish on our hands.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey and Mr. OLIVER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I view with deep regret the situation in the Senate to-day on the so-called shipping bill. I regret it for my party and also for my country's welfare, for I earnestly favor this measure. It is not all I desire, for I would eliminate the so-called shipping board and have the Government deal directly with the question, but it is a step in the right direction.

I hail with great satisfaction a Government-owned marine measure. For years I have pressed the Government ownership of railroads, telegraphs, telephones, and ocean transportation. Ready communication and transportation between the people of the world is a great civilizer and will prove a great blessing to our land.

I regret the heat and hot words used by some of our Democrats to our colleagues. I do not sympathize with it. We are all Democrats and, I feel, patriots, however much we may disagree on questions of policy. I have disagreed with the President on some administration measures and may again, but I know I was and will be honest in my action. And I feel we should be as charitable to our fellows who may disagree with us as we are to ourselves.

Mr. President, it must not be and it shall not be said that the great Democratic Party would ostracize from its membership men who think for themselves. Mr. President, I love a contender for his honest convictions.

Who was it who wrote the lines?—

In the world's broad field of battle,
In the bivouac of Life,
Be not like dumb, driven cattle!
Be a hero in the strife!
Trust no Future, howe'er pleasant!
Let the dead Past bury its dead!
Act, act in the living Present!
Heart within, and God o'erhead!

It will not do to charge the splendid Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] as a traitor to and conspirator against the Democratic principles. Ah, no; the Empire State Democracy will repel the charge in stentorian tones. Nor will the country allow the charge of being controlled by selfish interests to be laid to the brilliant Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. And so I might go on, taking in the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and the other Senators who voted against us on this question. I have been a rebel once or twice myself and I may be again if my conscience and judgment shall so dictate. But, fellow Democrats, we can not afford to call each other names. I know we are patriots. We have a splendid mission to perform. Let us cease our quarrels and forgive and forget, that we may advance legislation for the people's good. This can not be accomplished in an atmosphere of hate and bickering. It shall not be said that the great Democratic Party finds fault with men who honestly think for themselves.

Here I quote from an address of the President, delivered in this city on February 4 before the United States Chamber of Commerce:

There are thinking spaces in this country, and some of the thinking is very solid thinking indeed—the thinking of the sort of men that we all love best, who think for themselves, who do not see things as they are told to see them, but look at them and see them for themselves, and if they are told they are white when they are not white plainly say that they are black—men with eyes and with a courage back of those eyes to tell what they see.

I believe this to be a patriotic, wise, and needed measure. These Senators are friends; they have stood with us in many battles for the people's rights, and they will again. Senators, we want you; the country needs you and your aid in this measure. A dire need exists to-day in this land for ships. I have here a clipping from the New York World of January 27, 1915, insisting that now is the time of need and that the opponents of this measure have not proposed any remedy or method by which this relief can be given which, with the permission of the Senate, I shall ask to print in the RECORD without taking up the time of the Senate to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The clipping referred to is as follows:

WHAT OTHER REMEDY?

There is no dispute in Congress or anywhere else over the conditions which the Government ship-purchase bill is designed to remedy. These are admitted.

The insufficiency of shipping to move American exports and imports offering is admitted. The burden of excessive ocean rates on American industries is admitted. The immediate expansion of trade and employment in response to any increase in deep-sea shipping facilities is admitted.

Senator ROOT makes no denial in the course of his long speech against the pending bill, so far as it is reported. He is evidently agreed, but he offers no remedy. He is content merely to attack the remedy offered by the administration.

Mr. ROOT has a reputation for constructive statesmanship. Does he expect to improve it in pursuing his present course? What is his remedy for these agreed-upon conditions which are hampering our industrial revival?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I quote from the Sunday Star of yesterday a similar thought. The article is as follows:

If the ship bill fails now, the question presented to the next Congress and to the voters next year will be much larger than that covered by what even the President calls an emergency measure. We need and we want a merchant marine. We see the value and necessity of such a possession as never before. We are in the plight of a man at a ferry with pressing business on the other side of the stream and yet without a boat.

We must have boats, not for an emergency, but for every day and Sunday, too. We must be prepared at all times to carry our own ocean freights to whatever quarter of the globe there is sale for them. It will be a reflection on our intelligence and business capacity if we are ever again caught with no bottoms of our own to do our own carrying in.

Mr. President, I desire it to be distinctly understood that I have no apologies for supporting this bill. I support it because I believe it a wise and patriotic step.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] a day or two ago in his address made reference to our Spanish transports which we bought in an emergency, and said they were sold at 50 per cent of their cost. Well, Mr. President, suppose they were; suppose they had all been sunk; they had served their purpose, and the Government and the people of the United States had had value received for all of them. It matters little to me if we had to sell these proposed ships for less than their cost. They will meet this emergency and will lift the burdens that now rest upon us. When the ship-registry bill was under consideration I then expressed my views in this direction. I felt, and I have felt ever since I have been of thinking age—and I think more intensely to-day than ever—that the fear of the Government going into business is a bugaboo. Why, we are in business to-day. We are in the post-office business, which is colossal in its magnitude; we are carrying on a parcel post; we shall build the Alaskan railroad; and we have built the Panama Canal. Then, in Panama we are running successfully hotels, mercantile houses, and other things for the benefit of the people; and last, but not least, we are carrying on a very successful laundry there. I think some of us might look well to that.

Then, with reference to the Panama Railroad and the shipping, we are carrying them on, and have been carrying them on ever since we acquired that property 12 or 14 years ago; and, as has been asserted here, we have realized over $750,000 net, while reducing freights half or more.

As I said here a day or two ago, when the Senator from New Hampshire was speaking with reference to Government ownership, the Government to-day runs the railroad down there. It has a railroad 47 miles long, which, in the days of its private ownership—I well knew the president of the road, Mr. Hoadley, and Mr. Smith, its treasurer—there was charged for a trip for a passenger to cross that 47 miles of road $25. Since the Government has become the owner of the property the fare has been reduced to $2.50 for the trip of 47 miles, large numbers of workmen being carried free. That was the result. When this Panama Railroad was under private ownership they declared dividends of 20, 25, and 30 per cent, sweating it out of each one of the pioneers who attempted to cross the Isthmus. Their stock was sold on the market at 335 per cent of its par value after having declared bounties and stock and scrip dividends every little while.

The New York American of January 23, 1915, has an editorial that to me is most convincing and forceful. With the permission of the Senate, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection permission to do so will be granted.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

WHY THE SHIPPING BILL SHOULD PASS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 23.

Much attention has been given by the press of the country to the detention by the British of American cargoes.

Not enough attention has been given to the blockade against American commerce due to inadequate shipping facilities.

The importance of the British detentions is largely diplomatic. The detentions of cargoes due to lack of ships are vital to the commerce and prosperity of the country.

Cargoes seized by the British unjustly ultimately must be paid for in full. Cargoes detained in the freight yards of New York, Jersey City, and other ports because of lack of ships on which to load them will not be paid for. They will be a loss instead of a profit.

The cry of scarcity of ships and exorbitant rates comes from every Atlantic and Gulf port.

Since the outbreak of the European war 5,803,014 gross tons of ocean-going vessels have been withdrawn from commercial use. In July last the rate on grain from New York to English ports was from 4 cents to 5 cents a bushel. In December it was 16 cents to 17 cents a bushel, an increase of 300 per cent. The rate on cotton from New York to Liverpool in July last was 20 cents per hundredweight. In December it was 75 cents per hundredweight, an increase of 275 per cent.

The export trade situation, briefly stated, is this: The United States never had more products to ship than are now available, never had a greater demand for its products, and never had less facilities to meet the demand.

Congress is seeking to relieve this unparalleled situation by enacting a bill which provides for the investment of $30,000,000 in ships to be run by a Government-controlled corporation, just as the Panama steamship line is now run.

There can be no doubt that an era of great prosperity for the United States would commence the moment sufficient ocean-carrying capacity was provided to fill the world-wide demand for American exports.

Yet, strange and beyond comprehension as it may seem, a determined effort is now being made by leading Republicans in the Senate to prevent the enactment of legislation which would raise the disastrous blockade against United States export trade due to shortage of ships.

For 30 years Republicans in their national platform have declared in favor of the upbuilding of the American merchant marine. But when it came to the point of making good their party pledge by legislation, the invariable method proposed was the subsidizing of private shipping interests. They never could get enough public support for that proposal to put it through. Yet they persisted in its advocacy for 30 years and accomplished nothing toward the upbuilding of the merchant marine.

Now, in a world-wide emergency, which presents to the United States an unprecedented commercial opportunity, Republican Senators are still fighting vigorously for private interests as against the national interests

They won't countenance the proposal to have the Government itself furnish the much-needed ships.

Intentionally, or mistakenly, they are fighting the fight of the Ship Trust, which does not want Government-owned ships, because it does not want to lose any of the enormous profits it is now raking in through plundering of the helpless exporters. The Ship Trust is backed by the Money Trust, and both are bringing to bear their powerful influences to defeat the pending bill. These influences are organized, and their work usually is effective. If the producers of the country want the ship bill passed, they must, without delay, make it clear to the Republican filibustering Senators that there will be a day of political reckoning for the opponents of the bill if it fails of passage.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN] said a day or two ago, "I warn you, do not pass this bill." On the contrary, I say to you, Democratic Senators, and to you, Republican Senators, I urge that you do pass this bill. It will again deck the blue ocean with our craft, each floating our starry banner to the breeze. I plead that it may go on and on to greet and reflect the morning sun of every clime; that it may dip and droop only to kiss the water of every sea.

Our Republican friends have for 30 years promised an ocean marine, but their promises have been like the fruit of the Dead Sea, falling to ashes on the lips.

Pass this bill and we will start up shipyards with the busy whirl of industry; the shafts and spindles will hiss and grow hot; the anvils will clang, crying out the notes of industry and of liberty; and all mankind will wear brighter and happier faces in consequence.

Oh, but what do we run against? The Constitution of our country. Mr. President, what crimes and wrongs have been committed in its name! It is too often used as a buffer between men's desires and the people's right. In this crisis and situation the Constitution is, as usual, rolled in as a breastwork behind which the opponents of this bill seek shelter. Mr. President, I think it was Tim Campbell, of New York, who once said, "What is the Constitution, anyway, between friends?" Now, I do not go quite as far as that; but I will say that when the rights and needs of 100,000,000 of my countrymen stand on one side and the Constitution on the other, I will be found on the side of my countrymen though it may strain that ancient and honored document even to the bending point. This is a crisis. Why, you would roll our country back 100 years. This same argument was used when the pure food and drug act was pending. It was said, "Oh, go on and sell people sawdust and poison them for fear the Constitution in some clause might be infringed." The parcel post, the Alaskan Railway, and other measures were stoutly opposed on like grounds.

Senators, I plead with you to pass this bill. It will bring relief, in part, to our country, for what avail bounteous crops beyond our needs if we can not sell them? Our wharves and channels of trade are clogged with treasure because of the lack of an outlet.

To you, Senators of the South, I say it will bring relief for your cotton and your tobacco, and it will relieve your burdens there; to you of the Middle West and of the Northwest I say it will relieve you with your wheat and corn situation; to those Senators from New England and the Middle Atlantic States I say that, as I believe God lives, I believe the enactment of this measure will start the spindles in your mills with a whirr of industry and the clang of your anvils will resound to the very borders of our blessed land. Who will by vote or voice rise to stay the onward march of this giant Republic? Oh, it must not be; it can not be a Member of this great body who will interpose.

Senators, a new dawn and a brighter day is near at hand. Your fellow countrymen ask—yes, they demand—your aid. Will you refuse it in the face of evidence on every side of returning and renewed prosperity and activity in trade and industry, the starting up of great plants in all lines of work?

Our friends on the other side roll as a sweet morsel under their tongues the fact that business has been out of joint and that there are still some idle shops and idle men.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield for a question?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator called attention to the fact that the passage of this bill would start up the spindles of New England.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did the Senator observe that two or three days ago Faneuil Hall rang with the denunciation of this bill, and that the Democratic mayor of Boston made the principal address on that occasion?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I did not know that the Democratic mayor of Boston did that; but God help him if he did [laughter], for, if he did so, he has lost his patriotism, he has lost his individuality and character, in my mind, by denouncing and opposing this measure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey is approaching me in a threatening attitude. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, well, Heaven knows such a thing is far from my heart. I love my fellows, and particularly I love my fellow from New Hampshire as a brother. I would not throw a straw in his way. He has led a wise, industrious, and patriotic life; but still I say, with Dr. Watts—

While the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return.

[Laughter.]

I believe I have said you were patriotic. I believe you are; but my understanding of what constitutes a patriot and a statesman is that, among other qualifications, he should be one who would allay excitement, who would quell alarms, false rumors, and false impressions, and not fan the flame.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise simply to say that I forgive my friend from New Jersey for having characterized me as he has done.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I characterized the Senator only in the loveliest light.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are a great many sinners in the world if all those who oppose this bill are sinners.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I only meant a political sinner.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want again to say to the Senator—I shall not take time to read into the RECORD even a synopsis of what was said at that great meeting at Boston—that New England does not appreciate the solicitude that the Senator has for her industries, which, he says, are to be revived by the passage of this bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I do not know just what was the meeting to which the Senator from New Hampshire refers, but I can imagine that probably it was like a meeting which they had down at the chamber of commerce, in Broadway, New York. I know the domination and the influences that exist around there. I say they are not all patriotic, but they are most uncanny and unholy in very many instances.

A day or two ago the distinguished and entertaining Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], who is a genius in the art of painting word pictures, with no better material than fog and air—some might say "hot air"—painted in lurid glare and with highest coloring the picture of to-day, as, per his words, that the great metropolis of this country, the city of New York, had 480,000 idle men because of Democratic policy and the Democratic tariff. That is sad, if true. That great city has over 5,000,000 souls within its borders; it is the chief port of entry in our land. Each ship entering that port leaves a large part of its human cargo there; and, for reasons that I need not now explain, other than to say that its fame has gone abroad as the center and seat of wealth, culture, art, progress, charity, humanity, and hospitality in the Western Hemisphere, is it not most natural that some—yes, many—of idle humanity should drift and settle there?

But, Mr. President, that you may grasp just what this great city of New York is, let me say that New York City is the second largest city in the world, with a population of 5,000,000. This is a 39 per cent increase in 10 years, or 1,300,000 human beings, equivalent to the combined population of Boston, Kansas City, and San Francisco. Only three States in the Union have a greater population, our own New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois.

Do you realize that the area of New York City is 327 square miles; that it contains 5,000 miles of highways, 2,000 miles of sewers, and 341 miles of water front? In 1910 alone $225,000,000 was invested in building operations. There were 136,000 births in 1910—a birth every 4 minutes, a death every 7 minutes, and a marriage every 11 minutes.

Eight hundred thousand children attend public schools in New York City, and $30,000,000 is expended annually on educational work. There has been spent $140,000,000 for the 45 bridges over navigable streams. Assesed valuation (full value) of taxable real estate in New York City is $8,000,000,000; in addition $2,000,000,000 are exempt, covering, for example, Government, State, city, and church property. Fifteen and one-half million dollars were expended for police protection and eight and one-fourth million dollars for fire protection in 1911. New York City gives $10,000,000 annually out of the city treasury for public charity.

But, Mr. President, what are the real facts as to idleness in that great city? After the extravagant statement of the Senator from Michigan I wrote to the mayor of New York for his best estimate, and then verified his statement by two great newspapers of that city—the New York Tribune and the New York World—and I find that these authorities all prove that this word painter of the Senate was only 400,000 men out of the way. Senators, I beg that this fact may not alarm you, for the soil of the State of Michigan, whence the Senator comes, is fertile to a degree, the air is invigorating; wheat, corn, and even figures grow beyond measure in that wonderful clime under the magic touch of her marvelous sons. What is the fact as to New York City? Let us see. The mayor writes:

In response I will say that there are in New York about 2,250,000 workers. According to the best estimate available, the number of idle men is between 150,000 and 160,000.

The New York World says it is estimated that 150,000 men now lack work in New York. Professional agitators and others are trying to make the number appear larger—and, of course, I have no reference to the agitation which I heard here—but the number of unemployed dependents is only a small percentage. The number of professional vagrants is 8,000. The increase for December last over that of 1912 is shown by the following figures: In December, 1912, the number was 1,162; in December, 1913, 2,260; and in December, 1914, 3,552—not an alarming figure. Mr. President, 2,250,000 workers are employed, and according to the best estimates I have been able to obtain the number of unemployed is about 150,000 or 160,000. So I feel that the statement of the Senator from Michigan is punctured totally and completely in the respect to which I have referred.

Mr. President, in this connection I desire to call attention to a newspaper clipping detailing the story of business failures in the neighboring country of Canada, where no tariff changes have recently been made:

CANADA BAD LAST YEAR.

For the benefit of the political kinds of economists who were ascribing all the business troubles of the last year to the change in the tariff rates, the study is commended of the figures from the neighboring Dominion of Canada, which have just been made public. These show the failures for 1914 to have been more than double those of the preceding year, the liabilities being, respectively, $35,000,000 as against about $17,000,000. Railway earnings fell during the year by $15,400,000, or over 6 per cent. The exports decreased over $20,000,000 and the imports for 11 months were over $60,000,000 less. The building permits for the four largest cities showed a shrinkage of over $29,000,000. As no tariff changes occurred in Canada, the cause or causes of the depression must be sought elsewhere, particularly as it also happened that a similar state of affairs existed in many other countries in North and South America and in Asia and Europe as well.

Mr. President, it was my privilege during the absence of the Vice President to occupy the chair some evenings ago as Presiding Officer. It was then and there that the listeners in this Senate were thoroughly alarmed as with the burst of a cyclone with the cry of "Soup houses! soup houses! soup houses!" The Senator from Michigan ran the gamut from high to low and also, contrawise, to mansions in the skies. Why, God bless you, who would roll this as a sweet morsel under his tongue? I never knew of a soup house or a bread line in the great city of New York until the advent and the régime of the Republican Party with its iniquitous methods of legislation. I have seen with my own eyes a bread line a thousand deep and a thousand long standing at Fleischman's, at the corner of Broadway and Tenth Street, in the very dead of night. This sad sight was not, however, under the régime of the Democratic Party, but under the régime and Presidency of the late lamented President McKinley.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to suggest to the Senator, Mr. President, that that bread line of a thousand deep and a thousand long was greater than the Russian Army. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That may be a very bright observation, but the Senator knows when I said "a thousand deep and a thousand long" what I meant, anyway. [Laughter.] That condition, I beg to emphasize, was under the administration of President McKinley, under the régime of this highly moral party that would sacrifice heaven and earth to fill the mouths of the hungry man they so much love. What mockery and humbug is this charge! I beg to add, Mr. President and fellow Senators, this was under the very shadow of the spire of the wealthy Grace Church of New York, and as this cheerless, shivering throng stood with shrugged shoulders and chattering teeth in that cold, cold night, what rich comfort it was to hear the splendid, glorious chimes ring out on the still of the night, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." Why, Mr. President, I can almost see my friend the Senator from Michigan rise to offer an amendment to that beautiful hymn by striking out the words "Praise God" and substituting therefor the words "Praise the Republican Party."

Oh, Mr. President, how about Homestead? I went there during that reign of horror, terror, and bloodshed; I went to see for myself and to counsel with the unfortunate ones. I do not want to revive its memories and its horrors; memory is too green to forget—I sicken at the thought—no more! No more! But I beg you, Senators, in the name of truth, do not hold up the theory of protection as the panacea for the evils that to-day exist. Mr. President, no human mind could have foretold the conditions that to-day exist. O God, for the day of peace! O God, for the day when men shall speak the truth!

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I always listen with much pleasure——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Chair if I am correct in understanding that the proposition before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], to recommit this bill to the Committee on Commerce?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. JONES. That is the proposition to which I desire to address myself.

I always listen with a great deal of interest and pleasure to the eloquent, fervid, and earnest exhortations of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE]. I have heard these exhortations quite frequently during the last two years, and yet it seems that the beneficent results promised by the Senator never come; at least, they have not yet come. At the close of the first part of the Senator's address I was about persuaded to vote as he desired. He showed such a terrific picture and state of affairs and promised such glowing things as a result of the passage of this bill that I had about concluded to vote for it; but the latter part of his speech was devoted to an attempt to show that no such conditions exist; and so I am now in about the same condition that I was at the beginning of his speech. I doubt the advisability of passing the measure.

I think a great deal of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], but I do not think he treated us just right in the eloquent and splendid speech that he delivered. Some of us who have been expecting to get in to assist in the filibuster carried on by the other side have been waiting to address the Senate. When the Senator from Louisiana rose he had in his hand what looked like 8 or 10 pages of typewritten matter. I was congratulating myself, when I saw him get down to the last page, that he was about through; but as he concluded the last page he reached down inside of his desk and pulled out 15 or 20 pages more; and when he got through with that, and I was congratulating myself that the filibuster over there was about to end, he reached down and pulled out 25 or 30 more pages, and it worked us up considerably on this side. It was a splendid speech, however; it gave us a great deal of information and it was presented in a very splendid way.

Mr. President, the motion before the Senate is to recommit this bill to the Committee on Commerce. Those of us on this side of the Chamber have been ready to vote on that proposition for a week. We have been anxious to vote on it for a week. We are ready to vote now. The Senators on the Democratic side of the Chamber have been filibustering against reaching a vote on that proposition. They have not only been promoting this filibuster by talking, but they have also been carrying it on by adjourning from day to day and by recessing over from Friday until Monday, absolutely and wholly neglectful of all the important measures on the calendar. They have been casting aside and putting back all the business that is pressing upon the Senate in order to prevent a vote upon this measure to recommit.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] said that we had been hurling our thunderbolts, and that lightning had been flashing, and that nimbus clouds had been threatening on this side of the Chamber. He is entirely mistaken. He has located this terrific state of nature on the wrong side of the Chamber. All the thunderbolts that I have heard have been on that side of the Chamber for the last three or four days. All of the lightning flashes have been over there. All of these nimbus clouds have been over there. We have been very peaceful on this side, and in what discussion we have been able to carry on we have been discussing in a dispassionate sort of way the merits of the bill that was before the Senate.

Mr. President, on the motion that is now pending I want to use just a little of the time of the Senate. I am doing it, to a certain extent, to help out the other side of the Chamber. I know they do not want to come to a vote on this motion. I know that they want time to be used, and I am glad to accommodate them. I like to do it; and while they have not exactly asked me to use a little time before they press to a vote on the motion, I know they will be glad to have me do it. So I am going to use a few minutes, and to that extent assist them in the filibuster they have been carrying on for a week, and have been carrying on to-day for three hours.

In his speech to the American Electric Railway Association at Washington City a few days ago President Wilson is quoted as saying:

> Enterprise has been checked in this country for almost 20 years.

This is a strange statement and, coming from such a source, an amazing one. Any man who stops one moment to reflect knows it is not a correct statement. That the President of the United States should make it in all seriousness is almost incredible. It was made, however, in all seriousness before a body of representative business men, every one of whom knew it was wholly without foundation. It was no doubt made in perfect good faith and with the utmost sincerity. It forcibly illustrates the remarkable mental processes of the President and his utter obliviousness to actual facts. It is a clear, unambiguous statement as a fact of what every man and woman knows is not a fact.

When I saw it I wondered if I had been or was dreaming. I wondered if figures of our growth, development, and activity of enterprise would not verify what my experience and observation taught me.

Why did the President make this statement? Where has he been living during the last 20 years? Does he know of what has been done during that time? Has he been in a cloister, shut out from all the great activities that have made the last 20 years the most wonderful in our whole history of industrial development? Surely not. Then why such a statement? Under his leadership certain legislation has been passed. He has settled in his own mind that this legislation is going to be a good thing for business and enterprise. Because it has not been in force during the last 20 years he concludes in his mind that business could not have progressed, and so he declares as a fact that, waiting for this legislation, "Enterprise has been checked in this country for almost 20 years."

He is most unfortunate in the period selected. Within that period it can be shown conclusively that enterprise was actually checked while his party was in power and that it has been moving forward with amazing strides during the remainder of that period. The facts will also demonstrate that the statement he has made can be explained upon no other ground than that it is solely and purely a "state of mind."

What of our foreign commerce? Has it been checked during the last 20 years? In 1889 our exports to foreign countries were $742,401,000, while in 1893 they were $847,665,000, or an increase of $105,264,000. Our imports in 1889 were $745,131,000 and in 1893 they had risen to $886,400,000, or an increase of $140,269,000. A Democratic administration went into power and Democratic legislation was enacted, and what was the result? In 1896 our exports were $882,606,000, or an increase of only $34,941,000. Our imports were $779,724,000, or a decrease of $6,676,000. That shows a very decided check to enterprise in the foreign trade. What has occurred since then? In 1913—and, mark you, this closes an uninterrupted period of Republican policies and legislation—our exports were $2,465,884,000, or an increase of $1,583,272,000, and our imports $1,813,008,000, or an increase of $1,033,284,000, or a total increase in our foreign trade or enterprise of $2,616,562,000. And yet the President says that enterprise has been checked during this period.

What of bank deposits? Have they been standing still? In 1889 the deposits in national banks amounted to $1,442,137,000 and in 1893 they were $1,556,761,000, or an increase of $114,624,000. In 1896 they were $1,668,413,000, or an increase of $111,652,000. What has occurred since and after the close of a Democratic administration? In 1913 these deposits amount to $5,953,461,000, or an increase of $4,285,047,000. And yet he says enterprise has been checked. This is not all, however, in this field of endeavor. In 1889 the deposits in savings banks were $1,444,391,000 and in 1893 they amounted to $1,808,800,000, or an increase of $364,409,000. In 1896 they amounted to $1,935,466,000, or an increase of only $126,666,000. Some little check in the savings of the people during that period, but what has happened since? The deposits in 1913 were $4,727,403,000, or an increase of $2,691,937,000. Total deposits in all the banks of the country in 1889 amounted to $3,776,410,000 and in 1893 they amounted to $4,627,223,000, or an increase of $850,813,000. In 1896 they amounted to $4,945,124,000, or an increase of only $317,901,000 during Democratic policies. In 1913 they amounted to $17,482,344,000, or an increase of $12,537,220,000, and yet the President says that enterprise was checked during this time.

What of manufacturing enterprise and industry? Is there any basis for the President's statement in the condition and progress of manufacturing? Let us see. We have the figures only by census periods. In 1890 the value of the products of our manufactures was $9,372,378,000. In 1900, after a period including four years of Democracy, the value of the product was $11,406,926,000, or an increase of $2,034,548,000. After 10 years of uninterrupted Republican policies the value of the product in 1910 was $20,672,051,000, or an increase of $9,265,125,000. In 1890 wages earned by employees in manufacturing industries were $1,891,209,000. In 1900 they amounted to $2,008,361,000, or an increase of $117,152,000. I expect most of this increase came during the six years of Republican policies. At any rate in 1910 the wages earned amounted to $3,427,037,000, or an increase of $1,418,676,000. Let these figures speak as to the truth of the President's statement that industry has been checked.

The tin-plate industry is one of the most eloquent illustrations of the beneficence of the Republican policy. In 1889 we produced no tin plate in this country and imported from abroad 735,779,000 pounds. In 1893, after we had placed a tariff upon such imports, we manufactured 123,606,000 pounds and imported 628,425,000 pounds. In 1896 we made 359,209,000 pounds and imported 385,138,000 pounds, even with the check to industry given by a Democratic tariff; but in 1912 we made 2,157,055,000 pounds and imported only 6,613,000 pounds. Would the President call that a check in this enterprise? He might if he has in mind foreign enterprise.

What of farming enterprise? Has it been checked? Let us see. In 1890 the value of our farms and farm property, according to the census, was $16,082,267,000, and in 1900 the value was $20,439,901,000, or an increase of $4,357,634,000, and I venture to say that this increase came about under the six years of Republican policies. I am justified in this statement from the fact that after 10 years of Republican policies the value of farms and farm property in 1910 was $40,991,449,000, or an increase of $20,551,548,000. In 1889 the value of farm animals was $2,507,050,000, and in 1893 the value was $2,483,506,000, or a decrease of $23,544,000. I expect this decrease came about in anticipation of Democratic legislation, because in 1896, after four years of Democratic policies, the value was $1,727,926,000, or a decrease—a decrease, mark you—of $755,580,000, while in 1913, after 17 years of uninterrupted Republican policies, the value was $5,501,783,000, or an increase—not a decrease—of $3,773,857,000. And yet the President would tell the farmers of the country that their enterprise has been checked for 20 years and seriously expect them to believe it.

What of railroad enterprise? Has it been checked? Has it been at a standstill? Let us see. In 1889 there were 161,276 miles of railroad, carrying 492,430,865 passengers in 1890 and 631,740,636 tons of freight, at 0.927 cent per ton per mile, while in 1893 there were 179,834 miles, carrying 593,560,612 passengers and 733,558,341 tons of freight, at 0.879 cent per mile, or an increase of 18,558 miles, and of passengers carried 101,129,747, and of freight, 101,817,705 tons, at a decreased rate of 0.121 cent per ton per mile. In 1896, 186,681 miles and 511,772,737 passengers and 753,716,562 tons of freight, carried at 0.806 cent per ton per mile, or an increase of 6,847 miles of road and a decrease of 81,787,875 passengers carried and an increase of 20,158,221 tons of freight, at a decrease of 0.073 cent per ton per mile. While a little more freight was carried during that period of Democratic depression, the people did not do so much traveling. But see what they have done since that time. In 1912 railroad mileage was 258,033, and passengers carried 1,004,081,346, and freight 1,844,977,673, at 0.744 cent per ton per mile, or an increase in mileage of 71,352, and of passengers carried 492,308,609—mark you, this is an increase, not a decrease—and of freight 1,091,261,111, at a decrease of 0.062 cent per ton per mile; and yet the President says "enterprise has been checked" for 20 years. Does he really mean it, or was he "chuckling" when he said it?

In 1889 the Western Union Telegraph Co. had 647,697 miles of wire and transmitted 54,108,326 messages and received $20,783,194, while in 1893 it had 739,201 miles of wire and transmitted 66,591,853 messages and received $24,978,443. This showed an increase of 91,512 miles of wire, 12,483,527 messages, and $4,195,249 in receipts. In 1896 it had 826,929 miles of wire and sent 58,760,444 messages and received $22,612,736, or, while there was an increase of 87,726 miles of wire, it sent 7,831,409 fewer messages and received $2,365,707 less in business. That was during the four years of Democratic policy. In 1913 it had 1,562,497 miles of wire, and in 1912—these are the latest dates for which I have these figures—it sent 90,000,000 messages and received $47,423,443, or an increase in mileage wire of 735,568 miles. That is more mileage than it had in 1889, almost as much mileage as it had at the close of the four years of Democratic policy in 1896 and 1897; yet from 1896 until 1912 there was an actual increase in mileage wire of 735,568 miles, in messages sent of 31,239,556, and in money received of $24,810,707. If other enterprises have not been checked more than the Western Union, they have not suffered much, and all of them would be glad to continue being "checked" in that sort of way.

Government enterprises have not been "checked" either, and their progress indicates what has been common to all industries or enterprises. In 1889 we spent in salaries to teachers in our public schools $87,568,000, and for all purposes $132,539,000, and in 1893 we spent for salaries $104,560,000, and for all purposes $164,171,000, or an increase of salaries of $16,992,000 and for all purposes $31,632,000. In 1896 we spent for salaries $117,139,000, and for all purposes $183,498,000, or during the Democratic period we increased our expenditures for teachers only $12,579,000, and for all purposes only $19,327,000. In 1912 we spent for salaries $283,798,000, and for all purposes $482,315,000, or an increase for salaries of $166,659,000, and for all purposes an increase of $298,817,000.

Mr. President, while industrial enterprise was going with leaps and bounds we also went with leaps and bounds in our educational development and in our civilizing advantages.

Would the President have us believe that our great educational enterprise has been checked for almost 20 years in the face of such evidence of progress as this?

What of our postal business? Does it show that business has been "checked"? Let us see. In 1889 stamps issued were 1,961,980,000 and postal receipts were $56,175,000, and in 1893 stamps issued were 2,750,293,000 and gross receipts were $75,896,000, or an increase in stamps of 788,313,000 and an increase in gross receipts of $19,721,000. In 1896 the stamps issued were 3,025,481,000 and the gross receipts $82,499,000, or an increase in stamps issued of 275,188,000, or only about one-third of the increase of the four preceding years under Republican policy.

Of gross receipts the amount was $6,603,000, while near the close of this 20-year period during which the President says that enterprise was checked and during the year 1913 the stamps sold were 10,962,358,000 and the gross receipts $266,619,000, or an increase in stamp sales of 7,936,877,000 and of gross receipts $184,120,000.

Need any more be said? Need any more facts be presented to show the utter absurdity of the statement that "enterprise has been checked in this country for almost 20 years"? What sort of "psychology" leads to a declaration of this sort in the face of experience and such facts as these? It is a sort new, strange, and unknown to me. Mr. President, where the figures are available they will confirm what everyone knows, that "enterprise has been checked" during the last two years, not for 20 years, but during the last two years; and that the only time it has been checked during the last 20 years has been while the Democratic Party has been in power and Democratic policies in force.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, in this world crisis, when the most powerful nations of the earth are engaged in a life-and-death struggle, the Government of the United States proposes by this bill to enter upon a novel experiment never before attempted by any nation and which can not but lead to serious international complications.

Under international law the rights and duties of the sovereign and the rights and duties of the subject are absolutely inconsistent and irreconcilable. This is because international law is a law between sovereign States solely and exclusively and because the subject owes no duty to any government or sovereign other than his own. And yet the United States in this proposed legislation is attempting to occupy this dual position of sovereign and subject in a most important branch of our international relations. In other words, under this bill the United States will have two classes of ships in which it will occupy the position of sovereign with respect to one class and the position of subject with respect to the other class. International law makes no provision for such a situation, and no nation has ever attempted to carry out such a scheme. For a great neutral Nation like the United States to make the attempt at this critical time is certainly a hazardous undertaking.

A neutral sovereign under international law is charged with the duty of maintaining a strict neutrality toward belligerents. Neutrality signifies impartiality. It means that the neutral sovereign shall in no way favor one side or the other; that he shall not do anything for one which the other regards as injurious; that he shall not aid, directly or indirectly, either belligerent. For a neutral sovereign to carry contraband or conditional contraband to one of the belligerents would clearly be a breach of neutrality, and for a neutral sovereign to carry other supplies to a belligerent—except those intended to relieve the sick and wounded—might under some circumstances be considered an unneutral act; and, again, the purchase by a neutral sovereign of the interned ships of one of the belligerents would manifestly be regarded by the other belligerent as an unneutral act. This question is entirely outside of the question about which there has been so much discussion—whether the bona fide transfer of a belligerent ship to a neutral flag is valid or void. That rule contemplates the purchase by a neutral subject, and it has little or no bearing on the broad question of neutrality involved in such purchase by a neutral sovereign.

On the other hand, the doctrine of neutrality has no application to a neutral subject. A neutral subject owes no neutral duty to belligerents. His purchase of interned ships from a belligerent, his carriage of contraband or conditional contraband to a belligerent involves no breach of neutrality. To be sure, the other belligerent may seize and confiscate his ships and their cargoes, but this is simply the right of self-protection conferred upon a belligerent by international law.

This distinction between the rights and duties of the sovereign and of the citizen or subject is illustrated in a recent circular issued by the Department of State on the subject of contraband and neutrality:

> For the Government of the United States itself to sell to a belligerent nation would be an unneutral act, but for a private individual to sell to a belligerent any product of the United States is neither unlawful nor unneutral nor within the power of the Executive to prevent or control.

Again, the ships of a neutral sovereign, under international law, are protected from the right of search, seizure, and confiscation. This is one of the privileges which attach to sovereignty under international law.

On the other hand, the ships of a neutral subject are liable to search, seizure, and confiscation. This, as already stated, is a right accorded to a belligerent on the ground of self-protection.

The United States stands before the world to-day as a great neutral power charged with the high duty of maintaining a strict neutrality and with all her public ships enjoying the immunities and privileges accorded a sovereign under international law.

Now, it is proposed by this bill that the United States shall purchase and operate merchant ships to engage in foreign commerce. It is further provided that all these ships shall be owned by a corporation in which the Government shall be the sole or majority stockholder. It is in this way that the Government is to become merely a stockholder in a private corporation, so that its position with respect to these ships will be that of a subject or private individual, and by this means it is sought to avoid all the complications which might arise if the Government were the owner.

As Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, says:

> The idea in having the Government take the controlling interest in the company instead of operating these ships directly as a Government operation is, of course, to avoid any possible complication resulting from the Government itself going into the shipping business.
> The Government would stand in relation to such a corporation exactly as any individual stockholder does to a corporation in which he is interested.

According to the theory of this bill, then, the United States is to descend from its high position of sovereign with respect to these ships and become a mere subject, and thus escape all the duties and responsibilities of neutrality which only attach themselves to the sovereign under international law. Such being the status of these ships they may be seized and confiscated for the carriage of contraband or conditional contraband as any private-owned ship; and here the responsibility of the Government would end and no charge could be made that there had been any breach of neutrality.

In order to fortify this position, the bill further provides:

> And all vessels acquired under this act or in which the United States shall otherwise be interested as owner, in whole or in part, * * * shall, when and while employed solely as merchant vessels, be in all respects subject to all laws, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels, in like manner and to the same extent as merchant vessels in private ownership when duly registered under the laws of the United States.

We have then the attempt made by this bill to relegate the United States from the position of sovereign to that of subject with regard to these ships, so that the Government will then have two classes of ships—its public ships, in which it stands in the position of sovereign with all the responsibilities of neutrality, and at the same time with all the privileges which are incident to sovereignty; and a merchant marine, in which the United States stands in the position of a neutral subject with all the rights and liabilities which attach themselves to a subject.

Now, it should be observed in this connection that while a neutral sovereign may waive his sovereign right against seizure and confiscation as to his ships, he can not in any way escape from the great neutral duty he owes to belligerents with respect to any ships he controls, directly or indirectly. A sovereign may waive a right, but he can not waive a duty, and the violation of a neutral duty is an international wrong.

The difficulty with the legal position in which it is sought by this bill to place the United States is that by the very terms of the bill itself these ships are to be controlled by the Government through a Government shipping board. From a legal standpoint, therefore, there is no escape from the proposition that these are Government-controlled ships, and that with respect to these ships the Government would be held to all the responsibilities which attach to neutrality.

But, further, the fact is that this corporation is an attempted evasion of the real truth, which is that this bill contemplates a scheme of Government ownership and control of our merchant marine. The report of the House committee on the bill bears this title, "Government ownership and operation of merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States," and the whole discussion in the Senate has proceeded on this theory.

When international law declares that the commerce of the seas is free to neutrals in time of war it means that it is free to neutral subjects and not to neutral sovereigns. The great principle of neutrality forbids a neutral sovereign from engaging in commerce in time of war.

A neutral sovereign in time of war has all he can do to protect the rights of his neutral subjects with respect to foreign commerce, and the situation becomes most perplexing and embarrassing if the sovereign himself becomes interested and thus attempts to occupy the position of both a judge and a party in interest.

For the United States to go into the shipping business at this critical time would be a perilous undertaking, unknown in the history of civilized nations, and it would surely involve grave international complications.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I deem it a duty not only to my constituents but to the business interests of the country to make some remarks in opposition to the pending bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia, to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

In an address to Congress made by the President of the United States on the 8th of December last the statement was made that—

> We have grossly erred in the way in which we have stunted and hindered the development of our merchant marine.

I fully agree with this statement, Mr. President, and have always voted, since I have been in Congress, for the various propositions which sought to develop our maritime interests by the payment of suitable subsidies, if for no other reason, because this is a method which other countries have long and successfully employed for this very purpose. In this connection may be quoted the highly appropriate remarks of one of my Democratic predecessors in this body, Senator James Ashton Bayard, of Delaware, who said in 1852:

> I am willing to trust American skill and industry in competition with any people on the globe when they stand, nation to nation, without Government interference. But if the treasury of a foreign nation is poured into the lap of individuals for the purpose of destroying the interests of my country or for building up a commercial marine at the expense of the commerce and prosperity of the United States, I for one will count no cost in counteracting such Government action on the part of Great Britain or any foreign power.

The Underwood tariff act of 1913 contains a provision which discriminates in favor of goods imported into the United States in American bottoms, but its terms are such as to make it entirely inefficient as a practical measure for the encouragement of our merchant marine, and no suggestion in regard to putting the provision in question on any effective basis has been brought forward as yet by the Democratic Party, which up to the present time has contented itself by uniformly opposing in Congress all subsidies for the relief of American shipping, and by declaring in the national platform of 1912 its opposition to "bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury" for the development of our merchant marine.

Exactly one month after the above-mentioned address to Congress the President of the United States, in his speech at Indianapolis, described the bill now before us as "a temporary measure of relief"; but it is not material whether its professed object is to permanently develop our merchant marine or to devise some temporary means for the export of our commodities during the continuance of the present European conflict. The bill now under consideration, whether supposed to bring about either or both of the objects just named, embodies an entirely novel plan, involving an investment of some $50,000,000 of the public funds, a large part of which will be money throw away. The whole scheme is of very doubtful constitutionality, absolutely vicious in its economic principles, highly dangerous as a precedent for future legislation, and fraught with infinite peril to the maintenance of our peaceful relations with other countries. It is proposed that the Government itself should go into the shipping business, not directly, but by the artifice of subscribing to the stock of a corporation which Congress is to create for that purpose, this corporation to be managed by a shipping board consisting in part of members of the Cabinet, who are to purchase or build ships and operate a vast transportation business on the basis of "moderate charges."

As it is admitted, even by the advocates of the bill, that the business of the proposed corporation will be conducted at a loss, "at least at first," it is evident that the minority stockholders, if any, will be confined to those who would be willing to lose their money in the enterprise for political or even for sentimental reasons. When we consider that the cost of shipbuilding in America is from 25 to 50 per cent higher than in other countries and that it costs about $17,000 more a year to operate a ship of 3,000 tons under the American flag than under the British flag, it is plain to be seen that no one would think of subscribing to the stock of the proposed corporation on the basis of a remunerative investment. Further, the pending bill is in plain disregard of the spirit if not of the letter of the Democratic national platform of 1912, since the money which will be lost by reason of the "moderate charges," or otherwise, in the operation of the vessels controlled by the shipping board, will come out of the Public Treasury, and is nothing more nor less than a money subsidy masquerading under the guise of a deficit in the cost of operating.

Notwithstanding the various protestations made, it strikes me, Mr. President, that the fallacious anticipation of the Government's supposed ability to purchase and use the foreign ships now lying in neutral ports and the large patronage which would be controlled by the administration through the shipping board are the two considerations which have had most weight in the formulation and advocacy of the proposed bill.

The first of these considerations is set forth as follows by Secretary McAdoo, in his speech before the Commercial Club of Chicago on the 9th ultimo:

> Some timid people have argued that if the Government is interested as a stockholder in a shipping company and a ship of such company would be seized by a belligerent and brought into a prize court, the sovereignty of the Government would be involved. There is no ground whatever for this view. If the Government operated ships outright, just as it operates the vessels of our Navy, an awkward situation of this character might arise, but where a nation is merely a stockholder or the sole stockholder in a private corporation its sovereignty is not and can not be directly involved if the ships of such a corporation become the subjects of litigation in a prize court concerning any issue which does not involve the Government itself. The Government would stand in relation to such a corporation exactly as any individual stockholder does to a corporation in which he is interested. A suit against the corporation does not necessarily involve the shareholders.

As the senior Senator from New York has conclusively shown, the above contentions of the Secretary of the Treasury are based upon wholly erroneous misconceptions of international law. Although it is denied that the State Department has received as yet any communication on the subject from Sir Edward Grey, there can be little doubt but that a statement from him will be forthcoming in due course of time. If our Government should buy and attempt to utilize the German or Austrian ships, the United States would inevitably be brought into direct collision with Great Britain and other belligerent powers.

The other consideration, in regard to which a discreet silence has been observed up to the present moment, is that the regulations of the classified civil service can not be applied to the multitude of employees of the proposed corporation, which is to be organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, and that the appointment of such employees will be controlled and their salaries fixed by the shipping board, in which two members of the Cabinet are to sit. No doubt this feature commends itself to some of the advocates of the bill, and particularly to a certain member of the Cabinet who, in a recently published letter, stated to his correspondent that he "had enough experience in politics to know how valuable workers are when a campaign is on and how difficult it is to find suitable rewards." No "deserving Democrat," it is apparent, need have any apprehensions of his failure to pass a civil-service examination, as political influence will be the only requirement needed to secure a coveted appointment at the hands of the Democratic shipping board.

In considering the details of the pending bill we are confronted, in the first place, by the highly socialistic feature of the Government's undertaking, either directly or indirectly, to enter into the domain of private business, a step which would be followed by the entire destruction of our privately owned merchant marine, as it could not hope to compete with the Government, which would have no interest to pay on the cost of its investment and be in position to disregard all considerations of business profit in the operation of its lines.

Further, the advocates of the proposed bill lay particular stress upon the high freight rates which now obtain and upon the deficiency of vessels in the ocean carrying trade. It is to be observed that the lack of ships is not the only factor which has determined the advance in freight rates. These have been seriously affected by the very high rates of insurance on vessels and cargoes incident to the danger of their capture, as well as of their destruction by mines, and by the fact, so far as Europe is concerned, that the deficiency in dockage room and the lack of stevedores have involved excessive delay in foreign ports, which necessarily puts the owners of vessels to greatly enhanced expense. It is entirely true, however, that the number of steamships engaged in international trade has been reduced by the absorption of many of them for war purposes, by the destruction of many others by the different belligerents, and, lastly, by the elimination from the carrying business of a great number of German and Austrian merchant vessels, which are tied up in their home or in neutral ports to avoid capture. In view of the fact that all the other steamships of the merchant marine throughout the world are now actively engaged in the transportation of freight, it is not easy to see how the number of ocean carriers can be increased immediately, except by purchasing and putting under our flag the German and Austrian ships just mentioned, which, if attempted, would result in their immediate capture by the other belligerent powers. As it is evident, then, that new vessels must be constructed, which would take at the very least a year to accomplish, how far safer and more economical is the suggestion of the New York Chamber of Commerce that the Government should induce private parties to build new ships by agreeing for a term of years to pay them a bonus equal to the excess of the cost of construction at home over the cost of construction abroad. Such a plan would involve a comparatively small outlay of Government funds and at once give employment to thousands of idle and needy workmen all over the country; and, when coupled with proper amendments to our navigation laws, would go far to reestablish our merchant marine in the shortest possible time. In brief, Mr. President, my judgment is that private enterprise should be encouraged, not stifled.

Another question which arises, even more serious in its consequences, is the precedent which would be established by the passage of the bill. If the Government is to create a corporation in which it is to own at least 51 per cent of the stock and ultimately takes over all transportation of goods by water, which would be the inevitable result, a direct precedent is established for the Government to likewise absorb and take over all interests which transport goods by land. The present Secretary of State, some years ago, advocated a measure of this very kind, and it would not be at all surprising if it were seriously proposed later to create a national railroad corporation for such a purpose in which the Government was to be the controlling stockholder. A member of the Cabinet is already advocating the public ownership of all telegraph and telephone systems of the country, and Mr. Walsh, chairman of the United States Commission on Industrial Relations, in a recent address says that the "control of the coal fields in this country should be taken from the hands of all private corporations and vested in the Government." Mr. President, if the management of all these vast interests is to be under Government control, what unlimited power would be given to the Chief Magistrate of the Nation, and what revolutionary changes would be made in our institutions! Those who objected to a third presidential term would promptly be called "reactionaries," and no doubt we would have before long fourth and fifth terms, and probably Presidents for life. As to the rights of the States, they would become purely imaginary.

I shall now endeavor to briefly discuss some of the international features which are germane to the present bill. The fifty-fifth article of the declaration of London of February 26, 1909, provides that—

> The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag, effected before the outbreak of hostilities, is valid, unless it is proved that such transfer was made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed. * * *
> Where the transfer was effected more than 30 days before the outbreak of hostilities there is an absolute presumption that it is valid if it is unconditional, complete, and in conformity with the laws of the countries concerned, and if its effect is such that neither the control of, nor the profits arising from the employment of, the vessel remain in the same hands as before the transfer. * * *

In regard to the transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag after the outbreak of hostilities, the fifty-sixth article of the above declaration lays down the following rule:

> The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag effected after the outbreak of hostilities is void unless it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed.

While it is true that this declaration was never ratified by the President of the United States and consequently does not bind our Government, it is important to note that the principles enunciated in the articles just quoted have been accepted by Great Britain, France, Russia, and Germany as being international law in the case. These countries are the most important participants in the present European conflict, and were the United States to purchase a German vessel and put it under the protection of our flag, the other belligerents would inevitably ignore such action on our part and be guided by the provisions of the fifty-fifth and fifty-sixth articles of the declaration referred to by which they are bound. The pretense that this Government can escape its liability by hiding behind a corporation of its own creation is, as previously stated, absolutely untenable. Unless the purchase of the vessels of any belligerent be expressly prohibited, as proposed in the amendment which was offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts, there is very great danger of our being drawn into international complications and possibly of being forced to take sides in the present European war, a step to which the immense majority of our American people are inalterably opposed.

Mr. President, the occupant of the exalted office, who, if he has not drawn up, has proposed and inspired the measure we are now discussing, and upon which he so urgently insists, has seen fit to assert that the "self-styled friends of business," as he calls those Members of the Senate who do not agree with his views, "are seeking to defy the Nation." There are all kinds of assertions, Mr. President, including those with which we are all familiar, either made in utter ignorance of the facts or in utter disregard of the facts—usual known as "bluff." Then there are other assertions which, though made in good faith, are entirely worthless, either from lack of proper information or from an intense partisanship which seems to benumb the perceptive faculties. But it all comes to this, Mr. President, that assertions are not arguments and count for little unless supported by proof. I shall endeavor to show that the contention of the Chief Magistrate of the United States that the Members of the Senate who do not agree with him "are defying the Nation" is an untenable proposition. In the first place, this statement involves the assumption that the Nation, irrespective of party, has rallied to the support of President Wilson and his shipping bill. Mr. President, a state of mind which believes that the national Republican Party of this country is behind the President of the United States in any of his policies is beyond my powers of conception. The Republicans, almost as a unit, strongly disapprove of his Mexican policy, which has resulted in the sacrifice of so many American lives, in the destruction of such an enormous amount of private property belonging to citizens of the United States, and in the expenditure of so many millions of public funds as a sequence to the occupation of Vera Cruz, and the maintenance of large military and naval forces along the Mexican border and seacoast. It is my belief, also, that the great mass of Republican voters have disagreed with President Wilson on the question of the imposition of tolls on American ships passing through the Panama Canal. Both of these issues, however, fade into insignificance when compared with the emphatic Republican disapproval of his tariff policy as enacted in the Underwood bill—a policy which has done incalculable damage to business, thrown millions of people out of employment, and brought about intense want and suffering throughout the land, and especially in the industrial centers of our population. I shall read in this connection a recent circular of the "home relief committee" of my own county and State, which is engaged in the good work of relieving the most serious cases of distress. The chairman of this committee is the wife of the governor of the State of Delaware, and the other officers and members of the committee are the wives or sisters of our best citizens, some of whom are of Democratic faith:

HOME RELIEF.

To the citizens of New Castle County:

Probably never before in your lifetime has there been so much real suffering and lack of the necessaries of life among our people here in Delaware as there is to-day. A man with a wife and little ones who earns but $10 or $12 a week when at work can never live more than a day or two ahead of actual want, and a few months of enforced idleness bring hunger and destitution to his home and those dependent upon him. If you would be convinced, go into almost any section of our city and look for yourself, or inquire of those who know, and you will learn at least a part of the misery around you. A few dollars wisely expended will go far.

Realizing this condition and the impossibility of meeting it through the ordinary channels of public or private charity, the resources of which are sadly overtaxed, the Home Relief Committee was organized to do what it can through the collection of money, clothing, food, and fuel, and the distribution of these where a careful investigation shows they are sadly needful.

We Delawareans must do our duty to our own people here at home. We must see to it that men, women, and little children are not cold and hungry at our very doors, and we must further remember that many men and women are too proud to ask for assistance.

We can assure you that anything you may give will be wisely used where it is most needed, and we earnestly request that you will send what you can in money, clothing, food, fuel, or a job for the unemployed man or women to

HOME RELIEF COMMITTEE,
Clayton House, Wilmington, Del.

Officers of home relief committee: Chairman, Mrs. Charles R. Miller; vice chairman, Mrs. Preston Lea; treasurer, Mrs. Henderson Weir; secretary, Mrs. William G. Coxe.

Finance committee: Mrs. Henry P. Scott, Mrs. Charles Gawthrop, Miss E. N. Draper.

Committee on sewing: Mrs. J. P. Nields, chairman.

Committee on clothing, provisions, and coal: Mrs. Samuel Rumford, chairman.

Committee on employment: Mrs. W. C. Spruance, chairman.

Committee on investigation: Mrs. W. S. Bergland, chairman.

In further evidence of the existing conditions in my State, I quote the following letter which appeared in a Delaware newspaper under date of January 26:

To the farmers attending the Wilmington markets:

On account of the depression in business at the present time there are many people of our city out of employment and in need of the necessaries of life. When they had employment they patronized our city markets. Now, in their trouble, can you give them help by sending donations on Saturday, January 30, from 9 a. m. to 4 p. m., to the Odd Fellows' Building, banquet room, Tenth and King Streets. Every little help from you will be appreciated by the committee.

It is true that recent orders from foreign Governments have put life here and there into some of the industrial establishments throughout the United States, which, to a limited extent, has alleviated the general situation; but these orders are sporadic in their nature and uncertain in their duration, as they largely depend upon the fortunes of war and must cease upon the conclusion of peace.

I repeat, Mr. President, that the attitude of Republicans in general in regard to the Chief Magistrate of the Nation and his policies has been largely brought about by the deplorable character of the tariff legislation enacted upon his recommendation and with his full approval, and possibly I may be tempted later to enlarge somewhat on this issue. It seems hardly worth while, however, at the present time to elaborate further upon the opposition of the Republican Party to President Wilson, and although he styles this party a "minority party," the presidential elections next year will definitely settle that question, and perhaps not at all to his liking.

Now, Mr. President, I go a step further, and claim that the opposition to the ship-purchasing bill is not by any means confined to the Republican Party, but that there are a very large number of Democrats who are opposed to the policies of the bill, and do not hesitate to say so. This fact is established not only by frequent individual expressions of opinion, but by the statements openly made in the columns of many Democratic newspapers.

Mr. President, a very fair indication of the feeling throughout the United States in regard to this shipping bill—certainly among the merchants and business men of the country—is afforded by an examination of the resolutions in regard to the bill which have been adopted by the chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and other nonpartisan mercantile associations of our cities and towns. The object, in general terms, of these organizations is to promote the commercial and industrial development as well as the civic welfare of such cities or towns, and on the rolls of membership are found the names of the vast majority of the intelligent, efficient, and successful men of affairs in their respective localities. The resolutions emanating from the business organizations of the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and New Orleans are worthy of particular attention not only because they are exceedingly strong and outspoken in their condemnation of the shipping bill, but because many of the business men who framed them are speaking as experts thoroughly familiar with the various questions relating to over-sea traffic. The Chamber of Commerce of New York suggests some alternative measures to meet the situation, to one of which I have already referred, and which would seem to be much wiser and more efficacious, as well as infinitely safer, than the radical provisions of the pending bill. Had the parties interested been accorded a public hearing, which would have been the natural and proper course to take in view of the far-reaching importance of the proposed legislation, all alternative measures could have been considered and discussed on their merits; but it would seem that the majority of the Committee on Commerce was determined to press the bill to its passage at all hazards and to deny it the full and careful investigation which its importance demanded. I shall now read the resolutions adopted in my own State by the Chamber of Commerce of Wilmington, Del., an organization composed of all the leading business men of that city, both Republicans and Democrats:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Wilmington, Del.

Whereas it appears that a bill, commonly known as the Government shipping bill, is now pending for final action in the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas it appears that this bill, if enacted, would work a hardship upon the business interests of the country and tends directly toward government ownership of common carriers, a policy to which we are unalterably opposed; and

Whereas it would appear that this proposal is without genuine merit: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That it be the sense of the board of directors and of the membership council of the chamber of commerce, representing as they do every trade and profession in the city of Wilmington, that the passage of this act is hurtful and detrimental to the interests of the United States in general and Wilmington and Delaware in particular; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives from Delaware be furnished a copy of this resolution and a letter forwarded to them by the president of the chamber of commerce requesting them to vote against the so-called Government shipping bill; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be spread upon the minutes of both the board of directors and the membership council.

Adopted January 19, 1915.

Attest:

NEIL B. SINCLAIR,
Managing Secretary.

Now, Mr. President, notwithstanding the views of the Chief Magistrate of the Nation, as expressed in his Indianapolis speech, in regard to the small measure of importance to be attached to newspaper editorials so far as their influence on public opinion is concerned, a great many people will be found to disagree with him. As the newspapers of the country are conducted on a business basis the editors or owners, in spite of personal bias, are forced to reckon with public sentiment if they do not wish to see their profits curtailed; and, therefore, Mr. President, when newspapers and periodicals all over the country seem to develop a certain unanimity of view in regard to any public question it is an indication, to my mind, of the trend of public opinion and a very strong indication at that. I shall not unduly extend my speech by citing a great mass of newspaper articles in opposition to the bill which have appeared in both Republican and Democratic newspapers, but will content myself with reading a few of these as indicative of their general tone.

From the New York Sun, January 15, 1915:

WHAT BUSINESS FREEDOM MEANS.

One of President Wilson's favorite phrases is "setting business free." As he conceives the mission of the Democratic Party under his administration, it has been the emancipation of economic enterprise in the United States. In some of his more fervid rhetorical moments he has proclaimed again and again that "We," alluding to Congress and himself, or himself and Congress, "have freed business."

There will be two opinions about this, but there ought to be no difference of opinion about the splendid opportunity which offers to set the American shipping business free. Once the country had a shipping industry which filled the ports of all the world. The American merchant marine was a just cause of American pride. That marine has all but gone, and although the chance presented by the European war is the chance of the country's lifetime, the Wilson administration not only proposes to do nothing which would release American energy and ambition to assert themselves in the ocean carrying trade, it proposes to do something which would make it impossible for our shipping industry to regain its lost laurels.

In his recent annual message the President said:

"To correct the many mistakes by which we have discouraged and all but destroyed the merchant marine of the country, to retrace the steps by which we have, it seems almost deliberately, withdrawn our flag from the seas, except where, here and there, a ship of war is bidden carry it or some wandering yacht displays it, would take a long time and involve many detailed items of legislation, and the trade which we ought immediately to handle would disappear or find other channels while we debated the items."

Can anybody look about him and believe that statement after seeing what is going on in our commerce and finance? Our foreign trade is fast attaining new record aggregates. In the six weeks to January 9 there was an average export balance of $23,666,000 a week. This is at the rate of $1,237,000,000 a year, and the results so far achieved have been accomplished by private enterprise, by American business, without the least adulteration of any governmental content. * * *

If the Government is launched in the shipping industry by the establishment of a Government merchant marine, the American shipping business will not be freed; it will be put in heavier irons. This is as certain as the taxes which have been increasing in the Wilson régime.

The possibilities of growth of a Government merchant navy will be strictly limited by the wholly artificial character of the undertaking. The experiment will prevent private capital and effort from engaging in shipping ventures, and when the governmental mistake is publicly recognized it will be too late. The opportunity of which advantage might now be taken to foster the creation of a great American merchant fleet will have passed away—probably forever.

All that we shall have to show for it will be the Government merchant ships selling at their junk price and a pile of Government bonds issued to pay for the initial cost of the Government fleet and fund the deficit left by operating costs. Yet if American business were to be set free by a prompt removal of the shipping-trade shackles described in the President's annual message, what vast employment for American brains, labor, and capital is assured by the exhibit which the facts of our external commerce and the figures of our foreign exchange are now making.

From the Washington Post, January 24, 1915:

GOVERNMENT-OWNED SHIPS.

Is there a shortage in shipping which requires the Government to come to the rescue of American commerce by building or buying ships?

Steamship men insist that there is no shortage. They admit that rates are high, but they suggest that the demand of European nations for supplies are so insistent that increased rates naturally follow, especially in view of the withdrawal of German and Austrian vessels from the seas. The rates to European countries are from 50 to 500 per cent higher than they were before the war. From the United States to South America the rates have increased somewhat on account of high insurance rates, etc., while the rates to Asia are hardly above normal.

The increased rates, however, are temporary. The Government could not count upon receiving the rates that are now paid. At the end of the war, with more shipping released and the war's demands satisfied, rates would tumble, probably below normal. The Government lines would then be facing hard times and ships owned by individual Americans would be driven out of business. Probably the United States Treasury would be drawn upon to prevent a deficit in the Government steamship business.

Cotton is going forward to Europe in nearly normal quantities. Wheat, horses, and other supplies urgently needed by warring nations are being shipped in unprecedented quantities. Evidently there is no lack of ships for this very lucrative trade.

As for South America, shipping men offer vessels for all the freight that is in sight. The United Fruit Co.'s steamers come to this country loaded with bananas, and return to Central and South America empty. The president of that company recently testified that he would make special rates to any American exporters who desired to ship goods to South America.

Is it the cost of shipping and not the scarcity that calls for a Government-owned line? Then the Government must be prepared to meet foreign competition. In peaceful times foreign ships are operated much more cheaply than American ships. This is accomplished by the employment of Lascar and Chinese crews, and by reason of more lenient shipping laws in foreign countries. Would the United States Government employ Chinese crews or would it employ Americans at the American rate of wages? If it did the latter, it would have to charge higher freight rates than its foreign competitors or make up the difference out of the Treasury.

From the New York Times, January 20, 1915:

"FINISHING" THE SHIPPING BILL.

Washington dispatches say that the Senate committee is putting the "finishing touches" upon the Government shipping bill. That seems superfluous for two reasons. The action of the caucus was almost fatal, and the trade returns published yesterday ought to be quite so. An increase of exports in December, 1914, over the figures of December, 1913, by $13,070,419 indicates no such deficiency of shipping that the Government should intervene to supply it at the cost and risk of the taxpayers. That is true also of the year's total exports, which have been exceeded but twice. The excess of exports over imports by the great sum of $131,863,077 surpasses every previous December, and has been equaled only in a single month in the Nation's history. The fact is that only one considerable class of exports might have been increased by shipments in Government boats. A Government line might have carried contraband in ships acquired from the belligerents more freely than privately owned shipping. But that way of making trouble will hardly be proposed as a reason for proceeding with the Government line. Those who have our moral approval of their contentions are in control of the seas, and can get all the contraband they need. To supply contraband at a profit to those who, on the merits, we think ought not to win this war, questions of friendship apart, is not a duty of government.

It is especially fatuous to provide Government shipping, or private shipping with Government aid, when the necessity of the case is not so much shipping as facilities for loading and unloading. To the facts on this point as given by carrier's spokesmen on this side the ocean may now be added incontestable evidence from the other side. Twenty-one vessels arrived at Liverpool last Thursday, and not one of them was able to get a berth to discharge its cargo. Sir Norman Hill, in an official report on the situation, said: "The main cause, beyond question, is the shortage of labor, not only on the quays but in the transport services, by which the quays are cleared."

It would be idle to add to such congestion by providing more ships. The trouble is not one of trade, but of war. Some ports are closed, throwing more business upon others than they could do in favorable times. Many dock laborers have enlisted, and others are earning such high wages that they are independent. Commerce is not running in accustomed lines. Strange boats are on unfamiliar routes and require more attention than liners running on routine. If any government should intervene, it is not ours. We are shipping full volumes of goods at our own prices, and the freight is paid by the buyers. They should worry, not we. We should worry only if those who are more eager than wise should thrust us into an experiment which is not only unnecessary from a commercial sense, but is obnoxious politically. No Democrat can keep the name and support a subsidy scheme concealing Government ownership and operation. In proportion as the "finishing touches" meet these objections, the bill will lose attractiveness to those who now support it because of these defects.

From the New York Tribune, January 15, 1915:

THE TROUBLE WITH THE GOVERNMENT-OWNERSHIP SHIPPING BILL.

The report of the chamber of commerce's special committee on the American merchant marine in the foreign trade, presented yesterday, * * * offers some suggestions for Government aid in rebuilding a satisfactory merchant marine. To clear the way for these it announces its absolute opposition to President Wilson's Government purchase and operation measure. In that, we believe, it reflects the nearly unanimous sentiment of the commercial bodies of the country. These bodies realize that a restored merchant marine must rest on a broader economic basis than Government ownership. It must be a growth in which the business world itself has vital interest. The entry of the Government into this field as an owner and operator would practically limit the development of the merchant marine to the extent of the Government's participation. Private enterprise would be frozen out, instead of being encouraged to take a hand in the restoration.

What the United States hopes to get is a real deep-sea service of its own, such as it used to have. But the Government would be reluctant to go beyond the minimum limit of investment. There development would stop, private competition having been killed off. What is the great fault of the Wilson scheme? It would not spend a dollar out of the Treasury to encourage the private investor to spend four or five dollars. It would simply use the Government's credit to drive all private capital out of the ocean-carrying trade.

The special committee naturally prefers some plan which will bring the Government and the private investor into helpful cooperation. It suggests that the Government create a fund to guarantee the bonds of American shipping companies which put new vessels into commission. That is a form of Treasury aid similar in character to subventions, subsidies, and the other devices through which other countries have stimulated the growth of their merchant marine. But any form of aid involves financial assistance, and there is no difference in results between taking money out of the Treasury to aid private shipping ventures and running Government vessels at a loss and then charging the deficit to the taxpayers.

The South American trade would be helped, the special committee says, by amending the ocean-mail law so as to allow $4 a mile to vessels of 16 knots as well as to those of 20 knots, and $2 a mile to all vessels making 12 knots. These changes have been several times advocated in the Tribune, but Congress would never sanction them.

If we are to get anywhere in re-creating an American merchant marine, we must build on what we have and stick to the general theory of Government aid, not Government monopoly. National ownership might be tolerable as a means of starting one or two new lines to South America for use after trade conditions in South America become more normal. But the national ownership on a big scale would cost more than it is worth, and would leave us eventually worse off as a maritime nation than we now are.

From American Industries for January, 1915:

GOVERNMENT-OWNED SHIPS.

Judged by the standards of sound business, the proposed Government line of merchant ships is foredoomed to failure. There is no pressing demand for ships to carry American cargoes to justify the entry of the United States Government into the marine carrying trade, as President Wilson urges in his recent message to Congress. A sincere policy of economy in national affairs would dictate caution in investing the money of the people in an enterprise which is so very uncertain in its results that private capital, proverbial in its wise timidity, hesitates to enter it under present laws. And if the bill now pending in the Senate is passed and a line of Government-owned ships established, it is certain, in the light of past experience, that they will only add unnecessarily to the increasing cost of government with no adequate compensation to the taxpayers for the expenditure.

After reviewing the trade conditions occasioned by the war, President Wilson, in urging the passage of the shipping bill, premises his demands upon the assumption that there is a dearth of bottoms available for the transportation of American products to foreign lands, and that this dearth must immediately be removed if the United States is not to be outstripped in the race for foreign trade. He said: "How are we to carry our goods to the empty markets of which I have spoken if we have not the ships? How are we to build up a great trade if we have not the certain and constant means of transportation, upon which all profitable and useful commerce depends? And how are we to get the ships if we wait for the trade to develop them? To correct the many mistakes by which we have discouraged and all but destroyed the merchant marine of the country; to retrace the steps by which we have, it seems almost deliberately, withdrawn our flag from the seas, except where, here and there, a ship of war is bidden to carry it or some wandering yacht displays it, would take a long time and involve many detailed items of legislation, and the trade which we ought immediately to handle would disappear or find other channels while we debate the items."

The President has evidently been misinformed as to the bottoms available for the transport of American goods. In war times freights are always unusually high, and despite the 5,000,000 tons of belligerent shipping now idle, the high rates of which shippers complain have attracted many small craft to American waters, which are anxious but unable to obtain charters.

The Boston Maritime Association reports that there are tied up in Boston four steel steamships for which cargoes can not be found, and the association has a list of 200,000 tons of shipping available at rates high enough to warrant a round trip. It is reported that a French line is sending 18 small boats to American harbors for grain cargoes because these boats can not operate on their usual routes abroad. A great number of Scandinavian tramps have been attracted to our neutral ports, and shippers experience little difficulty in obtaining ships at prevailing rates.

Obviously the Government could not profitably cut the prevailing freight rates. It would be forced to compete with private shipowners on an equal footing or literally throw into the sea the money of the taxpayers. If President Wilson desires to establish a permanent American merchant marine to compete with the ships of other nations, let him urge the repeal of those laws which in his message he admits have driven our flag from the seas.

It should be written as the first axiom of economics that no business will thrive unless it be profitable. It matters not whether that business be conducted by the Government or by private individuals, unless it be profitable it will die. If the pernicious labor laws with regard to American ships are repealed and that business freed from Government restrictions, aided instead of oppressed, the American flag will again be restored to the seas. Other expedients are useless.

Other reasons are not wanting to argue against the President's proposition, and among them, as we have said before, is that out-and-out socialism has no place in our national life.

The Boston Post of January 9, 1915, says:

As evidences multiply that the administration leaders in Congress are determined to push for the passage of the ship-purchase bill, so do the outspoken protests of many Democratic newspapers against the measure.

The following appeared in the Philadelphia Public Ledger of the 11th ultimo:

The more the ship-purchase bill is discussed the weightier the objections to it are seen to be. It is false in principle and would be pernicious in practice.

The following is from the Chicago Daily Tribune of January 25:

The Democrats have decided to let the opponents of the shipping bill do all the discussing and "debating" on the floor of the Senate. They are charging a filibuster, which is absurd—since there has been no real discussion of the bill in Congress—and thus furnishing an excuse for their silence.

Whom do they expect to deceive? The case against the bill is so strong and so conclusive that the silence of its sponsors can but be construed to mean sheer inability to defend it or to meet the many objections that have been raised against it by business bodies, by leading newspapers, including Democratic organs, and by sound thinkers in and out of public life.

Let us briefly state some of these objections.

The bill spells serious complications with foreign powers, seizures and captures that may lead to perilous war agitation. It is a "purchase" bill, and it is plain that ships now in profitable use can not be purchased and ought not to be purchased, for they would add nothing to available facilities, and the cost of purchase would be excessive and abnormal because of the war and the ill-timed appearance of our Government as a purchaser of ships. On the other hand, to buy idle, interned ships is to offend certain powers and to invite seizure, delay, strife, and hazard. It is to take a leap into the dark zones of international law and belligerent policies. The French, for example, have never recognized the right to sell or buy an interned ship during the progress of a conflict.

The bill is neither an emergency measure nor a permanent one. It has the faults of both kinds of crude shipping legislation and the merits of neither.

It is based on a misrepresentation of the facts. There is no "lack of carrying facilities." What difficulty there is is due to the war, and that can not be magically removed by a government line of ships.

As to trade with Latin America, what is wanting is credit, banking, advertising facilities, knowledge of Latin needs and tastes, and the wherewithal to pay for our goods. If we had cargoes to carry there and back, the ships would be forthcoming.

The bill does not remedy a single defect in our navigation laws. It can not develop a merchant marine, because it falsely diagnoses the trouble and prescribes the wrong and futile remedy—nay, it prescribes a remedy that would aggravate the trouble. The bill has discouraged and, if enacted into law, would handicap and stop private enterprise where the great need admittedly is the fostering and stimulating of such enterprise. Private capital can not compete with the Government, as the latter neither counts cost nor keeps books properly and pays deficits out of taxation.

Should the war end soon, the "emergency" theory of the bill would fall to the ground, while the "permanent" theory would simply fail to stand up and take its place. The Government would find itself in a business for which it is not fitted, and politics and spoils would prevent its letting go and acknowledging its egregious blunder.

This is the worst of all possible times to plan or legislate for "permanent" upbuilding of a merchant marine. Everything in foreign trade and shipping is abnormal and artificial and "the wisdom of Congress" is grotesquely unequal to the task of separating the accidental obstacles from those attributable to our own laws, our safety standards, our wages, our financial conditions, our national habits and ideas of investment and profit.

I will now read a remarkable editorial from the Lexington Herald of Tuesday, January 12, 1915, the only daily morning paper in central Kentucky:

In a striking speech delivered by President Wilson at Indianapolis on Jackson Day, which is well worth perusal by those who wish to become acquainted with the thoughts of the President and to understand his purposes, he states: "Many of those who are fighting the ship-purchase bill now before Congress are misguided, others are blind, but most of them are ignorant."

There is an old story that a man away from home received a telegram saying, "Your mother-in-law is dead. Shall we embalm, cremate, or bury?" Promptly answered the living son-in-law, "Take no chances. Do all three."

We feel somewhat as did that son-in-law. We know the President, as always, is accurate in his statement that those who oppose the ship-purchase bill are misguided, blind, or ignorant, and our opposition to that bill is so strong that we plead guilty to being all three—misguided in our belief that it is in violation of every Democratic principle and tenet; blind in our inability to see how it will benefit American commerce; ignorant of the purposes of those who advocate such a bill instead of frankly advocating subsidies, from which greater benefits would come.

We have been utterly misguided in our study of history if such a bill is in accord with any principle enunciated by a Democratic platform or approved heretofore by a Democratic President or a Democratic Congress.

We know of nothing in any handbook of Democratic principles that justifies the Government entering into competition with private capital. We are unable to understand or to appreciate that conception of Democratic policy that thinks it proper to blaze the way for the Government to enter into business in competition with private enterprise, and that, too, in a business that requires expert knowledge and long training.

We are blind, utterly blind, to the advantages that will come from this bill. No reasonable man can advocate the use of Government-owned ships in European trade. No man who appreciates the temper of the American people can contemplate the possibility of the seizure of a Government-owned ship by the warships of a foreign nation without realizing the imminent danger of involving us in war with the country making the seizure.

The President saw fit to protest to England—which is, in fact, a protest to all the allies—against the seizure, examination, and detention of ships carrying goods to neutral countries. In the papers of Sunday, the day after the publication of the President's speech, there were accounts that the allies would probably seize a ship that, after the declaration of war, had been purchased and transferred to American register upon the ground that the purchase was not bona fide.

Is the United States Government to purchase ships that are now interned and pay to the citizens of the warring countries millions of dollars without protest from the other countries involved in this war? Are we to use such ships in the European trade with the practical certainty that we will become involved through the seizure, search, and detention of those ships? We do not believe that one even so blind as we admit ourselves to be can face with equanimity such a prospect.

There has been no revelation of a method by which we can promptly use such Government-owned ships for the purpose of developing the South American trade, about which we hear so much, and which will eventually be of so great value, but which must be developed along the lines that have been laid through the centuries by the prejudices and the customs of the residents of South America.

There is no intimation of the plan of the Government to secure warehouses and docking privileges in the South American republics. The bagatelle of $30,000,000 proposed in the bill, which is but a fraction of the ultimate amount that would be required, for the ostensible purpose of creating a navy of merchant ships, would not in any appreciable way relieve conditions as they now exist.

Admitting, as we frankly do, and always shall, that the President is accurate and just in branding those who disagree with him as misguided and blind, we admit also that we are ignorant and plead with all earnestness that we be enlightened. From whom are the ships to be purchased? What plans have been made for the purchase of ships? To the citizens of what country is the money for the purchase to be paid? What is the plan for the handling of the ships? How are we to secure warehouses and docking privileges? Why does the bill provide that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be the virtual dictator of the purchase, management, and operation of these Government-owned ships? Why is it that the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Commerce, under one or the other of which surely such a traffic should be operated, are overlooked and the Secretary of the Treasury is chosen as the one to operate a commercial enterprise?

There are many other questions about which we are ignorant, but we at present are intensely anxious to be enlightened as to these. And with all the deference possible we suggest most humbly that the President would be more apt to win the approval of the country by giving reasons than by uttering denunciation of those who disapprove this bill and question the plan that has been proposed.

In conclusion, I will quote a few extracts from Delaware newspapers, irrespective of party, in order to give some idea of the public opinion in my own State.

The Morning News, of Wilmington, Del., under date of the 25th ultimo, says:

Despite the many and formidable objections to the ship-purchase bill President Wilson and the Democratic leaders at Washington are determined in order to force the measure through to go to the extent of holding Congress in extra session. The bill has been made a party caucus measure, which means that Democratic Senators who oppose it when a vote is taken will be accused of party disloyalty. * * *

The bill as it now stands provides for the purchase by the Government of a controlling interest in a corporation to be organized under the laws of the District of Columbia for the purchase and operation of merchant steamers. The controlling board will consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and three members to be appointed from private life. In other words, the Government is to enter the marine business in competition with private capital, a rather strange proceeding for the Democrats to foster, judging by Democratic principles of the past.

The obstacle that the Democrats have to overcome is filibustering to prevent a vote. Many of the Republican leaders are so thoroughly convinced, aside from other objections, that the measure would lead this country into entanglements with foreign nations that they purpose to debate the bill until the end of this session at the risk of having an extra session held.

The Democrats are flying in the face of sound public sentiment. They should take no risk of stirring up new complications with any of the nations at war. * * *

I now quote from the same paper, under date of January 28, 1915:

Aside from the probable complications with other nations that would follow the passage of the ship-purchase bill, former President Taft in an interview objects to it on the ground that the measure would be extending the policy of Government ownership, something that he thinks unwise. The Democrats hope to win the support of the Progressives on this Government-ownership plea. Should the bill become a law and the Government purchase and operate ships, although the proposal is said in some quarters to be for temporary emergencies alone, it might be a very long time before the Government would decide to give up this marine business.

Despite traditional Democratic principles, which have been averse to the Government meddling in private business, the present administration and the Democratic Party, as a consequence of the teachings of Mr. Bryan and those of his school, have done more to promote governmental activity, have taken longer steps toward Federal usurpation of private business, than any Republican administration has ever done.

If the Government engages in the shipping business, it will be difficult to induce private capital to compete with it. * * *

Considered from this point of view—the Government engaging in private business—the wisdom of passing the ship-purchase bill may well be questioned, and this phase of the proposal is sufficient to condemn the measure and to justify the Republicans in strenuously opposing it, notwithstanding the determination of the Democrats to go to extraordinary length to force the project through, their latest move being the decision to hold night sessions of the Senate in order to wear out the Republicans.

The Every Evening, of the same city, under date of January 25, says:

It is most unfortunate that the Democratic leaders of the United States Senate permitted consideration of the ship-purchase bill to degenerate in a partisan struggle, with Republicans endeavoring to prevent the the passage of the measure, and the Democrats fighting strenuously to force a vote upon it. If a partisan fight was at all necessary, the positions of the combatants should be reversed—the Republicans fighting for the measure, because it is in accord with Republican policy and practice, and Democrats opposing it, because it is in direct opposition to the attitude long maintained by the Democratic Party in respect of the assumption of unusual powers by the General Government. Yet the Democratic Senators have gone to the extent of making it a caucus measure.

Partisan feelings have been aroused, the fight will continue; but notwithstanding the natural inclination of Democrats to resist any kind of domination of the Democratic Senate by the Republican minority, it will be an exceedingly difficult matter to secure the support of a sufficient number of Democratic Senators to pass the measure. It is too obnoxious in its purposes and too strongly contradictory to true Democratic policy to overcome natural repugnance of Democratic Senators and command their support.

"The Government of the United States should engage in but one business—the governing business," said Senator THOMAS W. HARDWICK, of Georgia, in the course of a recent interview, and this sentiment should receive hearty indorsement from all his party colleagues. It is sound Democratic doctrine, and sound Democratic doctrine is opposed to the Government going into any kind of business except the business of governing. And especially dangerous, as well as impolitic, would be the entrance of our Government upon the business of conducting ocean shipping at a time when this business, under private control, is so likely to run counter to foreign complications growing out of the war in Europe.

The Evening Journal, of Wilmington, Del., under date of January 29, says:

In engaging in a filibuster to prevent the passage of President Wilson's ship-purchase bill the Republican minority in the United States Senate is performing an exceedingly valuable service to the people of the United States. Diplomatically and economically the proposed legislation is exceedingly dangerous. It is a menace to the peace of the Nation and to private American capital engaged in the shipping trade.

Within the last week former President Taft, Senator ROOT, of New York, and many other prominent and patriotic Americans have added to the wave of denunciation that has been aroused by the President's determined effort to shove this unwise administration measure through Congress.

Commenting upon the dangers lurking in the bill the New York Sun, which is favorably disposed toward the President, says:

"The economic objections to the ship-purchase bill which Mr. Wilson wants to force through Congress may not be clearly understood by everybody, but it requires no great information about the intensity of the war spirit in Europe or about our foreign relations of the past few years to realize that the United States could not become involved in hostilities with England without having to reckon with all her allies. On the international law that governs seizures at sea, or at least upon the interpretation of the law, it is a foregone conclusion that England and France would stand together.

"It is equally certain that the binding obligation of the Anglo-Japanese treaty as it affects common interests in Asia would bring Japan into the conflict. As to Russia, our relations with her are still strained rather fine, and it is a fact to remember that in her war with Japan, Russia went to the extreme of defining and dealing with contraband. * * *

"The folly, the madness, of embarking upon any unnecessary and un-American policy that might in its workings blow our neutrality sky high and embroil us not only with one great power, but with four great powers is manifest to the plainest understanding."

That is merely one of thousands of expressions of warning emanating from patriotic American sources and to all of which President Wilson has closed his ear.

If by resort to a filibuster the Republican Senators can block this dangerous scheme, they will be deserving of the lasting gratitude of their fellow countrymen.

To sum up, Mr. President, the development of our merchant marine, as well as the extension of temporary relief to our foreign commerce, involve economical and international questions of far-reaching importance which ought not to have been treated in a purely partisan spirit, as in the bill before us, nor should they have been used as a means to increase the influence of the Chief Executive of the Nation and to promote the political fortunes of the Democratic Party. We are told by our friends on the other side of the Chamber that they have the votes to pass the bill and that they intend to get a vote. In brief, the whole question has been treated as a Democratic asset, and a strongly partisan measure has been presented so hastily and so badly drawn that its framers have found it necessary to offer first one and then another substitute for their original bill, which action, it is to be regretted, has not eliminated the radical and objectionable features upon which I have already animadverted.

Mr. President, so far as the proceedings of parliamentary bodies are concerned, it has been an axiom heretofore that all legislation is the result of compromise, but this time-honored epitome of past experience seems now to be superseded by the formula that all legislation is the result of dictation. My duty, as I see it, is to offer all possible resistance to such dictation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on Friday last the following colloquy occurred between the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and myself:

Mr. NORRIS. * * * but I want to have it presented now in order that it may receive such consideration as it will deserve, with a view to passing it at the extra session, which everyone admits is soon to follow * * *.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did I understand the Senator to say that everyone admits we are to have an extra session?

Mr. NORRIS. Whether everyone admits it or not, I presume it is unavoidable, under all circumstances.

Mr. GALLINGER. Suppose we should be wise enough to take up the appropriation bills and pass them, would there be any necessity for an extra session?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I should not think so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope that may be done.

Mr. NORRIS. I doubt whether we are going to be wise enough to get through with the business of the session.

Mr. President, the question as to the procedure of the Senate during the remainder of this session is a very important one. We have under consideration at the present time a bill which, in all human probability, will not become a law, whether the debate on it continues a longer or a shorter time. The consideration of that bill is blocking every other bill and preventing us from proceeding to the consideration of the appropriation bills, which provide money for the wants of the Government during the next fiscal year. There are 16 appropriation bills all told. One of them, the urgent deficiency bill—a small affair—has passed both Houses of Congress and been agreed to in conference. The District of Columbia appropriation bill is in conference at the present time. There are remaining the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, the Agricultural appropriation bill, the Army appropriation bill, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, the fortifications appropriation bill, the general deficiency appropriation bill, the Indian appropriation bill, the Military Academy appropriation bill, the Naval appropriation bill, the pensions appropriation bill, the Post Office appropriation bill, the rivers and harbors appropriation bill, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and a further urgent deficiency appropriation bill. Of those bills the rivers and harbors appropriation bill and the Post Office appropriation bill are on the calendar, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is about ready for report, and others will speedily follow. The probabilities are that if at any time during the present week the further consideration of the shipping bill should be discontinued, and the appropriation bills taken up, they could all be passed and become laws before the 4th day of March, while if their consideration is much longer postponed some of them will undoubtedly fail of passage, necessitating a special session, which, if called, can not be confined to the consideration of any special class of bills. It is safe to say that no one wants a special session. No one on either side of this Chamber is in favor of a special session if it can possibly be avoided. The party in power does not desire it, nor does the President, according to current rumor, look upon it with favor. Under those circumstances why should we not pursue the path of wisdom and lay aside a bill which will, if insisted on, result in further debate of a prolonged nature, and which in the end, whatever form it may assume, will, in all human probability, fail to receive the indorsement of this body?

In addition to the appropriation bills, the calendar is literally loaded down with other measures of greater or less importance, scores of which may well engage our attention.

Mr. President, my appeal may be in vain, but, nevertheless, I make it. The country is not in favor of the shipping bill, and the country expects us to pass the appropriation bills, thus avoiding the expense and turmoil of an extra session. At best, the deficit at the end of the present fiscal year will be large. Why add to it by failing to pass the great supply bills, thus forcing Congress into extra session next summer? A little tolerance and wisdom will solve the problem, and our constituents will applaud us for exercising good sense and sound judgment.

Again, I say, pass the appropriation bills, and then give the country a much-needed rest from legislative agitation. It ought to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move to amend the pending motion made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] by adding thereto the following:

With instructions to report forthwith as a substitute for the bill S. 6856 the amendment in the nature of a substitute moved by Mr. FLETCHER on behalf of the Committee on Commerce on January 26, 1915 (the amendment upon which the Senate has ordered the ayes and nays), with amendments thereto, as follows:

Insert, after line 12, page 2, of the pending substitute, changing the period after the word "share" to a colon, the words "And provided further, That said corporation shall make no charter or lease of any vessel to any corporation, firm, or individual for a longer period than 12 months; and said corporation shall specify in the charter or lease the rates, charges, and fares to be observed by said corporation, firm, or individuals chartering or leasing such vessel or vessels as the maximum to be charged during the life of such charter or lease; and there shall be contained in said charter or lease a provision terminating the same whenever the charterer or the lessee shall violate any of its provisions. It is hereby made the duty of such corporation to take such steps as may be necessary to terminate any such charter or lease whenever the corporation, firm, or individual, party to such charter or lease, shall violate the provisions of the same."

Also, to insert, after the word "corporation," in line 3, page 5, the words:

"Provided, That in making purchases of ships during the continuance of the present European war no purchase shall be made in a way which will disturb the present conditions of neutrality."

And as so amended the said committee is hereby instructed to report said substitute to the Senate in lieu of the pending bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask the Senator from Florida if it would not be agreeable to him to have the amendment printed and to proceed to its consideration at 12 o'clock on Tuesday? It seems to me that it ought to be printed, as some of us do not exactly understand it as the Senator read it. I do not think the Senator will expedite matters by refusing the request to let the amendment go over and be printed. I do not know whether the proposition now is to adjourn or to take a recess.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have simply offered an amendment to the motion which has been made by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am sure of that; but I do not know whether the Senator expects to get a vote on it before we recess or adjourn this afternoon.

Mr. FLETCHER. I had hoped that we might get a vote on it right away, without any delay.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is satisfactory to me, so far as I am concerned, because my purpose is not to delay anything. I assumed that the amendment would not be taken up for final action this afternoon, although I am ready to vote on it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think it would be only fair to Senators that the amendment should be printed. There are three separate propositions there, as I see it, which can be divided on request. I may be mistaken; it is rather hard to judge from the mere reading; but I think there are three distinct propositions. I think there is a proposition there to put in something about a neutrality clause; there is a proposition about leasing; and I think there is a proposition about altering the board as it was provided for in the original bill. Those, of course, are three propositions, and we are entitled under the rules to a division, but I am speaking without really knowing. It seems to me we ought not to be asked to discuss or consider or vote upon the propositions until we have had an opportunity to at least read them and see just what they are. I hope the Senator will be willing to take a recess or an adjournment, to give us an opportunity to have it printed and laid before the Senate. I ask for a division, if I understand the amendment. If I can see it, I will——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, they are the same propositions that are printed in the Gore bill, are they not?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for a division of the question, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the request for the yeas and nays seconded?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think I had the floor, and I asked for a division of the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I see here two distinct propositions. I do not see the proposition which was in the Gore bill about changing the board. Perhaps that was changed in the original Fletcher bill; I am not sure. There are two totally distinct propositions here, however. One is the proposition about leasing and the other is as to making purchases of ships. I ask that those be divided before the yeas and nays are ordered on either of them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not ordered the yeas and nays yet.

Mr. LODGE. I am aware of that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not examined the amendment, but thinks it is one of those questions which is divisible, so that the Senate has a right to vote separately on each of the questions.

Mr. LODGE. I think there are two. The Chair will find that there are two.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I entered the Chamber after the Senator from Florida had finished reading the amendment, and I will ask to have it read. I ask to have the Secretary state it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it again.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Florida moves to amend the pending motion, made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], by adding thereto the following words:

With instructions to report forthwith as a substitute for the bill (S. 6856) the amendment in the nature of a substitute "moved by Mr. FLETCHER on behalf of the Committee on Commerce, on January 26, 1915"—the amendment upon which the Senate has ordered the yeas and nays—with amendments thereto, as follows:

Insert, after line 12, page 2, of the pending substitute—changing the period after the word "share" to a colon—the words "And provided further, That said corporation shall make no charter or lease of any vessel to any corporation, firm, or individual for a longer period than 12 months, and said corporation shall specify in the charter or lease the rates, charges, and fares to be observed by said corporation, firm, or individuals chartering or leasing such vessel or vessels as the maximum to be charged during the life of such charter or lease, and there shall be contained in said charter or lease a provision terminating the same whenever the charterer or the lessee shall violate any of its provisions. It is hereby made the duty of such corporation to take such steps as may be necessary to terminate any such charter or lease whenever the corporation, firm, or individual party to such charter or lease shall violate the provisions of the same."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the first proposition.

Mr. LODGE. I think, as I heard it read, that it says "the following amendments."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary is now about to state the second amendment, as the Chair understands.

The SECRETARY. Also, insert after the word "corporation," in line 3, page 5:

"Provided, That in making purchases of ships during the continuance of the present European war no purchase shall be made in a way which will disturb the present conditions of neutrality."

And as so amended the said committee is hereby instructed to report said substitute to the Senate in lieu of the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the question be divided, and the Chair thinks under the rules he is entitled to a division.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida asks for the yeas and nays. The question is, Will the call for the yeas and nays be seconded?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry—to know what is meant by "forthwith" in the text of the amendment. Does that mean that it is never to go to the committee, or that the committee is foreclosed as against any discretion it might possess as to other amendments? What is the nature of it?

If it is intended that the motion to recommit shall be carried in such form that the bill and amendments shall never go to the committee, but shall remain upon the calendar, it is equivalent to a motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill, and under our rules ought to lie over for a day. If it is intended that "forthwith" means with reasonable diligence, for instance, the Committee on Commerce meets every Thursday. Would that be "forthwith" in the sense of the amendment, or any other time when there could be an actual meeting of the committee?

I want it understood that I have not engaged in any plan and am not now a party to any understanding by which any unnecessary delay is to be resorted to in the consideration of this bill or any of its amendments. I therefore ask the Chair whether the word "forthwith" contemplates that the amendment shall ever go to the committee; and, if it is necessary to make it clearer by an amendment, I shall offer one when the opportunity is presented. If it is intended that it shall go to the committee and leave the committee the discretion to determine what "forthwith" means, of course I shall say nothing further about it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas allow me a moment?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I do not recall the exact words, but if the language is "to report forthwith" that constitutes a third instruction, a wholly different one—an instruction as to time.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The word "forthwith" is not self-explanatory. Of course, the Chair will take notice of the fact that reference to a committee means giving the committee an opportunity to assemble; otherwise it would be a mere subterfuge, and, of course, the Senate would not commit itself to that. If it is intended to deprive the committee of the opportunity to meet at all, and the legal effect of the use of those words in that particular connection is to leave the bill upon the calendar, then it is merely a pro forma reference to the committee, and equivalent to a motion to discharge the committee from further consideration of the matter, which would result in a day intervening before it could be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair believes that is simply a construction of the language of the proposed amendment. The Chair thinks it would not mean in law——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Chair, then, thinks that is not a parliamentary inquiry, a question to be determined by the Chair, but that it is to be determined by the committee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the motion is agreed to, and it should be subsequently contended that the bill should be immediately reported to the Senate, it would be a matter for the determination of the Senate as to whether the adoption of the motion meant immediately or whether it meant within a reasonable time after the committee had assembled.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That, in the first instance, to be decided by the committee? Well, that is all right.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there are two propositions. The committee is instructed to report two amendments, and it is further instructed to report forthwith, which constitutes a third instruction. The votes will come on those three instructions. It may be quite possible that the amendments will be adopted and the time instruction voted down. The time instruction might be maintained and one or both of the amendments defeated. They are three separate instructions, and I think we have a right to demand a separate vote on each one, and I make that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not any doubt about that.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, did I understand the Chair to hold that there is to be a separate vote upon the question of instructions to the committee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has held that under the rules of the Senate it is a divisible question. It embraces three propositions—one, with reference to the amendment touching the leasing of vessels; two, with reference to the purchase of vessels of belligerents; third, with reference to the question whether the committee shall or shall not report forthwith.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, if the Chair has made up his mind about that, there is no necessity of saying anything.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can not see how, under Rule XVIII, it can be otherwise than that it embraces three propositions submitted to the Senate now for determination.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Chair will permit me, while I am not controverting the position of the Chair that there are two propositions—one as to each one of the amendments—I do not see how there can be a third, a proposition growing out of the fact that we recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to make certain amendments. The instructions are a part of the two propositions, and they are a part of each one of the propositions. If we should vote to refer the bill to the committee with instructions to incorporate the first amendment, then the instructions would be a part of the propositions contained in the proposed amendment, and when we propose to refer the two amendments to the committee the instructions to incorporate these two amendments are a part of those two propositions.

I want to say for myself that I am entirely satisfied as to the status of this matter before the committee. I think it is pretty well settled, certainly by the precedents in another body, a coordinate branch of Congress, that recommitment to a committee with instructions is binding upon that committee, and the committee is bound by the instructions and can not report back anything except the original bill with the amendments attached; but this particular amendment of the Senator from Florida provides in express terms—

> And as so amended the said committee is hereby instructed to report the said substitute to the Senate in lieu of the pending bill.

That would mean, to my mind, if it means anything, that this matter is referred back to the committee with instructions to report back the bill with these specific amendments in lieu of the pending bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there is no question that the committee are bound to follow the instructions of the Senate. If the Senate instructs them to report one amendment and no more, they are bound, in my judgment, by those instructions. If the Senate simply directs them to report certain amendments, and does not cut them off from reporting others, the power of the committee still remains; but that is not a point that has been raised. The point that I raised was that this contains three separate instructions. I am not going to argue it further. The Chair has so decided, and decided, in my opinion, with absolute correctness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays——

Mr. LODGE. The yeas and nays are to be ordered on what?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If nobody else wants to say anything now, the Chair is going to order the yeas and nays on each of these propositions.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the yeas and nays can not be ordered on more than one pending question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to be heard upon the motion of the Senator from Florida before it is submitted.

Mr. LODGE. So do I.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays are not ordered yet.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Newlands	Smith, Md.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor, as the Chair remembers. Does he yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Evidently we are not going to get through with this matter very readily, and therefore I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I hope we can get a vote on these questions to-day. I have no objection to the division, or any way you want to fix it about a division, only I want a vote. I hope we can get a vote to-night. There is a full attendance here.

Mr. LODGE. These amendments alter the character of the bill very much, and I do not think it is probable that we shall vote this evening.

Mr. FLETCHER. Would the Senator be willing to agree to take a vote to-morrow at 12 o'clock?

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President; we are making no agreements after the treatment which has been extended to us.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent that we may vote to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then I hope the Senate will decline to take a recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. JAMES. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 47, nays 48, as follows:

NOT VOTING—1.

Kenyon.

So the Senate refused to take a recess.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to say, first, that I can not agree with the ruling that was made on the famous Friday night, that ordering the yeas and nays cut off either debate or amendment, and the Senate took my view by a decided vote last Monday. It is also perfectly clear that it is impossible to order the yeas and nays on a whole series of questions. By the ruling of the Chair there are three questions here, and it is the correct ruling of the Chair, as I believe.

I wish to call attention to what is said in Jefferson's Manual, page 125:

> When a question is divided, after the question on the first member, the second is open to debate and amendment, because it is a known rule that a person may rise and speak at any time before the question has been completely decided by putting the negative as well as affirmative side. But the question is not completely put when the vote has been taken on the first member only. One-half of the question, both affirmative and negative, remains still to be put.

There is a reference to the Executive Journal, June 25, 1795. The same decision was made earlier by John Adams when he was Presiding Officer, and it has been the rule of the Senate ever since.

Now, if the yeas and nays are to be ordered—which I say, in my opinion, cuts off neither amendment nor debate—I do not see how it is possible to order them except when the question has been divided on one question at a time.

I make that point now, before any further question is raised upon it.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say a word——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to make an inquiry. The Senator from Massachusetts has indicated his understanding that the ruling on Friday night was to the effect that the ordering of the yeas and nays cut off debate. I understood the ruling to be——

Mr. LODGE. No; I did not mean to say that. If I did, I made a mistake. Of course the ruling was that it would cut off amendments, but not debate. I do not think it cuts off either.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it cuts off amendment either, but the Senator from Massachusetts seemed to assume that the ruling was that it cut off debate as well as amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; I certainly did not intend to say that.

Mr. President, as I understand it, the first of the amendments in the instructions is now the pending question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought the Senator from Massachusetts had made a mistake in stating the effect of the ruling on last Friday night. I understood him to say that the ruling was that the yeas and nays when ordered prevented debate as well as amendment. I did not so understand the ruling, and I wanted to ask the Chair with regard to the matter. But the Senator from Massachusetts now says that it was not his understanding that it extended to debate.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; that was clear.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought we ought to have the matter clearly understood at this point.

Mr. LODGE. The ruling about the yeas and nays being ordered cutting off amendments was reversed on Monday by a decisive vote of the Senate, because the motion to recommit in its essence, as all authorities recognize, is a motion to amend.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, I yield for an inquiry.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I rose for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. As I understand it by the ruling of the Chair a few minutes ago, the question has been divided. May I ask if I am correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no doubt in the mind of the Chair that there are three propositions which have been proposed to the Senate in the nature of instructions to the committee, one to insert one amendment, a second to insert another amendment, and a third to report forthwith.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, with that understanding I fully agree. I do not see how any other conclusion could be reached. My question is whether the ruling has been made so that the question is divided.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has so ruled, and there has been no appeal yet from the Chair's ruling.

Mr. ROOT. I therefore proceed to the further question, Which of the three separate propositions is now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first proposition the Chair would rule would be the first one before the Senate.

Mr. REED. What is that?

Mr. ROOT. That is to say, the question now before the Senate is the instruction to the committee to insert the clause relating to the leasing of ships. I describe it as well as I can without an opportunity to see the paper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the way the Chair thinks, the propositions are to be taken up in their order.

Mr. LODGE. It was my understanding that the first instruction is now the pending question.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May we have that instruction read?

Mr. CHILTON. It has been read twice.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well, I withdraw the request.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish now to say a few words upon the subject which is now pending, and as I do not want to rise on every instruction, I will take occasion at the same time to refer to the others which are not now before the Senate. I will say to the Senator from New York I am going to speak on the first instruction, which is the one before the Senate, and I shall also take occasion to speak on the others, not desiring at this time to take them up as they arrive.

Mr. President, we are asked to pass upon this first instruction, which I am informed is embodied in the bill introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], an ingenious but now abandoned device of getting the question before us, and we are to proceed by way of instructions. As I understand it—and if I am wrong, of course I can be corrected—it is the proviso on page 2, beginning on line 13:

> That said corporation shall make no charter or lease of any vessel to any corporation, firm, or individual for a longer period than 12 months, and said corporation shall specify in the charter or lease the rates, charges, and fares to be observed by such corporation, firm, or individual chartering or leasing any such vessel or vessels as a maximum to be charged during the life of such charter or lease, and there shall be contained in said charter or lease a provision terminating the same whenever the charterer or the lessee shall violate any of its provisions. It is hereby made the duty of such corporation to take such steps as may be necessary to terminate any such charter or lease whenever the corporation, firm, or individual, party to such charter or lease, shall violate the provisions of the same.

That is a very complicated provision. Its purpose, I suppose, was to convince those who are deeply interested in the Government-ownership feature that the Government ownership was to be permanent. The third edition of the bill—I speak of it in that way for convenience merely—the third edition of the bill which we are now going to reform by a recommittal with instructions puts no limitation on the leases. This puts a limitation on a lease of 12 months. That does not prevent their leasing or chartering ships under this new proviso, for there is nothing there to prevent its renewal. It can be renewed indefinitely for 40 years. For those who are aiming at Government ownership that seems to me to be rather a barren concession, but I suppose that is considered to be made effective by requiring the specification in the charter or lease of "the rates, charges, and fares to be observed by such corporation, firm, or individual"; that is, the rates are to be fixed beforehand. Ocean rates are very fluctuating. It is easy to fix fares, but freight rates are very fluctuating, indeed. We have seen them fluctuate enormously in the last six months. I suppose that is relied upon to prevent anybody from being willing to take a lease or charter under this provision.

That is a very slight analysis of it. I have had no time, and no other Senator has had any time, to examine it with any thoroughness. I think while they were instructing, I may say in passing, that it would be desirable to instruct the committee to change the language in lines 5, 6, and 7, on page 4, which reads:

Such officers and trustees shall be subject to removal at any time by vote of a majority of the stockholders at any meeting thereof.

Therefore, if a hundred men each buy a share of stock, they can go to the meeting and vote down 99 men, who may hold all the rest of the stock. It is usual in making provision for voting stock to vote the stock. The United States holds 51 per cent of the stock under this bill, but it will be only one of the stockholders. It will be very easy to get a few men in there who would remove the trustees. I point that out for the good of the bill. It seems to me it would be just as well to change that. If a man with one share of stock of the par value of $100 and the United States with over $5,000,000 of the stock should have an equal vote, it would be rather an awkward arrangement. That apparently, however, was not considered worthy of consideration. I think the committee, if they had been allowed any power in the premises, would have probably changed that provision.

I now come to the other instruction:

That in making purchases of ships during the continuance of the present European war no purchases shall be made in a way which will disturb the conditions of neutrality.

That, of course, amounts to absolutely nothing. The great objection, to my mind, to the bill is that it leaves open the power to buy belligerent ships; that it does not prevent the purchase of belligerent ships. It is only that if the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and one of the additional members think that purchasing a certain ship may lead to a violation of neutrality they are not to buy it; and if they do not think so, they will buy it. It seems to me that that is too important a question to be left in that way, but that is just the way it now is. Therefore, to my thinking, that instruction is valueless.

I have had no time, Mr. President, to go into these instructions with any thoroughness. I have had only an opportunity to glance at them; but they seem to me utterly defective, even for the purpose to which they were supposed to be put in. I should like to go on and analyze this new version—because, although it is never to come before us in the paternal hands, it is coming before us practically in the instructions—I should like to go over it with some care; and I shall hope to do so later, when speaking on this or one of the other instructions.

I should like now to call attention to one or two of the provisions which seem to me objectionable. One is that extraordinary provision on page 8 which gives to the proposed shipping board the right overnight to change the rules and regulations applicable to the shipping of the United States. They put into the hands of one competing line—for that is what it is—the power to change all the rules and regulations affecting all the water-borne commerce of the United States—for our rules and regulations apply both to the coastwise and to the foreign trade—without notice or without any opportunity to prepare for it. They then propose to pay this out of the Panama bonds. Those bonds were authorized by Congress for the purpose of paying for the Panama Canal. Owing to good management on the part of the Government a large portion of the expenses of that canal have been paid out of current revenues in the past; but the authority to issue those bonds still remains. Those bonds, as I have said, were authorized for a specific purpose—the construction of the Panama Canal—to the amount, I believe, of $240,000,000. They still remain unissued.

That is a debt, I believe, of which it is right to have posterity pay its share. The burden of that debt certainly ought to go upon posterity, because the canal is an enduring work, which we hope and believe will be of value to many generations. Now, it is proposed to take those bonds, created for one purpose, and to devote them to paying the expenses of a measure which its authors, or some of its authors and finishers, say is temporary—merely temporary—a matter of a few years, a matter to be carried only beyond the present European war. Others take a different view and regard it as permanent; but we have been told over and over again that it was a temporary and emergency measure to relieve the present pressure of high freight rates upon the people of the United States. For the relief of the people of to-day at this moment we are to take these bonds, issued for a special purpose, and to use them in this way and put the burden of this special purpose upon posterity. It seems to me an invasion of a trust fund. If we are going to make this emergency measure now, we ought to pay for it now. It will have to be paid for by the people of the United States at some day or other.

But I suppose, Mr. President, it is all done in the interest of economy. The condition of the Treasury is not overgood. There is a deficit threatening. The other day in the House of Representatives we had an example of the administration's conception of economy. They are ready to spend $50,000,000 on buying German ships and setting them afloat under our flag; they are ready to spend $35,000,000 for railroads in Alaska; they are prepared to spend $40,000,000 or more on rivers and harbors; they are proposing to give Colombia $25,000,000 and Nicaragua $3,000,000 more; and then they turn to the House of Representatives with a plan of economy, and what is the economy? To cut off the appropriation for submarines! The testimony on that subject shows that we have practically no effective submarines—not more than two or three at the most. It shows that we have no torpedoes of suitable length; we have only short torpedoes; and yet, although passing before our eyes to-day in Europe, is being demonstrated the enormous effectiveness of this new arm in naval warfare, and it is there that they have seen fit to economize by two or three million dollars!

Why, Mr. President, they have declined to give us a proper personnel for the Navy. There are ships out of commission, tied up at the docks, not fit, perhaps, to be put in the battle line, but fit to protect entrances to our harbors. It is easy, as this war has shown, for one vessel in a night to sow the entrance to a harbor with mines. A half dozen vessels could sow with mines in a night the entrance to Delaware Bay, to New York Harbor, to Boston Harbor, to Norfolk, and these vessels now lying tied up—it would take two or three months to put them in commission—have no crews to put upon them. We can not even use for that necessary defense the vessels that we have, but we economize by leaving our Navy short of enough men to man the ships we already have.

In the pursuit of economy they have cut down the provision for aeronautics in the Navy. Mr. President, in this war they have started—it is easy to do it—aeroplanes or hydroplanes from a ship, and they will go over a fortified city like New York—I say "fortified" because that gives them the right to do so, I suppose—and drop bombs. We have 73 men in the aeronautical department of our Navy; we have 23 aeroplanes in both the Army and the Navy. There is where economy is to be practiced; but they are going to spend $50,000,000 under this bill to buy—what? The bill is so written that they can do what they meant to do from the beginning and what they mean to do now, and that is to buy the interned German ships. I do not care where they buy them or where they build them; this is no time for an experiment in Government ownership in shipping. To send any Government-owned ship into the North Sea, the Irish Sea, or the British Channel is deliberately running the risk of war. It is one thing to take a privately owned ship, but it is a very different thing to capture or destroy a Government-owned ship.

Germany has given notice that in a certain zone she will destroy neutral ships carrying aid to their opponents. We all know the allies would not recognize the transfer of the flag from German ships, and yet it is proposed to send those ships owned by the United States and carrying the United States flag into that whirlpool of war.

The United States, Mr. President, can not hide behind a corporation. They own the ships; they control the ships; they are their ships; and when they are seized or when they are sunk the blow is directed against the flag of the United States Government and not against a ship owned by a private individual.

Mr. President, that is the danger, and it is increased by the German notice. If they should sink a Government-owned ship carrying passengers and freight, the American people would come very near to demanding war. We do not want war with Germany; we do not want war with any nation; we wish to keep on good terms with all the world and preserve an honest neutrality; but we are risking it all at this time by this scheme to buy these ships and put them on the ocean as Government-owned ships. They will not go on the Pacific; they are not needed there; they will not go to South America; there is more cargo space in vessels to South America than there are markets there. If they are needed at all, they are needed in the trade to Europe—to England—and it is that danger which accounts for the opposition which this bill is encountering and which is not met by that empty amendment of the second instruction.

Mr. President, I have been speaking merely offhand in regard to these instructions, because I wish to call attention to them now at the opening of the debate upon them, and I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the reason for the opposition to this bill. I can assure Senators on the other side that the intensity of the opposition, which makes every Senator on this side determined to defeat this bill if it is a possibility, an opposition which has enabled us to demonstrate to this country that it never has had a majority as it stood at the time when it was being debated, is actuated by the belief that the safety and peace of the country are imperiled by what it is proposed to do. No men would subject themselves to such a contest as we are making for any mere supposed political advantage, still less for any imaginary personal advantage. The thing that binds us together is that we believe this to be a bill of great danger, and that point and many other points have never been successfully or even intelligently met.

Further, Mr. President, we have been joined in our opposition by seven Senators of an opposite political faith. I have sat here and heard those seven Senators villified as I have never heard Senators attacked in this Chamber before; and yet no man can imagine any motive actuating those men in the course they took which could have any personal advantage. All the personal advantage was the other way. If ever it was clear that men took a position because they felt it to be their duty to do it and did it with the utmost reluctance and were guided by their conscientious convictions, it was those men. I believe and I know they are actuated by the same feelings that we are in presenting the opposition to this bill, namely, that we believe it is a bill dangerous in present conditions to the peace and safety of the United States.

Some of us, of course, are utterly opposed to Government ownership, especially on the ocean, and, above all, we are opposed to Government ownership at this time. We do not, we can not, tamely accept the proposition that such a bill as this should be passed and its provisions carried out by the purchase of these German ships, which has been the underlying and the stimulating cause of this bill from the beginning, around which there are dark suspicions and sinister stories. With that purpose in view, it seems to us that the passage of this bill would bring this country within measurable distance of war as soon as those ships are set afloat, and the German notice broadens it into a danger to any Government-owned ship.

This is all I desire to say at this moment. I shall take occasion later to discuss these instructions more fully, more adequately, and as their importance deserves.

I had in mind an amendment, which I will reserve and offer later. I have not the right words here at this time.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator excuse me for a moment?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. ROOT. I wish to offer an amendment to one of the instructions, but I find myself unable to do it through not having the matter in such form as to indicate it. I express the hope that the proposed instructions may be printed, so that when another calendar day comes we may have them before us for use.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Chair what proposition is now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now before the Senate is the adoption of the first proposed instruction to the committee.

Mr. JONES. That is the proposition to which I desire to address myself.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has just stated the principal ground of my opposition to this measure. I believe it means war. I believe it means that this country will be involved in the terrific conflict that is now being waged in all the civilized world—at least, among all the great countries except this. I may be mistaken. I do not question the sincerity of the beliefs and the motives of those who think otherwise and who support this measure. Believing as I do as to what the probable results of the passage of the bill will be to the people of this country, I feel that it is my duty to oppose this measure in every possible way.

If I should occupy this floor from now until the 4th day of March, no matter what the results might be to me, feeling as I do about it, I think I would be doing nothing more than my duty to the people who have honored me with a place on this floor. No greater calamity could come to this country than for us to be involved in this struggle, and I want to say, in all frankness, to our friends on the other side that this bill shall not pass if there is any possible way in which I can prevent it.

There are three propositions involved in the pending motion. Under the rules of the Senate I can speak twice on each one of these propositions, and I propose to do so. If I can speak one or two days each time, that will consume a little bit of the time between now and the 4th of March; and I want to say to the Senators on the other side that I propose to use every bit of the time I can use between now and the 4th of March to prevent the passage of this bill. I shall go into the proposition with reference to the probability of this measure involving us in war more fully a little later on. The Senator from Massachusetts has well stated the situation, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. President, there is no partisanship in this matter with me. I have tried since I have been a Member of the Senate, and especially during this administration, to act just as free from partisanship as possible. I think I have said once before here that there is only one question before the American people upon which I recognize any party lines, and that is the tariff. I think I have shown by my record during this administration that I have not been actuated by party bias. I have voted for more of the important propositions this administration has urged than I have voted against, and if I have had any doubt with reference to my action it has been with reference to those measures for which I have voted.

I did not consider the currency bill a party measure. I knew no party bias with reference to that proposition. I knew of no declaration in the Democratic platform or in the Republican platform that sharply divided the people of the country with reference to currency legislation. So, when that measure was presented I tried to consider it regardless of the source from which it came or the administration that was in power. I considered it in exactly the same way that I would have considered it had it been a Republican administration. I voted for the measure on its final passage. I did so in the belief and in the hope—I had very much doubt about it, I will admit—that it would improve the condition in the country; that it would give us a better financial system than we then had. I believed that there was a system that would have been very much better for the country, and it seemed to me our Democratic friends lost a great opportunity when they rejected it.

I am satisfied that they rejected that idea very largely because of some declaration that they had in their platform that they seemed to think committed them against the proposition of a central bank. I should have preferred a great central bank, operated and controlled by the Government, and the stock owned by the people of the country, instead of the various institutions we have provided for in different sections of the country, which I feared then, and which I fear now, will eventually result in a great political machine and in political influence and power controlling, or at least very injuriously influencing, the financial situation and the finances of the country. I think that will be a great calamity. I hope it will not come about, but I fear it will.

Then, when the Federal Trade Commission bill was presented, I am sorry to say that was made a party proposition by the Democratic majority of this Senate, just as the banking bill was. They called their caucus. They do not seem to be able to consider these measures in the open. They do not seem to feel free to take the people of the country into their confidence in the discussion of these great measures, so far as the differences among themselves are concerned; but they must take these measures behind closed doors, exclude the representatives of the press, exclude the people of the country from knowing what takes place behind those closed doors, consider those measures in that way, reach a decision as a party, and then endeavor to throttle independent action and manacle the views, opinions, and convictions of their party associates.

The Trade Commission bill, framed up in this way, was then brought into his body. I treated that as a nonparty proposition. I voted for or against the various amendments that were offered to it upon their merits, regardless of the source from which they came. On the final passage of the bill I voted for it with very much doubt, and my doubts have been made stronger since the bill was passed. I shall refer to that measure a little bit later on.

Then the so-called Clayton bill was treated in the same way. Our Democratic friends developed differences over it which they did not feel justified in thrashing out on the floor of the Senate, taking the consensus of opinion of the majority of the Senate, but they must have conferences and caucuses binding their members to support the will of the majority of the caucus; but when amendments were offered on the floor of the Senate these were acted upon in a nonpartisan way, as far as Republicans were concerned. I supported a great many propositions here in the Senate. The bill, when it came up on the conference report, I could not support, and I did not vote for it.

This bill is an absolutely nonpartisan measure, and it ought to be treated as such. It ought to be considered in the Senate in a nonpartisan way; and, as I said a moment ago, my opposition to it is not based upon politics at all, but simply upon the fear I have with reference to the consequences that may come from it. I will say right here that I am not alarmed at the proposition of Government ownership. I am not so violently opposed to that as some of my colleagues on this side of the Chamber are. I supported the proposition for the Government construction and operation of a railroad in Alaska, and in a speech that I made with reference to that measure I said that while I hoped we would not come to Government ownership and operation of railroads in this country, yet that if a few more incidents occurred like the New Haven, and some others that the country knows about, we would come to Government ownership and operation of railroads.

I do not consider the precedent with reference to Alaska as a precedent for ownership and operation of railroads in this country by the Government. I supported that proposition because of the special circumstances and conditions in that particular case. I think we were fully justified then in doing what we did, and I am glad that measure was treated as a nonpartisan measure. I am glad that we had the support of the President of the United States, and I am glad to give to him and his administration any credit to which they may be entitled by reason of that legislation.

It is true that that legislation was simply carrying out what had been inaugurated by the preceding administration. No one had come out more strongly in favor of Government ownership or construction of a railroad in Alaska than the President of the United States who just preceded the present President; and it was under his administration and under Republican legislation passed by a Republican Senate that that matter was started, that a railway commission was provided for under which a report was submitted recommending it. The President recommended it, and I am glad the present Chief Executive adopted the suggestion and urged it strongly, and that it was taken up and passed. I believe that the results will fully justify the action of the Congress and the President eventually in the development of that great territory in Alaska.

I am glad that in a way this measure is being considered or has been considered here in a nonpartisan way by some of the Members of the Senate. I am sorry that it has practically been made a party measure through a party caucus. I think it augurs well for the Senate and for the people that there are some representatives on this floor who refuse to be bound by these secret conclaves and these secret caucuses. I am glad that there are some Members of the Senate who seem to consider their duty to the people greater than their duty to their party; and in saying that I do not question the sincerity of the Members who take another position, because I suppose they think that by following the direction of the President and by following the decree of the majority of their party they are best promoting the welfare of their country. I must say that I can not see it that way myself.

There are certain Members of the majority who have not accepted the caucus decree. They have not obeyed the orders that have come from those who should be the administrators of the law rather than the makers of it. There are those who recognize the fact that they represent those who sent them here rather than that they are here to carry out the mandates of some one whom the people selected to carry out and execute the law. There are some here who seem to recognize the fact that they are representatives of a great constituency rather than the members of a team. Of course, the members of a team are expected to do what the captain tells them to do, and there are those here who recognize as their captain the people who sent them here, and not somebody who assumes to himself the position of captain of the legislative team, who is made by the Constitution of the United States nothing more than the executor of the law which the people's team is supposed to enact.

Some of these Senators have expressed their views on the floor of the Senate. They have made their position very clear. They did not wait to express their views until the matter came up for a vote in the Senate. Some of them took the people into their confidence sometime ago, and at the risk of repeating some things that may have possibly been said on the floor of the Senate I am going to take the liberty of reading some statements made by them in the press sometime ago by which they advised their people and their colleagues of their position on this important matter.

I have here a statement made by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] with reference to this important measure. The position taken by the junior Senator from Georgia was exactly what I expected from him. I had the pleasure and the honor of serving in the House of Representatives with him. I knew there his independence and his devotion to what he believed to be the people's interests and his conscientious adherence to his convictions of duty. I felt satisfied that when he came to this body the same independence which marked his course in the House of Representatives would mark it here and so I was not surprised when I saw in one of the papers sometime ago a statement from him with reference to this measure, giving the grounds upon which he opposed it and upon which he felt that he would have to part company with his party colleagues in the consideration of it.

I am going to read this statement. I will read the preliminary statement in the paper:

Senator HARDWICK, Democrat, of Georgia, who, both on the floor of the Senate and in the party caucus, has been aggressive in his opposition to the administration ship-purchase bill, yesterday gave the Post a characteristic statement of his reasons for not agreeing with the President and other members of his party.

Right here I want to say I was a little surprised at the statement of the junior Senator from Georgia the other day on the floor of the Senate that he had been told by his party colleagues they had not been holding any party caucuses for a great many years and that whatever meetings were held were simply conferences.

Mr. President, I, of course, am not a member of the Democratic caucus or conference, and I have not been inside their meetings, but I know it has been common report, commonly stated in the newspapers ever since this administration came into power, that caucuses were being held. They have been held upon every important measure. I remember very distinctly the account of the caucuses of the Democratic Party on the tariff, and that is a question I think they are justified in caucusing on. I do not find any fault with them for it. That is a party question, and it has been ever since the foundation of the Government, and I suppose it ever will be. There are two lines of thought on the tariff, and these lines of thought form a very distinct cleavage in the minds and action of the people in political parties. They, the different parties, made their declarations with reference to this question, and so I find no particular fault with our Democratic friends for holding a caucus on the tariff in order to frame their tariff in accord with their party declaration. We would have been a great deal better off if we had held some caucuses on it when we framed our last tariff law. They have been talking about our holding caucuses with reference to the tariff. I was in the Senate when the Payne-Aldrich tariff law was framed and passed. I was never in a caucus connected with that bill myself, and I never knew of any caucus having been called. I thought at the time that we would have been better off if we had gotten together and had a caucus and thrashed out our differences.

If we had made mutual concessions, as I have no doubt concessions could have been made, we would not have had the division we did have in the party. But we did not do it. We had our division, and our Democratic friends got in by reason of it. Probably in the economy of an All-Wise Providence it was the best thing for the country in the end, because it was bound to come. The people—that is, the new generation that had come up—had forgotten and did not know about conditions under Democratic rule, and so it was necessary that they should have another experience. They have had it.

Then when the banking and currency bill was up they had caucuses over that, and so practically on every important measure that this administration has passed they have held their caucuses. We have had reports given out by the papers as to the votes in caucus on different propositions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES. Of course I would like very much to yield, but I do not like to take any time that is unnecessary. However, I will yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. REED. The Senator has just stated that there has not been an important question before Congress upon which there has not been a caucus held by the Democratic side. I should like to have him name the time we have caucused on any bill except the tariff bill, the banking and currency bill, and the pending bill.

Mr. JONES. That is a pretty good list.

Mr. REED. That is three. It is not every bill at all. That is an important accuracy such as, I suppose, we ought to expect.

Mr. JONES. There are only two other important measures of this administration—that is, measures attracting the thought of the country and great discussion—the Clayton bill and the trade commission bill. It may be they were not caucused on. We have heard so much about caucuses that it seems we have had them pretty regularly. There are three, and that is a majority. Of course I do not say that every measure has been taken to caucus, but the great majority of the great and important measures have been taken into caucus, and as a matter of fact have been made party measures.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator has been a Member of this body for at least four years.

Mr. JONES. For nearly six years.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator if his experience has been substantially that of my own. In the six years I have been here there has never been a Republican caucus in which the Republicans gathered together, either as a conference or caucus, and pledged themselves to support any particular measure.

Mr. JONES. There never has been.

Mr. PAGE. There has nothing been held on our side that approaches anything like a caucus?

Mr. JONES. There never has been; and I think I will say here I was a Member of another body for ten years, and in that whole time, though a great deal has been said about caucuses among Republicans in some other body, there was never held a Republican caucus except at the beginning of each Congress for the nomination of candidates for Speaker and officers of the House.

Now, I want to read the statement from the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] with reference to this matter.

> The objections to the pending ship-purchase bill continue to multiply and grow in strength day by day. In the first place, where and how will we get the ships if the bill should pass?

Mr. President, that is a very pertinent question. It has never yet been answered. No answer to that question has come from anybody on the other side of the Chamber or by anybody supporting this bill. I heard a statement here one day to the effect that ships could be gotten from Norway, Sweden, and other neutral countries. They have ships; I will admit that. They have ships, but there is no proof shown anywhere that they have them for sale or that, if they have them for sale, they can be bought now at any reasonable rate. I shall notice that matter later on, if I have the time in which to do it. I will say here—and I am simply repeating what others have well said—the vessels of no neutral people can be bought now, if the statements made by the friends of this bill are true, except at exorbitant prices. It is contrary to all business experience that any man will sell any tool by which he is making a tremendous profit except at a price based on that profit or that income.

If the shipowners of Norway are making 50 or a hundred per cent profit carrying freight now with a vessel that cost them $50,000 at a time when they were securing only an ordinary rate of income, what will they ask for that vessel now if the Government of the United States goes to buy it? Instead of asking $50,000 for it they will ask $150,000.

Mr. President, it is almost an insult to the intelligence of our people to suggest anything different. Everybody has had that sort of experience. I know that out in my part of the country we have had some pretty valuable land lately. A few years ago that land could be bought for $25, $50, and $75 an acre. Why? Because the income from the land, from the crops that it produced, would pay a reasonable profit upon that valuation. The same land, Mr. President, a couple of years ago was selling at $1,000 and $2,000 an acre. Why? Why this great increase in price? Why was it that a man two years ago would ask a thousand dollars an acre for a tract of land which 10 years ago he would sell at $50 an acre? The reason is simple and plain. Two years ago he was getting an income on those lands from fruit of from $250 to $500 an acre a year, while 10 years ago he was getting an income of $10 to $15 an acre a year. That is exactly the situation we have now. These shipowners are getting a tremendous income from their ships. When this Government comes to buy them, it will have to buy them on the basis of that income. Then what will be the result a little bit later on? Why, the Government will have these ships; these tremendous profits will have disappeared; and if we want to sell the ships we will have to sell them on the basis of a low profit.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question only.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator from Washington speaks of a "low profit." Does the Senator mean a small profit or no profit at all.

Mr. JONES. Probably the result would be that there would be no profit at all; and I will even admit that we may make some profit, but it will be small. Then the price of the ships will be very much lower than what we paid for them. Of course the chances are that there will be no profit at all. But, Mr. President, if I have the time I shall notice this matter a little bit further on. This article continues:

> If so, from whom? Certainly not to any considerable amount or at anything like a reasonable figure from Great Britain, whose merchant marine must serve her own great commerce, and is, besides, now subject to demands made upon it for aid to the military and naval operations, as well as an increased demand from the world's carrying trade growing out of the elimination of German competition.
> SHOWS BRITAIN'S PROBABLE ATTITUDE.
> From Germany? If this be the purpose or one of the purposes of the bill, it seems certain that it will involve us in serious complications with Great Britain. It is not probable that the Government of that country will permit us to purchase and transfer to our registry the interned ships of Germany that could probably be bought at a most reasonable figure, and then operate them on the high seas.
> "It seems certain that Great Britain will insist that if the transfer of the ship under the registry of one of her enemies is made to a neutral registry after the declaration of war that Great Britain is neither bound to recognize nor respect such transfer and does not propose to do so.
> SAYS NEUTRALITY MAY VANISH.
> "Besides, the transfer of these German vessels to a corporation, of which the United States is the principal, if not the sole, stockholder, will greatly add to the gravity of the situation by making this Government a direct party with an immediate interest of its own in the controversy, and will seriously endanger our continued peace.
> "Therefore this step ought not to be taken lightly, and not at all unless we are prepared for any eventuality. If we can not safely buy these German vessels, then what ships are we to purchase under this bill, and from whom? From other neutral nations or their citizens? We can certainly hope to secure no considerable supply from that source.
> PROSPECT OF PURCHASE IN UNITED STATES.
> "Nor can we hope to purchase these ships either from our own citizens or from the citizens of other countries, if it be true, as asserted and urged by the proponents of this measure, that the rates have risen so enormously and the profits of these ships increased so largely since this war began. If that be true, what inducement would be held out to private capital invested in this business to sell its ships just when they are reaping the richest harvest?"

Our friends on the other side of the Chamber admit that that is true. They say that; they say that these vessel owners are getting higher freight rates than ever before. The cost of operation, they contend, is no greater. They seem to overlook the adverse conditions under which these people are running; they seem to think that if the United States can just get a ship and start it out on the ocean the freight rates will come down, not only with that ship but with other ships. This article continues:

> Where, then, are we to get the necessary ships? Obviously by construction. And yet this measure is urged as a temporary one—a war measure, as it were, to be promptly abandoned when the war is over and the present emergency past—certainly as soon as it becomes a "profitable" enterprise again, and therefore becomes attractive to capital.

I might insert right there what has been called attention to many times, that the President himself, not only in his message to Congress, but in his speech at Indianapolis urging the passage of this measure, expressly stated that it would be simply an emergency measure; that just as soon as the war was over—no; not that soon, Mr. President—would they turn the ships over to private parties; but when they became a paying proposition then they would turn them over to private capital. That is the kind of a bill they brought in here; that is the sort of proposition they put up to the Senate and presented to the people of this country; and that is substantially the proposition that they have now, if I understood the reading of this motion, that we are not permitted here to see and that we are asked to vote on without having been able to read it. I want to call to the attention of the people of the country, through the RECORD, that this afternoon about 5 o'clock an amendment is offered to a motion that is pending, providing for a report from the committee; as a matter of fact, framing a report for a committee of the Senate to bring to the Senate certain provisions that are to be inserted in this bill by way of amendment that most of us have not been able to see.

Is that the way the people of this country want legislation enacted? Is that what they expect of the representatives they have sent to this body? When a Senator arose and asked that we should have an opportunity to have this printed, so that we could see it, examine it, study it, and read it, it was refused. I venture to assert—and if I am wrong I should like to be corrected—that the Senators on the other side who are not friendly to this bill had not had this matter called to their attention before it was presented here; that they had not been permitted to examine it. True, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] introduced a bill—not a substitute, not an amendment, but a bill—a few days ago containing certain provisions. Of course that was printed; we have all seen it. He entered a motion to discharge the committee from the consideration of that bill, and that is what we supposed would come up in case the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to recommit the substitute presented by the Senator from Florida should be voted down; but instead of that the Senator from Florida offers, on the floor of the Senate, an amendment to the motion to recommit. It was not printed, but simply read, and the Senator then expressed the hope of having a vote on it right away. Not many Senators on this side had seen it; not many on this side knew what it contained; not many on this side knew anything about it; and yet we, as representatives of the people of the country, sent here in their interest and for their benefit, were asked to accept this proposition as it was read and as a report from the great Committee on Commerce of this body.

I submit, Mr. President, that the people of this country do not want legislation enacted in that way. No apparent exigency can justify such action, and the people of the country will not approve it. That is the way jokers are put in legislation. That is the way the people's interests are jeopardized and given away. That is not the way to legislate.

Now, I must finish this interview. I was just reading where Mr. HARDWICK states that we can not purchase these ships from the citizens of other countries. He says:

If that be true what inducement would be held out to private capital invested in this business to sell its ships just when they are reaping the richest harvest?

Where, then, are we to get the necessary ships? Obviously by construction. And yet this measure is urged as a temporary one—a war measure, as it were, to be promptly abandoned when the war is over and the present emergency passed, certainly as soon as it becomes a "profitable enterprise" again and therefore becomes attractive to capital.

POINTS TO TARIFF REMEDY.

The Congress of the United States in the recent tariff bill adopted a plan that in the past has proved most efficacious and practicable in building up and maintaining an American merchant marine, namely, a discriminating duty in favor of goods carried in American bottoms. The discriminatory rate may not be large enough to accomplish the purpose sought. If not, let us raise it. Certain treaties with foreign powers forbid its enforcement, the Attorney General held. If so, let us give the necessary notice to the powers in question to modify these treaties in this respect and then proceed to enforce the law we have enacted, and so restore our merchant marine.

I think, Mr. President, I will say just a word or two with reference to that. Our friends on the other side say, "Why do you not offer something? You have offered nothing." They seem to think that because they have offered a proposition and nothing better is offered therefore their measure should be passed. Mr. President, there is no argument in that. If their proposition is a bad one it ought not to be passed, whether anybody proposes anything else or not; if their proposition is a dangerous one it ought not to be passed; if their proposition will accomplish no good it ought not to be passed.

Personally, Mr. President, I am strongly in favor of a system of discriminating duties. I have long been in favor of that proposition. Two years ago, when the tariff bill was pending, along about 12 o'clock at night, I made a speech on that proposition, urging a provision in the tariff bill for a discriminating duty upon imports brought into this country in American ships or imposing a higher duty on imports brought in foreign ships. I had hoped that my Democratic friends would support something of that kind, because in the House they had put in a provision along that line. I know there were several Senators on this side of the Chamber who were opposed to that proposition, but I was not prepared for the opposition that came from the other side of the Chamber. There was, however, almost a unanimous voice on the other side of the Chamber in opposition to it, and before the bill went to conference they struck out the clause that the House had put in under the able leadership of Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, who made a powerful speech in favor of the proposition and who was largely responsible for the insertion of the plank in the Democratic platform of 1912 with reference to the merchant marine, because that platform, as I think I will show later, clearly committed the Democratic Party to a system of discriminating duties for the upbuilding of the merchant marine. He was on the conference committee, and he insisted upon such a provision being incorporated in the bill, and a provision along that line was incorporated in the bill. What has this administration done in regard to it? It has not only refused to carry it out, but, I suppose, it directed the legal representatives of the Governmen to appear—or, at least, the legal representatives of the Government did appear—in a case, contending that the law was not enforcible. The Attorney General's office was represented in a case, contending that the provision which they had put into the law could not be enforced and ought not to be enforced; and it is not being enforced to-day, notwithstanding the fact that the board of appraisers of the port of New York, where the question arose, in a very well considered decision held that the provision was enforcible. How can we hope to have the laws we pass carried out when the executive officers themselves appear in court and argue against them and the people's interests? I shall refer to that a little later on.

Mr. HARDWICK concludes:

Long have we Democrats insisted that business and government should be divorced; that the Government should keep out of business and business should keep out of the Government. Were our protestations insincere? Were our principles unsound? I believe not.

Now, Mr. President, I leave the question as to whether or not this bill involves Democratic principles to our friends on the other side. They know more about what are Democratic principles than I do.

I have here an interview from another Senator who has dared to take his stand on this floor against his party colleagues and against the apparent mandates of the self-constituted captain of the legislative "team."

I will say frankly that I had not a very good opinion of the junior Senator from Mississippi when he entered this Chamber. I had seen many accounts in the papers with reference to him, and I suppose all of us are prone to form our opinions of men by what we see in the papers, whether we ought to believe those statements or not. My opinion in regard to the Senator has entirely changed since I have come in contact with him on this floor, and I have as sincere and high an admiration for him as for any Member of the Senate. I admire his courage and his independence of thought and action and his devotion in the highest degree to what he believes to be right and for the best interests of the people; he is a man after my own heart; he is careful, conscientious, courageous, true to his constituents and his conviction of duty as the people's representative, and believes in doing his part as a representative independent of Executive interference or dictation; and I was not surprised, from what I had seen of him, that he proposed to act on the floor of the Senate as his judgment dictated rather than as some one else told him, whether it be from the aggregate vote of his colleagues or whether it come from the Executive chair. So I was not surprised when I saw an interview in the paper from Senator VARDAMAN, of Mississippi, announcing not only his opposition to this measure, but that he was determined to oppose it on the floor of the Senate; and he gave an interview to the paper which was very interesting, almost as interesting as the speech he made on the floor of the Senate the other day. I hope everybody who may have access to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will read that address. They will get some idea as to how things are done, or attempted to be done, on this floor, and they will also get some idea not only as to the independence of the Senator from Mississippi but as to his ability to use the English language.

He said:

I am opposed to this bill because I believe it is the most indefensible form of subsidy yet proposed.

That suggests a thought to me. Our friends on the other side denounce the Republican policy in the past because they are opposed to subsidies; and they point to their platform declarations and say: "Our platform commits us against any form of subsidy." I have not seen very much regard paid to that platform during the last two years. Possibly when this legislation is passed, if it ever is passed—not at this session, but at some time in the distant future—they will have then repudiated the last plank in their platform that they have not heretofore repudiated, because this proposed legislation is not only a repudiation of the direct terms of their platform but it is a repudiation and a violation of the very principle of the platform itself.

They seem to think that if they say that what they are advocating is not a subsidy that settles it, and no further question can be made, and there is no further room for argument. I am not surprised that they take that attitude. I am not surprised that they have gotten inoculated with that idea. That seems to be the theory upon which the "captain of the team" acts. The captain of the team seems to think that when he says a thing is so, it is; that that ends it; that that settles it. When he asserts that there is prosperity, prosperity is, whether anybody has any of it, or knows where it can be found, or has ever experienced it or not. Any thought to the contrary is a mere state of mind—a mere psychological delusion. And so our friends on the other side seem to think that all they have to do to clear their skirts of advocating a subsidy is to say that what they advocate is not a subsidy.

The people will not be fooled by any such statement or line of action as that. The people of this country will know that, even if this bill should pass and the Government should acquire a few ships and operate those ships, if any benefit comes to anybody it will come almost solely to the people whose products are carried in those ships, and nobody else. If they carry my apples in a Government ship at 5 cents a bushel, and there are no other ships but private ships to carry my neighbor's apples, and he has to pay 10 cents a bushel for their carriage, you have contributed to me a subsidy of 5 cents a bushel on my apples, and you can not make anything else out of it. It is absolutely ridiculous to contend that 30 or 40 or 50 or 100 Government ships will reduce the freight rates upon all the products to be shipped throughout the country when there are 45,000,000 tons used in the carrying of the world's commerce—absolutely ridiculous.

As has been said, and as is said here by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], this is the very worst form of a subsidy. The Senators on the other side can not shake their locks at me, so far as the subsidy proposition is concerned, either. I have not been one of the strong advocates or one of the earnest advocates, you might say, of a subsidy. I have voted for some of the subsidy measures. My recollection now is that I voted against one of them in the House. I did it largely on this ground—at least, this is my recollection: The bill provided for a subsidy not only to ships that might be hereafter built, but also to ships already built. I have always been absolutely opposed to the use of the Government money, whether as a subsidy or otherwise, for the operation of ships constructed and built prior to the passage of such legislation.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. JONES. I will yield for a question.

Mr. PAGE. Only for a question. We have been sitting here for some little time with two members of the majority present, and only two, so far as I can see. A third has just come in. I should like to ask the Senator if he feels willing to yield for the suggestion of the lack of a quorum?

Mr. JONES. No, indeed. No, Mr. President; I do not complain because our friends on the other side are not here, nor our friends on this side, so far as that is concerned. I thought I made it clear when I started out that I proposed, so far as I am concerned—and I want to be perfectly frank about it—to do everything in my power to prevent the passage of this bill, for the reason that I stated, not because it provides for Government ownership and operation of ships, because if I were opposed to that I would express my views and then let it come to a vote and let the majority be held responsible for the results; but I have a firm conviction that the passage of this bill before this war closes will involve us in that struggle. You Senators on the other side do not believe it, as I said awhile ago, and you are just as honest as I, and you may be more nearly right than I am; but believing that, as I do, I feel that it is my duty as a representative of the people of this country to do everything in my power to prevent the passage of a bill which I think will lead to such tremendous consequences, and so I do not care whether anyone is present or not.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Florida for a question only.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will ask the Senator whether he means that the mere passage of the bill would bring about complications?

Mr. JONES. Oh, no. Of course I do not mean that the mere passage of it would. The mere yea-and-nay vote here and the signing of the bill by the President would not have that effect. What I mean is that if the bill is passed and is carried out, I believe we are going to get involved in this struggle. I am going to go into that question further if I have the time.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should be very glad to have the Senator furnish some light on that subject. I can not for a moment appreciate the standpoint of the Senator.

Mr. JONES. I have no doubt the Senator from Florida is just as honest in his position as I am in mine, and from his standpoint I find no fault with him for trying to pass this bill—not at all. My conviction is as strong as it can be; and having that conviction, I feel that I am doing my duty in talking upon this measure without the presence of Senators on either side, so far as that is concerned, and if necessary to defeat the bill, for the sole purpose of delaying a vote.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to have the Senator tell me whether, in his opinion, we are justified in this contest over one single measure, when we know that in doing so we are postponing the consideration of every one of the important appropriation bills that are to come before the Senate?

Mr. JONES. Why, Mr. President, I do not believe that the other side is justified, as a majority, in keeping this bill before the Senate to the exclusion of everything else, under the circumstances. The responsibility is on them. It is not on us. They are responsible for legislation, in a way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES. In just a moment. Of course I recognize that every Senator here has a responsibility to his constituents and to the Government, and before the Senator from Mississippi came in I had expressed regret that this measure, as other measures, had been made a party measure, because I have no party bias on it at all. As I said, I do not recognize any party bias on any question except the tariff. I do recognize a party bias on that. As I said—the Senator was not here, and that probably necessitates my going over a little of this again—I have voted for a good many of the important measures of this administration, and I have been criticized at home to a certain extent for it, but I did it because I thought they were right and were better than what we had. I thought it was my duty as a representative—not as a Republican, but as a representative of the people—to vote for what I thought was right, and that is what I am going to do during the entire administration, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now does the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I will yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wanted to ask the Senator a moment ago—he said the responsibility was over there—whether he did not think it was a dual responsibility? We are charged with the responsibility of trying to get a vote. That is all we are trying to do now on this question. Does not the Senator think that that is an ordinary parliamentary responsibility that could not be evaded, and does he not think that his side is assuming the responsibility not of defeating the legislation by a square vote, but of preventing a vote upon the legislation?

Mr. JONES. I was going on, Mr. President, to talk about that situation.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts for a question.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Washington if the positions of the two parties are not changed from what they were last week? The Republicans last week were willing and anxious to vote on this proposition, and we were unable to obtain a vote on account of the filibuster conducted by the majority.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will pardon me——

Mr. JONES. If I can yield without yielding the floor, Mr. President, I will do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator can yield to me without yielding the floor, because I shall ask a question.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have ingenuity enough, I think, to put it in an interrogative form. Does not the Senator think that after the Senator from Massachusetts has interrogated me through him I have a right to make this reply?

Mr. JONES. The Senator has a perfect right to make any reply he wants to, so he does not take me from the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am asking the Senator a question now, as to whether the Senator does not think I have a right to this reply which was caromed off of him onto me?

Mr. JONES. Well, Mr. President, I want to answer that question. I would be glad to give the Senator from Mississippi the right to answer that question. The trouble is——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not going to answer the question.

Mr. JONES. Just wait a moment, now. The Senator and his party, in order to carry out their desires with reference to this legislation, have overturned the whole practice of the Senate of many years, so that now when a Senator is interrupted he must rather look with suspicion upon the Senator who interrupts him for fear he is trying to get the advantage of him in some way; that he is trying to take him off the floor, or that he is trying—which amounts to the same thing—to end his speech, so that he can not speak more than once more on the proposition in the same legislative day. Now, that course by the majority has put us in the position—which I think is a very humiliating one—where a Senator must say when he is interrupted, "Yes; I will yield for a question. I can not yield for anything else." The Senator and his party are responsible for that. I am sorry. I always like to yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I simply rose for an interrogation——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is not in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Merely for a question.

Mr. JONES. I will yield to the Senator for a question, and a question only.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That question is this: Whether the Senator from Washington does not think I have a right to ask him whether he does not think the question propounded by the Senator from Massachusetts might be properly answered by saying that during the entire proceedings we have been attempting to proceed to get a vote upon the main question, and to avoid a vote upon a collateral issue which was introduced merely for the purpose of sidetracking the main question?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi he ought to have the privilege, at any rate, not only of asking me a question but to make a statement or suggest an answer to anything that might present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask the Senator if he did not think that was proper?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is not in order.

Mr. JONES. I think it was proper; but I go further and say that the Senator ought to have a right to interrupt me for almost any purpose. Mr. President, under the practice of our friends on the other side they have actually throttled legitimate debate on this floor. They are actually preventing the interchange of ideas and that legitimate debate which reaches correct conclusions. That is what they have done. I am going to take that up a little further on, if I have time to do so.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator whether, based upon his long experience as a Senator and a Representative—and he has been in the two Houses for a long time—for how many years?

Mr. JONES. For sixteen years.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the Senator if he does not believe that the rulings which now control the debate in this body serve to throttle every proper effort to reach the best results in the discussion of any question?

Mr. JONES. Absolutely. I am going to take that up a little further on in my remarks, unless the time to act upon this bill should come around before I am able to do it.

Now, before coming back to this interview with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] I was diverted by these interruptions from the thought I was on at the time. I wanted to state my position in reference to the subsidy question. I have not been a very earnest or strong advocate of subsidy. I have taken this position, and I have expressed it before my people, many time during my service here. I am willing to vote for any measure that will upbuild and develop a merchant marine for this country. I voted for some of the subsidy propositions, not because I thought they would do what their advocates thought they would do but in the hope that they would accomplish the results, to a certain degree at any rate. I have always felt that we could not pass any subsidy measure that would compensate our owners of ships in the operation of our ships under the handicap they act by our law in competition with other countries.

Furthermore I have felt that if we did pass a law that would give a subsidy to an American-operated ship, which would compensate for the difference because of subsidies given to other ships and the difference in the cost of operation, just as soon as it was demonstrated that we had fixed a proper amount the other countries would then raise their subsidy and their subvention and we would again be at a disadvantage, and I knew that under their systems of government they could do that, while we could not turn around and raise our subsidy to meet theirs.

Senators understand the situation with reference to legislation better probably than the public generally, although I think the public generally pretty well understands the situation. No question of this kind can come up but that there is more or less politics brought up in connection with it, and we have difficulties in the way of enacting legislation growing out of it which, as has been stated, prevailed while we have been in the majority in this body and in the other House. For a great many years we have not had any substantial legislation for the upbuilding of the merchant marine. Why have we not had it? Because the Democratic Party has solidly opposed every proposition that we have presented and a small number on our side. Not only that, but you have done exactly what you now condemn us for doing, or for not doing. You have not offered any proposition in the 20 or 30 years we had control of this Government. You have satisfied yourselves with simply opposing what we have presented. So it comes with very ill grace from you to say that we must pass this because we have not proposed anything else.

As was suggested awhile ago, there are propositions coming from this side of the Chamber that in my judgment will meet with the full support of every Senator on this side and would enact legislation under which benefits would come without in any possible way endangering the peace of this country.

I know that in another body, which it might be unparliamentary for me to name, when these subsidy measures were proposed there were propositions presented by our friends on the other side for discriminating duties. Those propositions had my support every time, but you did not seem to present them very seriously on the floor.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I will yield in just a moment. If you would present some proposition of that kind on this floor, it would have much support on this side, but I admit there are some of our friends on this side who think it is an unworkable proposition. I do not take that view. I think we ought to say to the nations of the earth with whom we have treaties that bind us hand and foot, we will take advantage of the provision of those treaties which provide that they can be abrogated upon one year's notice. I would abrogate those treaties. I would liberate our Government so that it could put into force and operation a policy under which our Government would build up and maintain a merchant marine in this country.

Yet our friends on the other side almost unanimously voted against the proposition two years ago. "Oh," they said, "we must ask the consent of other nations in order to do this." It was not very many years ago when under "the peerless leader" you were saying "we want to do things without the consent of any other nation on the face of the earth." If you had a little of that independence now we would accomplish something in the way of building up a merchant marine.

I yield for a question to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Chair a question of order. I see there is only one Democrat in the Chamber aside from the occupant of the chair. It seems to me that something ought to be done to enliven these proceedings in some way so that we may have more Senators here. I should like to ask, if I may interrupt——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator only for a question.

Mr. PAGE. I make a point of order. May I be allowed to proceed with the understanding that the Chair will call me to order if I get beyond the proper limit of asking a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator from Vermont has not stated a point of order, and the Senator from Washington will proceed.

Mr. JONES. As I have said, I have been very strongly in favor of and I am now in favor of going to the policy of discriminating duties. I believe under that we would build up a merchant marine in this country. But I did vote for some of the subsidy propositions. I voted against some of them, as I said a moment ago, for the reason that they were not confined to ships built after the passage of the law. I have offered amendments to the pending bill that would confine it to ships built hereafter. Of course, I know that that would not meet the emergency situation very well, but it would insure us getting some good ships. It would not only insure us getting some ships, but it would insure employment for the labor of this country, the consumption of American material, the upbuilding of American shipyards that would be a most desirable thing to attain. As I said, I am going into that proposition a little further later on.

Now, I want to come back to this interview with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. He said:

> It is one of those peculiarly dishonest measures which will "keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope."

Of course, the junior Senator from Mississippi did not mean that Senators were dishonest or anything of that sort, but the effect of this measure is to deceive the people, making them think they are getting something when they would not get anything.

> It is violative of every tradition—> and platform declaration of the Democratic Party. The scheme as interpreted by the President is a mistake of policy, wrong in morals, pernicious in principle, and therefore will be disappointing in its ultimate results.

Says the Senator—

That is very strong language. I think it is justified by the character of the measure and by what is likely to come from it.

> If the Government ownership and operation of steamboat and railroad lines is to become a permanent policy, there might be some little excuse or justification for this measure; but when we are told by the President that it is only a temporary makeshift—and who will question the authority of the President to speak in this matter?—it leaves it without excuse or justification.

Mr. President, the Senator is absolutely right in that. The President will control absolutely in this matter, no matter who he may be. If he does not want this shipping board to take action after the emergency, so called, passes, it will not take any action. So, those who want a permanent policy on the part of the Government, those who want permanent ownership and operation of these vessels, will be disappointed if the President does not believe in that policy, and those who want it as a temporary proposition will be disappointed if the President should believe in the permanent ownership and operation of these ships. So the Senator from Mississippi was well within the truth when he said that this is a dishonest measure, a deceitful measure.

In his address to Congress on the 8th of December last the President said: "It should take action to make it certain that transportation at reasonable rates will be promptly provided, even when the carriage is not at first profitable; and then, when the carriage has become sufficiently profitable to attract and engage private capital and engage it in abundance, the Government ought to withdraw."

That is a wonderful proposition, it is an amazing proposition to be presented by the Executive of a great people. The President suggests that here is an enterprise that is unprofitable, an enterprise that private capital will not go into. Now, let the people take of their money, take of their taxes, and start a line, bearing all the loss, work up the trade, get it profitable, and then do what with it? Turn it over to private capital. It is an amazing proposition. It is one that, in my judgment, the people of this country would not tolerate for a moment. Yet that is what the President says we should do.

I saw in a paper the other day—it may not be correct; I do not know about that—that there had been conferences with the President by Members of the Senate, not only on that side but on this side, and that the President was willing to accept some amendments and some changes; but the President said these amendments would make no substantial difference in the bill in its operation and effect.

It seems to me it would be a very substantial change to provide in the bill a different policy from that set out by the President in his message, and when the President says that the amendments he is willing to accept will not make any substantial change in the bill I assume that he still has in mind the carrying out of this policy, and that he still expects, if he is given authority, to operate the ships until they become profitable and then turn them over to private capital.

Mr. President, it would be better not to pass such legislation as that. We can not afford to pass legislation that will use the people's money to make a business profitable and as soon as it is profitable turn it over to private capital. We are recreant, it seems to me, to our duties and our obligations to the people and the trust reposed in us when we propose to do anything of that kind. But that is what the President said in his message to Congress and that was the theory upon which our friends on the other side began to act. The Senator said:

It is a peculiar character of mind which reasons to a conclusion and justifies the appropriation and expenditure of funds contributed by all the people to an enterprise of this character, which it is admitted must be a losing and unprofitable investment from the start. Congress has just as much right to donate funds from the Public Treasury to the cotton growers of the South who, because of the war in Europe, have lost by the depreciation of the product of their farms something like $450,000,000 this year. Congress has just as much authority to subsidize the cane growers of Louisiana, the beet growers of the Northwest, and the manufacturers of the Northeast as it has to appropriate money to buy ships to carry the manufacturers' products to foreign markets at the cost of all the taxpayers.

The Senator from Mississippi can not see but what that is a subsidy, and I can not see it, either. The mere fact that it is a subsidy would not give it any terrors, however, to me, so far as that is concerned. I attach no especial importance to the word "subsidy." If I can use some of the money of the people to help all the people to a greater degree and to a greater extent than the money used, I think I have done good. So the question of whether or not a thing is a subsidy has nothing to do with my judgment in determining my action upon a measure. Our Democratic friends seem to think just because they have declared in their platform against subsidies that, if there is anything that they think is a subsidy, the mere fact that it is a subsidy, no matter whether it brings any good to the people or not, no matter if it might be the most beneficent act that could be done, they must oppose it; they must not wink at it. Nevertheless they take up a proposition, and they say it is not a subsidy, but which is the most insidious and unfair subsidy that could be proposed. Some of them see it; some of them admit it; some of them know that it is a subsidy. Others seem to be a good deal like the ostrich who sticks his head in the sand and hides his eyes and then thinks his whole body is hidden. So our friends on the other side say "this is not a subsidy," and they seem to think the people will accept that, and that will settle it. The Senator from Mississippi does not see it in that way. He says:

If their demand was without merits or wrong in principle, who will say this measure is right?

Before I go on with that, I want to say that I voted for the measure that was proposed to help out our southern people in their great distress. I am not in favor of that as a general proposition and as a general practice, and I have been taken to task at my home by some of my people for voting for what they called such a socialistic proposition as that; yet I think I was justified in my action. I think when a great section of the country is threatened with ruin, when 20,000,000 people are threatened with industrial ruin, if the Government can help those people it can not engage in any better business than in doing so. I acted upon that legislation not upon a general principle, but I acted upon it because of peculiar conditions and extraordinary circumstances existing at the time. I would do the same again under similar circumstances and similar conditions.

So, if I thought this great emergency here could be met by legislation of this kind without involving us in a greater danger, I would cheerfully and gladly vote for it; but, Mr. President, no financial considerations, no industrial conditions can offset or balance the possible destruction of life and the tremendous suffering that may be brought to the people of this country by the passage of this legislation.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to ask in what way the question of life and the tremendous suffering of the people of this country can be involved or is designed to be involved by this bill? The Senator would have the country believe that we were planning a system whereby we were to annihilate the population and bring disaster, misery, and woe upon every man, woman, and child, when the reverse is the proposition.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am yielding only for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, I ask that question. With what reason and on what ground can the Senator base such an unreasonable and preposterous assumption?

Mr. JONES. Of course, I want to say to the Senator that the Senator shows by his question what I would not have said.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was not quoting the Senator literally, but I have not sought to put words into the Senator's mouth.

Mr. JONES. I am not complaining of that at all; but I am complaining that the Senator has not been present during my remarks.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. But I am present just at this juncture, and it was what the Senator was then saying that prompted my question.

Mr. JONES. I know that if the Senator had been present all the evening he would have understood the reason for that statement; and I am not criticizing the Senator for not being here, either.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I sincerely trust that I have not misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. JONES. No; the Senator from New Jersey has not misunderstood me, but he does not understand the basis I assume in making that statement.

I want to say to the Senator that I regretted to say, when he rose to interrupt me, that I would have to yield only for a question. I should like to yield to the Senator for any purpose whatever.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I realize that.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but the Senator——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I realize the Senator's courtesy.

Mr. JONES. I can only yield for a question; but, as I said awhile ago, the Senator and his colleagues of the majority over there have overridden the ancient and time-honored customs of the Senate that permit a Senator to allow another Senator to interrupt him to interchange ideas and reach a correct conclusion; so I am not responsible for having to do that; the Senator himself is responsible for it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, no, Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. But, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. JONES. I yield only for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I only want to repel that thought.

Mr. JONES. I can not yield for that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am not responsible for any such stifling process.

Mr. JONES. I can not yield for that. I made that statement because I had not noticed the Senator from New Jersey voting against rulings of that character. If he is against them, I am glad of it, and I hope at the first opportunity he will exercise his right, and what I think to be his duty as a Senator on this floor, to express himself in that way and assist us in going back to those rules under which we did have legitimate debate and proper interchange of ideas and views.

Now, with reference to my statement, the Senator was not here when I said—and I hate to take the time to make this statement, but I feel that in justice to the Senator I ought to do so—that I have a conviction that if we pass this measure and it is attempted to be carried out it will involve us in the war in Europe. The Senator does not believe that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. No.

Mr. JONES. I do. I have an abiding conviction of it. I have a great fear of it. I may be mistaken; I hope I am; but I think I will show later on that there is good ground for my fear; that there is good basis for my fear; but whether there is a basis for it or not, I believe it. I believe it just as firmly as I know that I am standing here; and having that belief and having that conviction I feel it is my duty as a representative of the people, even if I thought it would bring the industrial relief that our friends on the other side say it will bring and hope it will bring—I say, with my belief that the ultimate results and ultimate consequences would mean war, loss of life, broken homes, broken hearts, devastation of cities, and destruction of property, it is my duty as a Senator, as I see it, to do everything in my power to defeat this bill. That is the reason why I said I could not weigh against the loss of life and the destruction of homes and the breaking of hearts a few paltry dollars for a few shipowners or a few producers who may be favored by any possible ships that we may get or any possible lines that we may establish. That is the basis for my statement. I may be wrong; and, a I have said, I hope I am wrong; and I know the Senator is just as sincere in his belief that it will not bring those conditions about as I am in my fear that it may.

But, continuing this interview and rereading one sentence where the junior Senator from Mississippi refers to the failure to enact this legislation for the relief of the cotton growers of the South:

> If their demand was without merits or wrong in principle, who will say this measure is right? I am opposed to this bill because it is class legislation, pernicious in its conception, and necessarily unjust in its execution.
> It will be remembered that the bill provides for ships to engage in the foreign trade exclusively. The cast-iron, rock-ribbed, Government-favored coastwise monopoly is treated as a sacred thing—too sacred to be touched.

I differ somewhat from my friend from Mississippi with reference to the character of the coastwise shipping, but he believes what he says, and, believing that way, we can not be surprised that he should take such a strong attitude against this foreign proposition, because, as has been often shown here, as a matter of fact, there is a combination in foreign shipping. I have a report of the Merchant Marine Commission here that I may read, if I have the time, which shows these combinations. But do you think that if the Government should establish a line that it will keep out of such combinations and conference agreements? My recollection is that the Panama Railroad & Steamship Line, about which we have heard so much, itself entered into some of these conferences. They have to do it for their protection from these monopolies. Government ships and a Government line would not prevent that and would not destroy it, but would be destroyed by it, unless it should provide for certain and definite lines.

> The Government-owned boats are to be mere pioneers or business missionaries, as it were. Regardless of the expense, they are expected to go to the waste places and work up the business, to be turned over later to private individuals, who are to reap the profits of a business which has been built up at the expense of all the people. The whole scheme, to my mind, involves an unwarranted, illegal, and immoral prodigality of money coined by the sweat and blood of the masses of this country and extorted from them by unjust and immoral laws.
> It is a dangerous departure, an innovation upon our time-honored system, violative of the spirit of our Government, and, I fear, the issue will be trouble to the party that proposes it and chagrin for the men who conceive it.

Oh, Mr. President, if there was no danger to anybody except to the Democratic Party, I would not worry a particle; if there were no ill results to come to anyone except the party that proposes the measure, I would be content with stating my grounds of opposition and then let it go.

> I am in favor of an American merchant marine. I shall vote for such measures as may be necessary to put our ships on the dead level of opportunity with the ships of all other countries that come into our ports. If we shall by law, which we have a right to do, improve the standard of living for the sailors, we will at the same time elevate the standard of character and manhood of the men who operate the ships.

Right there I want to refer to a peculiar legislative situation. The Senate passed a bill a long time ago to provide better conditions for American seamen and provide better conditions under which boats might be operated. That legislation is greatly desired by the seamen and the laboring men of the country. It went to the House of Representatives. The measure has been passed there. It came over to this body and has been sent to conference. What is the matter? Why is it not brought out here and passed? Why do they not reach an agreement and bring in a report and let the Senate act upon it? Why not pass legislation that will put our seamen upon an equality in opportunity with the seamen of other countries? Why not pass this legislation that will go a long way toward placing the shipping of this country, what little there is, and what shipping may come, upon an equal basis with the shipping of foreign countries?

Oh, they can not do that, because they must pass this legislation. That legislation, in which humanity is interested, can not be brought up, but legislation that may help some people get a few paltry dollars must be pressed to the exclusion of everything else. I want to say here and now to the seamen of the country, to the laborers of the country, that they will not get that legislation from this Congress if this bill is pressed. I doubt if they will get it, anyhow. I hope that when our friends on that side become convinced that they can not pass this legislation—and they can not do it—they will recognize the inevitable and go to work on something that they can pass and that will do some good. What is the use of actually wasting the time of the Senate in trying to do what you can not do and what the country does not want done?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator would not mind my asking him a question, I should like to ask him, after his declaration at the beginning of his remarks, which are expected to extend for 12 to 14 hours, in which he stated that he would take whatever steps were necessary to prevent the majority having the right to reach a vote on this question, if he does not think that when the minority deliberately sets itself up to throttle the majority, the majority would be justified in throttling the minority?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, that is very much in line with a great deal of the argument of our friends on the other side. I have heard time after time, as an excuse for legislation on that side, "Oh, you Republicans did so and so." Why, I expected when our Democratic friends got in that they would not follow in our footsteps, and yet they seem to be doing it all the time. But, Mr. President, I did not say that we wanted to throttle the majority. I will say to the Senator now that there is not one-third of the membership on that side of the Chamber in favor of this legislation.

Mr. OWEN. I should like the Senator to answer my question now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington further yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. JONES. Just wait until I get through answering the Senator's question. There is not one-third of the membership on that side of the Chamber that would vote for this legislation free from Executive dictation and domination.

Mr. OWEN. I should now be glad to have the Senator answer my first question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington further yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. OWEN. I did not ask the Senator to yield. I asked him to answer my first question.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator will just hold himself in patience——

Mr. OWEN. Oh, I am quite patient.

Mr. JONES (continuing). And if I have the time to do it, I shall try to answer it. I believe, granting that you have a majority on that side—and you have not; you know you have not; it has been shown that you have not. You had to come over to this "team" to get somebody to help out your team, in order to put your legislation through in some shape or form.

Mr. OWEN. We needed a few recruits to take the place of those we lost.

Mr. JONES. You have not got a majority over there for this legislation; but granting that you have, I thought the Senator, from his first remarks in connection with this question, was here and heard my position, in which I stated——

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator will permit me, I heard him state in substance that he intended to occupy the floor at great length for the deliberate purpose of preventing action——

Mr. JONES. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. OWEN (continuing). And he concluded by saying that he was going to kill the bill by talking against time.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; the Senator did not hear me say anything of the kind, Mr. President. The Senator did not hear me make any such statement. I have not stated on this floor that I was going to occupy a whole lot of time; but I have said, and I say it again, as far as that is concerned, believing as I do—and I am only speaking for myself; I am not a great leader like the Senator from Oklahoma, but I am speaking for myself only—believing as I do that this measure will involve us in this terrific strife in Europe, I consider it my duty as a Senator and as a representative of the people to do everything in my power to prevent the passage of the bill. It would not make any difference if I were the only Senator upon this floor opposed to it. It is not a question of throttling the majority; it is a question, so far as I am concerned, of doing my duty.

Mr. OWEN. Of preventing the Senate from coming to a vote is what the Senator means.

Mr. JONES. Of defeating this bill.

Mr. OWEN. Of preventing a vote, is what the Senator means, and he knows it.

Mr. JONES. Well, suppose I do mean that?

Mr. OWEN. He knows that.

Mr. JONES. Suppose I mean that?

Mr. OWEN. The Senator can not deny it.

Mr. JONES. I do not deny it.

Mr. OWEN. Very well; the Senator confesses it.

Mr. JONES. I will prevent a vote on this bill if I can.

Mr. OWEN. Then it is time to move the previous question on the Senator.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes. I have heard the Senator suggesting "previous questions." I have not any doubt but that the Senator went about over this country denouncing "gag rule" in a certain body in this country. Why, Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator is turning upon the instrument that brought his party into power, because there is not any one thing that is more responsible for the Democratic majority in this Senate than the cry throughout the country of "gag rule," suspension of debate, the rule of the caucus, the limitation upon the power of the representatives of the people. It did not apply to this body. It would be unparliamentary for me to say what body it did apply to, but nevertheless it is the truth that this charge was made; and now, after the Senator and his party got into power on this cry, they want to inaugurate this system in this body. They want to shut off debate here, legitimate debate.

At the risk of having to go over it again a little later on I am going to refer to something that I shall take up more fully further on, and that is the situation in the Senate. Talk about debate on this bill! Mr. President, this bill is not yet completed. You do not know yourselves what you are going to pass.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. JONES. I will yield for a question.

Mr. OWEN. The question which I should like to ask the Senator is whether he seriously says to the country that his course of conduct now, in talking all night on this bill, is honest and serious and sincere debate?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma never was more sincere than I am now. Oh, yes, Mr. President; we are going to have a censor on this floor! The Senator from Oklahoma, just the other day, wanted to regulate the tone of voice in which we should speak!

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I do not yield just now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. JONES. Now he is trying to censor our motives on this floor. Ah, Mr. President, it will be a sad day for the United States Senate when the Senator from Oklahoma becomes its censor and its master. Then we will have to wear, possibly, a certain cut of clothing. Then we will have to comb our hair in a certain way, after a certain style. Then we will have to regulate the sort of sentences we use. Then we will have to be careful about the authorities we read. Then we will have to be careful how much we read, how often we read, how we stand on the floor. Ah, Mr. President, this body is not the place for gag rules. This body is not the place for the previous question. It is not the place for a partisan censor.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. JONES. Not just now. This body is not the place for censorship. This is the only real deliberative legislative body in the world; and yet under the Democratic Party—the party of the people, the party of free government, the party of deliberation—it is ceasing, just as fast as it can, to be a legislative body and a representative body; and the Senator from Oklahoma, who so loudly professes his belief in free and deliberative government, is most imperious in striving to gag this body and stifle free and deliberative action.

Mr. President, I am going to take up that line of thought a little bit later on, but I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator for a question if he desires to interrupt me at this time. If not, I shall proceed with this interview, and I will touch on that matter a little bit later on.

Mr. President, this seamen's bill is not going to pass. You are not going to pass it. You will not do it. I hope the seamen and the laboring people who are so much interested in that legislation will recognize the fact that the Democratic Party has cast aside every form of legislation and every kind of legislation and every legislative act of any importance in order to try to push through this bill without consideration and without discussion.

Our merchant marine must be built up by the free exercise and operation of economic laws and sound business principles. The Government of the United States has the power to put the forces in motion which will build up a prosperous and adequate merchant marine. I am opposed to the hothouse methods of economics in governmental matters. I do not think it is fair to take the money from the pocket of the wealth producers of this country and donate it to the owners of ships. Such a policy can not be justified by any other rule than that of the rule of might. It can not be defended upon any other theory than that might is right. The contention that the ships be bought under the terms of this bill will facilitate the transportation of cotton grown in the South to the foreign markets is not the proper spissitude to fool anybody.

There is no scarcity of ships. If the seas shall be rid of the mines and the obstacles brought about by the war shall be removed, there are plenty of ships to carry all our products to the foreign markets. The suggestion that the Government of the United States will send its ships to places where privately owned ships flying the American flag will not go is absurd. As a matter of fact, Government-owned ships will be more careful not to violate the laws of neutrality. They will be more careful to avoid every possible complication with the belligerent powers of Europe than will ships owned by private individuals.

But there is one thing that would happen, I am quite sure. A lot of unprofitable property in ships that are floating idly in the ports of this country in order to hide from the gunboats of hostile nations would be unloaded upon the Government of the United States at a good profit. And I am sure that after the war is over, and especially after the people of the United States shall have had an opportunity to pass judgment upon this proposed bill, that these same ships will be resold to private owners, and the American people will pocket a loss of $75,000,000 to $100,000,000. No; to my mind the bill is a legislative evil without a mitigating incident, and from the depths of my heart I sincerely hope it may be defeated.

Mr. President, in addition to the gentlemen who gave these interviews, we have five other Senators of the majority who have taken a bold stand in opposition to this measure. They have expressed their independence of any dictation from the outside, and they have shown that they propose to act as representatives of the people rather than as members of a team, subject to the orders and the decrees and the punishments of a captain, and they are among the ablest and most experienced Senators on this floor.

Mr. President, I have taken a much longer time than I had intended or expected to take in showing that I do not treat this as a partisan measure, and also in showing the character of support that it has. Now, I want to come to another proposition. Out in the city of Tacoma they have what they call the Amen Corner. At noon there are certain of the business men who gather together for lunch at a restaurant or hotel—I think it is in a club—and around their noonday lunch they discuss the various matters at issue before the people, and they call it the Amen Corner. A short time ago I received a letter from a good friend of mine, who is a member of this Amen Corner, and he attached a postscript to his letter in which he said:

Amen Corner hardly approves filibustering.

Of course that would please my friends on the other side. That would please my friend from Oklahoma very much. Then he goes on to say this:

Prefers frontal attack.

Mr. President, I am going to talk just a little while to the Amen Corner, not only the Amen Corner in Tacoma but to the Amen Corners throughout the country. That, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] suggests to me, will include Squash Center and Hoosiertown and Podunk Creek, and so on.

I have not any doubt but that in a great many cities and towns and villages of the country at every noonday there are little Amen Corners talking over what we are doing, and how we are doing it. They are intelligent people; they know pretty well what is going on, but they do not know all the details of things as they happen here. They are generally, of course, opposed to filibustering, and so am I. I would never engage in a filibuster unless I felt that there was some very unjust action proposed or that the consequences of the legislation, as I believe in this case, would be of tremendous, far-reaching injury to the people. I do not believe generally in filibustering. I am for the rule of the majority whenever the majority is a real majority and favored by reason and discussion.

I wish to call the attention especially of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who is so much afraid of filibustering, who is so down on filibustering, to the fact that no important legislation, no legislation of great benefit to the people of this country has ever been defeated by filibustering. Only legislation that has been thought to be by a great section of the country or by a great body of this body most injurious and most dangerous has been defeated by filibustering.

I remember since I came to this body a filibuster, carried on by whom? By the Senator from Oklahoma. It was not a frontal attack, either, like they ask for here. What was it? In the closing hours of the closing day of a short session of Congress when we were getting ready to pass the final appropriation bills to run the Government, without warning, when an appropriation bill was up, the Senator from Oklahoma rose in that aisle and said that legislation should not pass unless certain things were done. It was not a frontal attack. It was something like they have charged on the other side—a submarine attack. He did not begin to filibuster early in the session. He waited until the very last day and the last night, and then threatened to kill an appropriation bill unless certain things were done. He accomplished his purpose and delayed the admission of New Mexico as a State for one year.

Now, I do not complain of that; not at all. Things like that do not happen very often. That is the only time it has happened since I have been here in six years. No disastrous results came from that. They did not need the previous question.

I do not know but that I would be in favor of a proposition that would bring us to a vote on the appropriation bills in a short session of Congress. When I came over here from another body, where I had kicked quite frequently about the gag rule, and where several times I had voted against my party and voted to overthrow the Speaker's decisions, I thought, "Well, now, when I get over there to the Senate I will do what I can to have these long-winded debates cut short." But I wish to say frankly, Mr. President, the longer I have been here the more I hesitate about limiting debate on this floor. There have not been very many things killed by filibustering, by long debate. When we talk about filibustering our minds naturally go back to what? They go back to the force bill. That was defeated, and I expect justly so. Debate may sometimes seem unduly long here, but it has most generally resulted in great good to the people. It has been rather exasperating to a few impatient Senators, who could not get things done just as they wanted or just when they wanted, but no one can point to a time when the interests of the people have really suffered by debate in this body.

Right here I am going to warn my friends on the other side, and I am going to repeat it a little later on, if I have time. I want to warn you that the methods which you adopt in trying to drive through legislation that you have been ordered to put through will be used against you when another majority comes in, as it will. It may not come in your time; I think it will, but it may not. However, it will come when your successors are here.

Gentlemen, there is a great question which is sleeping in this country. It is not dead. And the methods that you adopt will be used to put legislation on that question through this body. You had better think about that. You had better study about it.

We are disappointed sometimes that we do not get through what we think ought to go through, and we get impatient; but we should stop and look and listen. We had a sign out in our State last fall—I saw it in the papers—about legislation. It said, "Stop, look, and listen." We used to say in railroad trials, "Stop, look, and listen." You had better stop, look, and listen in reference to the methods that you use to enact legislation here to which there is great opposition.

Mr. President, if there were only one or two or three Members on this side opposed to this legislation, you would not have any serious trouble in getting it through. The majority, if it is a real substantial majority, can pass this legislation. It can always do it, except possibly in a short session, where there is a limit upon the term of the session. But what is the situation here now? It is very much as it was with the force bill, if you please. My recollection is you were united on that side against it and you defeated it. There was a majority for it, but a bare majority. They could not force the legislation against a united and determined minority. If there had been only three or four on that side against that bill, it would have gone through; it would have been enacted into law, filibuster or no filibuster.

No, Mr. President, the rules of the Senate, it may be, ought to be changed in some respects; but I believe it would be a sad day to this country when debate is limited in the United States Senate. We ought to have one deliberative body in this country, anyhow, and whenever the Senate ceases to be a deliberative body its usefulness ends, and we will have an autocracy in fact, if not in name.

It is also true that all the important legislation I have any recollection of has really been framed and put in shape in the United States Senate. It has been put in under the practice of free and open debate, the interchange of ideas and views, and not under a system by which, when a Senator gets up and interrupts you, you have got to say, "I yield for a question only."

I know we have a rule in the Senate which says that a Senator can not farm out the time. That is proper. That is all right. I make no complaint of it, and its enforcement in a proper way is well. But the idea that a Senator can only be interrupted by a mere question is not a very dignified position for the United States Senate to take.

Mr. President, I want to say to the Amen Corners of the country that we want to fight in the open, but the majority will not let us. They will not permit us to make a frontal attack. Why? Because you, the Democrats, get together in secret, shut the door, have a caucus, work out your legislation, and discuss it; nobody knows about it; nobody knows what reasons are given for a change of mind, and you agree upon what you say ought to go through. Then you come in here a mere majority by force, by the power of might, not by the power of logic and reason and of good judgment, but by the power of might, and say, "We are going to put this through." What is it you are going to put through? We are going to put through something that is framed up in secret. Talk about frontal attack; whenever we begin to attack you in front you retreat to your caucus and shut your doors. I should like to meet you in the open.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. I gladly yield for a question.

Mr. CLAPP. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not think at this particular point it would be a good plan to explain to the Amen Corners what they evidently do not understand, that beginning with a committee of the Senate, say, of 17, 9 constitute a majority. The 9 are of the majority side. Five constitute a majority of the 9. Any power that can coalesce 5 makes it a party measure of a majority, to which the other 4 must subscribe or be charged with want of loyalty to party. It then becomes a caucus matter, and, instead of a majority framing the bill a small minority frames it, after which it is utterly impossible to put most desirable and meritorious amendments upon the bill unless the little coterie of five, the beginning of the power, consent to it. Does not the Senator think that right in this connection it would be well to let the Amen Corners understand that there can be under this system no frontal attack?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Minnesota for asking me that question. It is a very pertinent one, and it brings out the situation much more clearly and much more concisely than I could bring it out. His question answers itself. That is correct, and what he has described is the way things are done under the present method of procedure.

I am going to call attention a little later on to how this bill has been brought out from time to time and then sent back, and all that sort of thing. It goes, as the Senator says, to the committee, and a majority of the majority of the committee agree upon it and they bring it out. It is just like any caucus; if they have 40 members in the caucus, 21 is a majority of that caucus, and they say that a certain amendment shall go on, and its goes on, and the other 20 probably, very generally, surrender their views with reference to it. It comes on the floor of the Senate with a vote of 21, but back of it are the 40, and the 20 on this side or the other side trying to amend it are just like running their heads against a stone wall; they can not accomplish anything.

In another body, that I will not name here, it used to be that when an amendment was offered from the opposite side on any kind of a bill it was voted down if the chairman of the committee opposed it. Now, we are getting that way here in the Senate. We are getting so now that when a bill comes in and an amendment comes from somebody the chairman says the committee is opposed to it, and they expect everybody on that side then to vote against the amendment.

That is the way we are trying to legislate now. That is not the way we ought to legislate. That practice, followed very long, will destroy the usefulness of the Senate. They complain about long speeches that we have been making, and they call it filibustering. They started out before we even began the discussion on this bill and said that the Republicans were filibustering and were going to filibuster. They took the position that the bill would be passed without discussion, without consideration, and just as it was sent to us from the executive branch of the Government. The only comment of the majority leader [Mr. KERN] when the President delivered it was, "We have the votes to pass the bill," and that has been the theory of their action from that time on. We made some long speeches, it is true. Why? Because we had to do so or else not consider the bill at all. What did they say? Well, they said if a Senator yields for anything but a question he has lost the floor; he has closed his speech. Then what did they say? They said, "We are going to invoke the rule which says a Senator can not speak more than twice on the same subject on the same day."

They have construed that to mean the legislative day. So to prevent a Senator speaking more than twice they extend a legislative day over a week and threaten to extend it a month, and they said they were going to extend it from that time to the 4th of March.

Mr. President, this bill involves many great fundamental principles and policies of Government that ought to be discussed, that should be discussed fully and completely. Every speech that has been made, except possibly one, has been made on the bill; those speeches have been made on the provisions of this bill. Even the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who spoke all night, discussed the bill from beginning to end. It has been legitimate discussion, able discussion, discussion that Senators on the other side have profited by listening to.

To get this bill through they have set aside the practice of the Senate in order to prevent legitimate discussion; but who has been filibustering up to this time? The Democrats. They have been filibustering; they have been filibustering to pass this legislation; they have been laying aside and holding back every kind of legislation and all the legislation of this body. Why? In order to force this legislation through. They evidently concluded that they could not put this legislation through by legitimate discussion, by reasonable debate. Therefore they said, "We will not permit any other legislation to go through; we will not take up the calendar; we will not let appropriation bills pass; we will not let the seamen's bill come up; we will not let other matters of importance come up; we will not let them even be considered." They filibustered against it.

Why, my friends, almost before this bill was framed—at least, before it was in anything like the condition in which it now is—the leader of the majority gave a notice to this side of the Chamber. He told us what we might expect. There had not been any filibustering up to that time. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] had made a powerful speech upon the merits of the bill, I think it was three or four hours long, but it was a very instructive, a very powerful, and a very persuasive speech. It was entirely on the bill; it was not on any side issue at all. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] had talked a couple of hours; he had discussed the bill; he had discussed the merits of it. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] had spoken several hours, but everything he said was germane; everything he said was able and learned and directed to the bill and to the terms and policies of the bill. By no significance that has ever heretofore attached to filibustering could that term be properly applied to what had taken place, and yet, on the 26th day of January, after, I think, we had had a legislative day running since the 15th of January, and on the very day that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] brought in from the caucus by caucus direction, by the direction of a majority of a majority, reported to the Senate a substitute that we had not seen, that had not been printed; on the very day that that substitute was presented here, before we had had time to consider it, before we had had time to examine it, what did the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] say? He said:

> I think, however, it is fair that notice should be served upon Members on both sides of the Chamber that it is the purpose of the majority that there shall be night sessions hereafter throughout this week, and that hereafter, in case of one Senator becoming exhausted, it will be necessary that some other Senator shall be prepared to take his place; otherwise, a vote will be insisted upon.

Gentlemen of the Amen Corner in the city of Tacoma, gentlemen of the Amen Corners all over the country, that is the way we are attacked; gentlemen of the Amen Corners of this country, that is the method of the majority; gentlemen of the Amen Corner, the majority brings from a secret caucus an entire substitute for the bill that we had been discussing legitimately, and before that substitute is printed, before we have a chance to examine it, they tell us that we must be prepared to consider the bill day and night, and that if a Senator becomes exhausted some other Senator must take his place or that a vote will be had. Gentlemen of the Amen Corner, they were not going to debate it; they did not propose to discuss it on the floor of the Senate. They had discussed it how long? For a week, day after day. Where—in the Senate? No. Gentlemen of the Amen Corner of Tacoma and of all over the country, do you know what arguments they presented to each other in behalf of this substitute? No. Why do you not? Because they had the doors locked and the press shut out, and they talked in whispers to each other. Could we make a frontal attack on such proceedings? No. Gentlemen of the Amen Corner, do you know by what vote that substitute was agreed to? No; you do not; I do not; nobody does. We get a few of the secrets once in a while on this floor. I was rather struck the other day with a remark of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], for whom I have the greatest admiration, and whose ability commands the attention of every Member of this body. What did he say? He said that in the caucus he wanted this bill to be brought out on the floor of the Senate subject to debate and amendment. They voted him down. Where? In the caucus. Where? Behind closed doors. For what reason? I do not know. The Amen Corner does not know, and they will never find out, except from what he said on the floor of the Senate—that he wanted the bill brought in here and debated and amendments considered, and they would not consent. That is what we would like to have done; but the caucus decreed otherwise. A frontal attack we can not make. What caused the substitute to be reported? The debate we had had; the arguments Republicans had presented.

On the 26th of January the legislative day had lasted for, I think, 11 days. Why? In the hope that Senators opposing the bill would have made two speeches on that legislative day, and therefore their mouths would be closed, and when the substitute came in they would not be able to discuss it. Then we were notified that we had to discuss this measure day and night or a vote would be taken upon it.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. Certainly, for a question.

Mr. CLAPP. Was that before or after the first substitute was brought in?

Mr. JONES. Oh, I think that was after the second substitute was presented.

Mr. CLAPP. The second substitute?

Mr. JONES. I think so. I will cover that a little bit later squarely; but I think that was after the second substitute was brought in. At any rate, it was after the bill had been reported by the committee with amendments, and then a substitute was brought in, I think the second substitute.

Mr. President, I have tried to explain why it is that when a Senator rises to interrupt the Senator holding the floor he has to say he will permit an interruption only for a question. The Amen Corner may wonder about that. They may look at the RECORD of a few years ago, and will not see anything of that kind; if they examine the RECORD they will see that when a Senator is speaking and another Senator gets up and addresses the Chair and asks the Senator if he will yield, and the reply is, "Why, certainly, I am glad to yield," and they will see a debate between those two Senators that results in something; there is light thrown upon the question, as the Senator from Minnesota well suggests; they will see an interchange of ideas, a combating of ideas, and a reaching out to get at and arrive at the truth. Now, when they examine the RECORD for some weeks past they will read where a Senator rises the Chair asks the Senator having the floor whether he yields, and that Senator replies, "Yes; I yield for a question, but for a question only," they will wonder what it means, and I want to tell them. I want to tell the Amen Corners and the country just why we have to do that. It is because the other side hope to shut off debate. They have had their debate in the caucus and they want to stop legitimate debate on this floor, and they use that method to do it. So they got a ruling from the Chair that if a Senator yields for anything but a question, he yields the floor, and it ends his speech. The Chair is not to blame. The majority insisted upon it; they sustained a ruling of that kind, and have made it a rule of this body by the force of numbers. That is the reason, gentlemen of the amen corner, why we have to do that way when another Senator interrupts the Senator occupying the floor. That is the method which our Democratic friends have adopted to shut off debate, to prevent us from arriving at the truth in regard to these matters and overturning the caucus action and the caucus decrees.

Why, Mr. President, the course that we have had to pursue would be laughable if it were not so serious, if it were not so much beneath the dignity of the Senate. Many times in the course of this debate it has looked as if the Senator having the floor had to watch, had to be on his guard for fear some advantage would be taken of him; he had to watch his fellow Senators for fear they might take what we would call really an underhand advantage of him. Mr. President, there have been methods and practices while we have been trying to carry on this debate beside which the practice of justice of the peace courts would be a paragon of fairness; and I want the Amen Corner to know that; I want them to understand that; I want them to see why we can not make frontal attacks.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. I will be glad to yield for a question.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, for a question. I have a great deal of sympathy with the Amen Corner because I am a good deal of an amen sort of man myself; but would it not be well for the Senator, while discussing that phase of the matter, to point out to the Amen Corner how a large section of the country through caucus domination is actually deprived of any representation here? If it so chances that politically one section may be of one party largely and another of another, a great group of sovereign States absolutely have no voice whatever in the framing of a bill under a system that permits of no amendment because a caucus has decreed that there shall be no amendment.

Mr. JONES. That is true, lamentably true. I regret that it is true; but it is the inevitable result of caucus legislation and caucus rule that it practically eliminates great States and great sections of the country from participation in legislation.

Mr. CLAPP. Whole groups of States.

Mr. JONES. Whole groups of States, as the Senator suggests. Why, Mr. President, that is illustrated just in this very case. I do not wish to suggest sectionalism about any legislation, but I ask the Amen Corners of the country to take the Congressional Directory and find out the Senators of the majority and where they come from, and then find out the Senators of the minority and find out where they come from, and then they will see what the effect of caucus rule by the majority has upon each section and upon each State. I hope that the Amen Corners of every State in the Union will see whether or not they are denied representation in the United States Senate because of this secret caucus rule. All you have to do, gentlemen of the Amen Corner, to determine who was in the caucus behind closed doors is merely to see who the majority Senators are, and if you want to find the Senators who were not inside the doors of the secret caucus, if you want to find out what States have no representation on the floor when the caucus decree comes in, just see where the minority Senators come from, and, gentlemen of the Amen Corner, it is very easy for you to determine whether you are in the State that has had representation or whether you are in the State that has not.

Gentlemen of the Amen Corner, take your directories and see what State the Senator from Indiana, the leader of the majority, led and represented when he said, "We have the votes to pass this legislation." Were you represented in his cohorts or were you excluded?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator to yield for anything. I simply want to preface the question, inasmuch as he has put it in that form, by saying, if the Senator will allow me to preface it, before I ask the question——

Mr. JONES. If I can without losing the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask the Senator, under Rule XIX, if he will permit an interruption?

Mr. JONES. I shall be glad to yield for a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want the Senator to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question, and I insist on my right to the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator from Washington allows a Senator, under Rule XIX, to interrupt him, will he have lost the right to the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator address that question to the Chair?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. All parliamentary inquiries are addressed to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will only decide them when they are before him.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That parliamentary inquiry is before him now. I ask the Chair, if the Senator allows me to interrupt him, if he will lose the floor under Rule XIX, which provides that—

> No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent, and to obtain such consent he shall first address the presiding officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, in all courtesy, is bound to say that it will depend wholly upon the nature of the interruption.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to interrupt him for the purpose of asking him a question, but I do not want the Senator to yield. I want him, under Rule XIX, to permit an interruption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under all parliamentary law a speaker can not hold the floor and yield it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not ask him to yield it; but the Chair is ruling that he can yield it for a question. I ask him if he will be interrupted for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. I gladly yield for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator yields.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to interrupt the Senator from Washington for the purpose of asking him a question. I find nothing in the rules, and I want to ask the Senator if he does, which provides that a Senator can yield for a question, or that the Chair can permit him so to do. The rule is that—

> No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent.

Under those circumstances, when a Senator rises in his place and addresses the Chair under Rule XIX, and asks if the Senator having the floor will permit an interruption, the Chair is in the habit of saying: "Does the Senator having the floor yield?" I submit, and I ask the Senator from Washington if he does not agree with me, that the ruling of the Chair that a Senator who submits to an interruption, unless he guards himself by saying he does so only for the purpose of hearing a question, yields the floor, is an utterly unfounded and arbitrary ruling. The Chair has no right to ask a Senator if he yields. There is nothing in the rules that indicates it; and I ask the Senator if he does not think the whole ruling of the Chair to the contrary is based upon a fiction and a misconstruction of the rule?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think that is correct. I think it is entirely arbitrary, but it has the majority back of it. The majority has sustained that arbitrary ruling, and it has been made the rule of this body by the majority. I am very glad indeed that the Senator from Connecticut brought out that point, because I know that the Amen Corners of the country will understand it fully and clearly; and I want them to understand just what has been done here, and the way it has been done, and the reason why we can not make a frontal attack on the measure.

Mr. President, I also want to call the attention of the Amen Corners of the country to another circumstance. It may be just a circumstance. About a week ago—I think it was a week ago last Friday—we got an intimation on this floor that this bill was going to be passed that night. For a couple of days we had been honored here by the presence of the Secretary to the President. He had a perfect right to be here. I was glad to see him here. I supposed it was simply a social call that he was making. We had given him the privilege of the floor, and we were glad to have him here. He is a fine man, a most competent secretary, and I like him very much no matter what our political differences may be. These do not interfere with our personal relations or opinions. On Friday he was here. I supposed he was here simply making a social call, conferring with his friends upon the other side, and I suppose that is true; but when I saw him here at 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning it seemed to me it was a very long social call. Then I wondered—perhaps I did not have any right to do it; perhaps I ought not to have done it, but I wondered—whether he was watching the team to see whether or not there was any shirking, or whether he was here to see whether or not the orders to the team could be carried out and this bill pushed through on Friday night. He was coaching the team, I suppose.

But, Mr. President, nothing would have been thought of that had not other things happened. If the Executive of the country had not likened the great representatives of the people, the representatives of the great States of the country, to a team of which he was the captain; if he had not said that the team should do what the captain tells them to do, and that the members of the team should get off of the breeching strap and work together, we would not have thought anything about that. I would not, at least. But after these declarations, after the Executor of the law seemed to take the position that the great representatives of the States were nothing more nor less than the members of a team that was here to do his bidding, then it is not surpising that we wondered why the Secretary to the President should come to the Senate and stay here until 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning.

The Amen Corners of the country can determine why that was done. I have not any doubt but that the members of the Amen Corners of the country know something about baseball. I have not any doubt but that they know what a team is, and I have not any doubt but that they know what a captain is, and I have not any doubt but that they know what a captain expects of the team, and what the team expect of the captain if they do not do what the captain tells them to do. So they can draw their conclusion as to why we were honored, at 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning, by the presence of the President's Private Secretary occupying a seat on this floor. What sort of a report he took back the next morning, when the bill did not pass, I leave the Amen Corners to imagine.

I will give our friends on the other side credit for this—they did the best they could to carry out orders, and if any of them have been chastised by the captain, I want to vouch that they did all they could to carry out orders. They did the best they could to obey the commands of the captain.

Why, what did they do, Mr. President? Some amendments were offered to the bill that night. Did you let them be discussed? No; you would not permit any discussion. What did you do? You moved to lay every one of them on the table.

Now, I expect the Amen Corners understand what that means, but for fear that some of them do not, I am going to tell them what it means.

When you move to lay an amendment on the table you can not debate it. It cuts off all discussion. It cuts off all debate. It is a most effective cloture. Therefore our friends, the team on the other side, whenever an amendment was offered on Friday night, moved to lay it on the table and thereby cut off debate—no stand up and fight, no frontal attack, but by sheer force of numbers they voted down every amendment, no matter how meritorious it might be.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES. I yield, gladly, for a question.

Mr. STONE. The Senator was speaking of motions to lay on the table cutting off debate. Would the Senator favor a rule, even a modified cloture, under which a time might be fixed for voting on bills?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am afraid that if Senators keep coming in and going out I will never be able to conclude this address. I have already expressed my view with reference to the cloture matter.

Mr. STONE. Oh, I beg pardon.

Mr. JONES. I do not blame the Senator for not being here, but I have had several interruptions that way about points that I have already covered and Senators coming in and apparently being anxious for information as to my position about them. I am very glad, indeed, to go over the matter again, and I think probably I can get the time to do it.

Mr. STONE. No; I do not want the Senator to go over it again.

Mr. JONES. Oh, I know the Senator does not, but I am glad to do so.

Mr. STONE. I would be glad to have him answer me directly whether he would favor such a rule.

Mr. JONES. The Senator does not present the rule. I do not know what he has in mind, and really I would not like to commit myself absolutely.

Mr. STONE. Is the Senator in favor of a fair, modified cloture in the Senate?

Mr. JONES. I said a while ago that I believed I would favor a reasonable proposition to bring about a vote on appropriation bills in a short session. I am not sure but that I would vote for a proposition to fix a time within which a vote could be forced in a short session; but, as I said a while ago, the longer I am in the Senate the more I am convinced that it would be unwise to adopt a cloture rule in the Senate. I went over that matter at considerable length.

Mr. STONE. I will read it.

Mr. JONES. I know the Senator really does not want me to take the time of the Senate in going over it further.

Mr. STONE. No.

Mr. JONES. And for fear I might take too much time, I do not believe I will go over it again; but that is, briefly, my position.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator is about through, I will not interrupt him any more.

Mr. JONES. I do not know just exactly how long I may go on, but if a few more Senators come in and ask me about things I have already gone over, it might take some little time. It is possible I may run for an hour or so yet.

Then, Mr. President, what did they do? On Friday night, after orders had been sent down to pass the bill—that is, I heard that orders had been sent down; I do not say they had been; I do not know, but it looked awfully suspicious—after they had voted to lay all amendments on the table they came up to—what? To the substitute that had been brought in here on the 26th day of January—a substitute brought in from the caucus, from the secrets of the caucus, where they had voted down a proposition to consider the bill in the Senate by debate and by amendment, but no doubt had determined there to put it through just as they had agreed to it behind closed doors in the secret precincts of the caucus! They brought it in as a substitute instead of bringing the changes as amendments. The substitute is one proposition for discussion. If they had brought in different amendments, each could be discussed. They could not shut off debate without moving to lay their own amendments on the table, and of course they could not afford to do that.

They did what? They ordered the yeas and nays on the substitute. What does that mean? It means that at the request of one-fifth of the Members present it could be ordered that when a vote was taken on the substitute it would be by the yeas and nays. Then what did they do? On Friday night, under the eye of the President's representative, they held that after the yeas and nays were ordered amendments could not be offered; that it shut out all amendments, no matter how meritorious. That is something, Mr. President, that has never been heard of in a deliberative body, but by strong-arm methods, by steam-roller methods, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] suggests to me, they decided that amendments could not be offered after the yeas and nays had been ordered. And they were ready for a vote unless somebody commenced to talk. They did not go quite so far as to hold that after the yeas and nays were ordered there could not be any talking. Possibly if they had thought about it a little more they might have done that, but they did not, and so we had to discuss the bill.

I am glad to say that just the other day a majority of the Senate deliberately held that after the yeas and nays were ordered the bill is still open to amendment, or that a motion to recommit can be made. There were some of the majority who could not quite agree to the former proposition. They thought that that was going a little too far, and they were very wise in that conclusion.

So now we have another bill brought in here and we have an opportunity to discuss it, and that order for the yeas and nays is gone. In my judgment, it will never be presented here again in that form.

Mr. President, after Friday night, when business did not come as they hoped and as the order had been sent down, they began to discuss other methods. Why do I say that? I see here in the Times of Sunday, January 31, an article like this:

Democrats must alter ship bill.

Senator OLLIE JAMES may be called upon to-morrow to block filibustering.

Then the article closes in this way:

Senator OLLIE JAMES, of Kentucky, may be called upon to break up the filibuster against the shipping bill. The public received an intimation to-day that this plan is under consideration by the Democratic leaders.

I wondered what it meant that they were to call on Senator JAMES to close the filibuster. The Amen Corners do not understand the significance of that, I know. Probably very few of them have ever met the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. He is a great man. I had the honor of serving with him in the other House. He is a fine Senator, a splendid man, a great big man in every way, handsome, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] suggests to me, magnificent in intellect, but I do not think that was under consideration when they were talking about him to block the filibuster. Yes; he is great in physique, and that is what they were probably considering. I do not know what else.

How did they expect the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to block filibustering? Why not the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]? Why not my good friend from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON]? Why not the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]? Why did they not select him to block the Republican filibuster? Why not the great Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]? Why not the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]? Why the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to break the filibustering? Why not my honorable friend from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]? He is handsome, strong, powerful, a man of great ability, but not so strong physically probably as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. Why did they not call on my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who is so much opposed to filibustering, and who has had some practice at it? Why did they not call on him to break the filibuster? Why did they not call on my friend the great Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who has honored my State as a Representative in the other House and is now honoring my native State of Illinois by his service here, to block this filibuster that these Republicans are carrying on? Why not the great Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], able, alert, active, strong? Why not ask him to break this Republican filibuster? Why not my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], with whom I was proud to serve in the House of Representatives? He is an able man. Why not ask him to break this Republican filibuster? Why not my friend from Oregon [Mr. LANE]? He is a new Senator here like myself, but active, alert, energetic, a friend of the people, always careful of their interests, looking after their welfare. Why not select him to break this Republican filibuster?

I do not know, except I have this idea. My friend, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]—he is my friend and I think a whole lot of him—he will admit is a very partisan man. He is intensely partisan. He honestly believes that almost any method is justified to carry out the party decree, the caucus action, the mandates of the captain of the team. He is great, big, brawny, six feet two or three or four, powerful. Is it possible that they wanted him to carry some method into effect because it takes those qualities to put it through? Is it possible that they were going to consider the United States Senate as a football field, where brawn and muscle and weight count? Is that the reason why they selected him?

I understand that my friend from Kentucky presided over the Baltimore convention. Is that the reason why they selected him to block the Republican filibuster? Did they expect his experience there to assist in the work here? Did they expect the same methods to be followed in the United States Senate that might be followed in a political convention?

Mr. President, I can not understand any other reason for the suggestion that the Senator from Kentucky would be used to break this Republican filibuster; if not to break it, to block it. What method does that suggest?

Mr. President, they may need something of that kind in some parliamentary body, they may need some Kentucky methods in some organizations, but they are out of place in the United States Senate.

No, Mr. President; you will never hear any more talk about getting Senator JAMES to block filibustering in the United States Senate. The majority of this body will not use strong-arm methods to pass this or any other legislation, and it is well for the body and it is well for the majority not to do it. As I said a while ago—and as there may be some Senators who are here now who were not here then, I want to repeat it—Senators, the methods that you used here to pass this or any other legislation will be used by another majority to pass legislation. That majority will use against you the methods you use here; or if not against you, then against your successors, because you will not always continue in the majority.

I want to suggest to most of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, and I do it in all sincerity, there is a question that is not dead. It is sleeping. You and your people are tremendously interested in it. If you use methods in this body to shut off debate, to shut off discussion, to shut off consideration upon this question or any other, those same methods will be used upon that question, and ill will be the day for you and the country when methods that you may pursue here may be adopted to enact legislation with reference to that question.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. JONES. I think I know what the Senator wants to ask and I shall decline to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. JONES. I will not suggest the question, simply because of the consideration I have for certain people and certain sections of this country. I think I realize more than I used to what it means; but I suggest to my friends on the other side to follow the admonition that was used out in our State with reference to various measures last fall: "Stop, look, and listen!"

Mr. President, if any consideration is given again as to how to block a Republican filibuster, you had better not try to devise ways and means and methods except those that are open, square, fair, and legitimate. It may be that a temporary advantage will be gained for this measure. It might be; but the good now is far overbalanced by the ill by and by.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Amen Corner of Tacoma and of the Amen Corners of the rest of the country to the course which has been pursued with reference to this particular measure; just what it is and how it has been introduced and reintroduced and reported and rereported and caucused and recaucused and revised and revised again, not only to show that our friends on the other side when they put the bill in did not know what it was or what it meant or what it would do, or what could be done under it and with it and by it, but also I want to show that they learned something from the discussion that we had here on the floor, even if we did have to make some long speeches in order to get it before them.

This is Senate bill 6856. It was introduced in the Senate December 9, 1914, by the learned Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], one of the great leaders on the other side of the Chamber and one of those to whom all the majority look up with great respect and reverence.

This bill is entitled "A bill to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. President, I am going to read this bill. I am going to read it myself, and I am going to tell the Amen Corner why I do it. I read it myself because I know the majority would not allow the Secretary to read it for me. That is another method that they have pursued. If they will examine the records they will find that years ago very frequently when a Senator was making a long speech in order to rest himself he would send a document up to the Clerk's desk and have the Secretary read it. I think this was done away back in the celebrated filibuster on the force bill. Some of our good friends from the Southland, talking a good while, had the Secretary read from the desk, and that rested them. I know the majority would not permit that now. They insist upon the Senators here exhausting themselves. That is what the Senator from Indiana, as will be found on page 2520 of the RECORD on the 26th of January, gave notice would be done. He practically advised us that we had to go night and day; that if one of us got exhausted he had to have some other Senator take his place and proceed, or else they would have the vote. I want to read this bill. I hate to take the time to do it, but I feel that I ought to do so, so as to get these matters in the RECORD in a consecutive kind of way, because I am going to show when this bill was introduced; then I am going to show when it was reported and how it was reported; then I am going to show these various substitutes coming on here one after another from the caucus, to show how these legislative days went along. In order to properly do that, so that the Amen Corner people will fully understand it, I have to read it into the RECORD. So I shall read this bill, which was introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] on the 9th day of December—and I want them to remember that date—

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States—

Mr. President, I want the Amen Corner to notice that, whether Senators here in the Senate notice it or not. There has been some talk here that the United States is really not doing this; that this is going to be done by a corporation; and that they create a corporation to do it; but notice how the bill starts out. It does not say that a corporation is going to do this; but it says that the United States is the entity here. The United States is the real thing involved in this matter; the United States will be the real owner, the real operator, the real constructor, the real purchaser of any vessels that may be secured under this bill or which may be used under this bill.

That the United States, acting through the shipping board hereinafter created—

That is simply the agent of the United States; that is all it is—may subscribe to the capital stock of any corporation now or hereafter organized under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof or of the District of Columbia upon the terms and conditions herein mentioned.

That is the form in which the bill was introduced. It was a sort of roving kind of a corporation. They did not know where it was going to organize; they did not know how it was going to organize; they did not know whether there was any State in the Union under whose laws it could be organized; they did not know whether there was any law anywhere passed by any body under which it could be organized; but that is the way it was put in. When asked if there was any such law they admitted they did not know.

Now, a little discussion on this side of the Chamber—not on the other, not by the majority, but a few feeble suggestions by the minority—called the attention of the other side to that condition, and it seemed to be of such force that by and by, as I shall show in some of these other bills, they actually changed the measure in that particular and provided a definite corporation, organized at a definite place in a definite way. If we had just let you gone on, there is no telling where you would have landed; there is no telling what would have happened; there is no telling what you would have had. You would not have been able to have done anything under the bill. You can not suggest that it would have been changed in the other House. Why not? Because you are not going to let it be changed in the other House; oh, no. Just as sure as the sun rises, if you let this bill get through the Senate—it may be unparliamentary to say it, so I will not say it; I will not say that it would not pass through another body without any change whatever.

Mr. WEEKS. It would.

Mr. JONES. But it would, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] says. So our discussion, no matter if it was a long speech, no matter if it did take all night, no matter if you did call it filibustering, you took advantage of it, you used the suggestions made, and you cured that defect in the bill, anyway. So we have served one good purpose with reference to this measure, if no other. The bill continues:

SEC. 2. That the object of such corporation shall be the purchase, construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels in the trade between the Atlantic, Gulf, or Pacific ports of the United States and the ports of Central and South America and elsewhere to meet the requirements of the foreign commerce of the United States. The initial capital stock of such corporation shall not be over $10,000,000, of the par value of $100 per share, but the shipping board, with the approval of the President, may consent to or cause an increase of the capital stock from time to time as the interests of the corporation may require: Provided, That the United States shall subscribe for 51 per cent of each and every such increase. The United States shall subscribe to 51 per cent of such stock at par, and the remainder thereof shall be offered for public subscription. The United States may further subscribe at par to an amount of such stock equal to that not taken by public subscription. Such corporation may begin business as soon as 51 per cent of such stock has been subscribed and paid for by the United States.

That is the end of section 2.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to the particular language of this bill in this place. These merchant vessels are to be used "in the trade between the Atlantic, Gulf, or Pacific ports of the United States and the ports of Central and South America."

Mr. President, I want to say right here—I shall probably notice it a little further on, if I have the time, but, for fear that I may not, I want to say right here—if you had stopped there, I think I could have gotten my consent to vote for and support the bill, especially if you put in a provision that would restrain us from purchasing the interned vessels; that is, I would be in favor of this: I would be in favor of the Government constructing vessels and establishing lines between the ports of this country and the ports of South America. I believe that would be a good thing; I believe it would work out pretty well. I would not put these vessels in as a temporary proposition; I would not put them in as a proposition that, when they got to paying, we should turn them over to private capital; not at all. I would establish those as permanent lines; I would get some of the best ships; I would have them built. I do not like the idea of purchasing. I am going to call your attention, if I get the time, to what we have done under the emergency act which was passed a short time ago with reference to the registration of foreign ships under our flag. I am going to show you that, without inspection and without examination, you have gotten in a lot of old tubs, a lot of old ships 25, 30, and 40 years of age, sailing under our flag without inspection and with foreign officers and crews.

I should like to see the Government provide for the building of ships in American yards and out of American materials equal to some of the finest ships that float, and put them on regular sailing lines between ports of the Atlantic and South America and ports on the Pacific and South America. I should like to say to the merchants of this country and to the business men of this country, "Gentlemen, we are going to maintain the sailings there; go and establish your business connections; organize banks in those countries so that you may have banking facilities; send your drummers, drum up business, and establish a trade, and we will give you transportation lines." Then you would have something that would be worth while; you would accomplish some good.

From what I can find there is no great emergency now in the transportation business between this country and the South American countries. Those countries are in a bad condition financially and industrially on account of the European war and because of their business connections being largely with European countries. By the time we got our ships built and our lines established I believe, at least I hope, that the war will be over, and that we will then be prepared and in condition to take advantage of the business opportunities in South America. In my judgment, if the majority would do something of that kind, they would accomplish some constructive, beneficial legislation; they would have my support, and I think they would get lots of support from this side of the Chamber. Many Senators on this side, I think, would be glad to join with them in such a plan.

In this connection the thought strikes me that in order to make it a success you would probably have to revise your tariff. It would not bother us on the Pacific coast so much; but I can see how the people of the Middle West might object. Why? Because, as I understand the situation, what we would take largely to South America would be manufactured products and what we would bring from there would be farm products, and the wheat growers and the corn growers and the cattle growers and the sheep growers and the swine growers and the oats growers might object to the Government bringing in Government ships products from foreign countries to reduce the price of their products, especially if they were admitted free of duty, so that it might be necessary to have a tariff on some of those products. It probably would be outrageous for you to contemplate such a terrible thing as that; but, nevertheless, I think it would be a good thing, and I should like, then, to see lines of that kind established, because we ought to have a far greater amount of trade with South America than we have to-day.

It looks to me, in fact, as if you were squinting at that. I have not read it, but am I not right in saying that the President, I think, in his annual message—that is my recollection; I went over and heard the message, and my recollection is that the President in his message to Congress directly suggested it—urged that we should have more of the trade with South America, and that is one of the reasons why we wanted ship lines? I may be wrong about that, but I think he did make that suggestion, and you had that idea in this bill. What did you say? You said the object was to operate "merchant vessels in the trade between the Atlantic, Gulf, or Pacific ports of the United States and the ports of Central and South America." If you had left out the two words "or elsewhere," it would have taken away a whole lot of the trouble about this bill. Why did you use the expression "or elsewhere"? Why did you not say "the ports of Europe, the ports of England, Germany, France, and Italy," just as you mention South America, the Gulf, Atlantic, and Pacific ports, but instead of that you merely say "or elsewhere."

Mr. President, if you will keep these ships out of warlike waters, out of war-infested waters, out of war-endangered waters, I will be with you on most of the provisions of the bill. I think, if you would do that, I could even overlook the word "purchase" in the first part of the provision I have read; but as long as you have Government vessels go into waters that are mined, waters traversed by submarines, the waters of hostile, fighting belligerent countries and territories, you are inviting trouble, and trouble will come; and because of that condition, because of that fear, I am unalterably opposed to this measure.

Of course, I know that the other side have a good deal of human nature about them, just as the rest of us have. When the filibuster started up on the other side about a week ago, it demonstrated to me that you were about of the same clay as we on this side. You were not ready then to go to a vote. You did not talk so much, but you used your power to adjourn. You would not talk yourselves and would not let us talk. You would not consider the bills on the calendar pressing to be heard, pressing to be acted upon. The seamen's bill, hanging in conference, ought to have been brought out and passed; but you would not take such action, and you will not pass anything, except you are going to try to pass this bill.

You are a little different from us in some respects. I do not know whether it is exactly analogous, but it looks a good like it to me. I remember that at the short session of the preceding Congress, after your party had been successful at the polls, there were a good many appointments which had been sent to the Senate before the election which had not been confirmed, and a good many came in after the election. They came in the regular course; the appointees were entitled to confirmation; there was not anything against their characters; there was not anything against their ability; there was not anything against their competency; the offices had become vacant in the regular, ordinary way and in due course of time, but you would not—what? You would not confirm them. Why? Because you wanted the offices yourselves. That is the reason, and the sole reason. You wanted the offices for some of your friends. I do not know that I blame you so much for that; you had been out a long time and a lot of your people were very hungry. You did not realize, as we did, that it was the worst asset you could have to fill those places, but you would not confirm. We said, "Well, we have a majority and we will confirm," and we started to do it. But what did you start to do on the other side? You started a filibuster. For what? For principle? No. For the good of the country? No. For what? For the offices, for the loaves and fishes, for the spoils of office. You said, "No; we will hold up legislation; we will hold up confirmation." What did we have? Not discussion on the merits, because they could not do that; but I remember my friend, my very genial and lovable and philosophical friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], came in here one day on the confirmation. He was reading about airships, flying machines, submarines, and all that sort of thing; and what did you do on that side? You said to us, "You can not confirm any of these officers. You might just as well face it. You can not do it." That is what you said, and it was not one or two of you that said it. You all said it. You were united in the proposition. You said, "You can not confirm these nominees. They are all right, but you can not have these offices. You can not confirm them."

What did we do? Hold up all legislation? Did we say, "If we can not do that we will not do anything"? Why, no; we threw up our hands. That is what we did. We let them all go, and we went on about what? About the business of the Government, carrying on and enacting legislation, and doing what we ought to do.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question.

Mr. GRONNA. Before the Senator leaves the subject of constructing ships to ply between the United States and the South American ports——

Mr. JONES. Oh, I will not leave that subject for some time.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to ask him if he would build these ships or advise the constructing of these ships unless we were quite sure of transacting some business with the South American countries? And can the Senator from Washington give us any information as to whether or not we could get the business, except, perhaps, in agricultural products, products to compete with those of the citizens of our own country? Would the Senator from Washington suggest constructing these ships and sending them to any country where they are growing cotton, for instance, and bringing it here in competition with the products of the citizens of our own country?

Mr. JONES. I expected my friend from North Dakota to be thinking about something of that kind. I think I suggested that opposition might come from that section of the country.

Mr. STONE (to Mr. GRONNA). The next time you do that, I am going to make the point of order that he loses the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. I just asked him a question.

Mr. STONE. Yes; but you made a speech.

Mr. JONES. My good friend from Missouri is threatening me with this rule that they have adopted here.

Mr. STONE. I did not say a word to the Senator.

Mr. JONES. He is going to make the point of order——

Mr. STONE. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not even address him. I was talking to my friend the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. JONES. Oh, I know the Senator did not address me. I knew that; but, nevertheless, my ears are pretty good sometimes.

Mr. STONE. But it was a private conversation with the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but I am afraid of these private things. That is what is the matter. We have too many of these private things, these secret caucuses, and all that sort of thing. Of course, I know that the Senator from Missouri would not take me off the floor to-night. If he did once, I would get on the floor again, you know. There are two other subjects included in this motion and you can talk twice on each one of them. It gives a good deal of time, but I guess I had better be careful about these interruptions. I hope the Amen Corner will just watch that and note——

Mr. STONE. What is the Amen Corner?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question.

Mr. STONE. The question is, Does the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] constitute the Amen Corner in the Senator's congregation?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, you see the Senator calls upon me to go over ground that I have already covered. I regret to take the time, but I shall do it, and I hope the Senator will not leave, because I will tell him who this Amen Corner is. It is not here—oh, no; oh, no. Now, I hope the Senator will not leave, because I know he wants this information.

Mr. STONE. Really, I do not.

Mr. JONES. I hope the Amen Corner will note that when I propose to give the Senator from Missouri the information as to who they are, what respectable citizens they are, he does not want to hear about them. Oh, no, Mr. President; the majority will not want to hear from the amen corner; but they are going to do it. Yes; in about two years from now the Amen Corner is going to speak, and it is going to speak even louder than it did last year.

In response to the question of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], I suggested a moment ago that there might be objection upon the part of our friends in the Middle West to using Government ships to bring products which would compete with them into this country. As to whether or not we would have the business there now, I doubt it. I doubt if we would have business for a while, but I am willing to follow the President's suggestion. I am willing to go that far and follow the President's suggestion that we will start these ships, and we will see that they make good, we will run them until they do develop a business that pays, and then I would not turn them over. I would keep them, and let the Government run them and let the people recoup themselves for what they had lost in running these boats without business. I do not think they would have business for some time; but I do believe this, and I have a lot of data here that I am going to refer to, if I have the time before I get through, showing the trade of South American countries, and showing where the trade goes, and showing what kind of trade it is, and showing the tremendous amount of it that, I think, we could get if we had transportation lines directly between this country and those countries.

I will say to the Senator that I do not think it would pay at the start, but I believe it would not be long until we would have a good business developed. As a matter of fact, if we would say to the merchants and manufacturers of the country, "Now, gentlemen, in 12 months from now, or 10 months from now, we will have ships, first-class freight ships and passenger ships, sailing from New York, Charleston, Baltimore, Galveston, San Francisco, Seattle, and Tacoma to the ports of South America every few weeks or every month regularly, and we will maintain those ships there for all time." I believe by the time that came around they would have business worked up so that we would have a pretty good business to start with; and I have not any doubt but that very soon these ships would be going back and forth there loaded with passengers and with products.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington further yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator says he is prepared to give us information. Does he mean as to tonnage, or would he be able to give us information as to what articles we would have to deal in?

Mr. JONES. I think I have a table giving the articles, the products, and the imports and exports of those countries, showing their foreign trade.

I offered an amendment to this bill to strike out the words "and elsewhere" and the word "purchase." If you would leave out the word "purchase" and leave out the words "and elsewhere," while I do not like this shipping board, and while I do not like the means that you take to carry it through, I would have the Government do it directly without any subterfuge or any intermediate or anything of that sort—I would vote for your bill. I believe it would be a good thing in the end; at least, I do not think it would injure the country very much.

Now, I must read the next section of this bill:

SEC. 3. That the United States, through the shipping board and with the approval of the President, is authorized to purchase or construct vessels suitable, in the judgment of the shipping board, for the purposes of such corporation, with a view to transferring them to such corporation, and for this purpose the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the request of the shipping board, may issue and sell or use for such purchases or construction any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury of the United States under the act of August 5, 1909, the act of February 4, 1910, and the act of March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, the total amount not to exceed $30,000,000 for the purpose of purchasing or constructing such vessels.

If we are going to have this shipping bill, if we are going to do it through this shipping board, I can not understand why their action must still have the approval of the President. Why keep the hands of the President directly on this shipping board? If the shipping board is a good thing, if it is a good body let it act independently of Executive dictation. The President can not hope to give investigation to these various matters. He can not hope to familiarize himself with all the various problems that come up. He can not hope to familiarize himself with these different propositions to purchase or to construct vessels. Why put that in his hands? I do not know, but I can see possibilities. I can see possibilities in the case of the best President, the best-intentioned President—and we never will have a President who is not well-intentioned. I am sometimes rather amused about our statements here and there about "the President is sincere," and "the President is honest and patriotic." Of course he is. We never expect to have a President who is not; and, really, it is sort of a reflection to suggest that the President is sincere and patriotic. Of course he is. Of course he means to do what is right. He tries to do what is right, but he has to act on somebody else's advice very much.

I know one case. I am going to give it as illustrative of what can be done. There was a certain class of work in this country placed under the direction of a certain Cabinet officer. It involved the question of taking up projects of various kinds. One project was brought to the attention of the Cabinet officer. The bureau having charge of it recommended against it. The Cabinet officer approved the recommendation of the bureau. What was done? The Executive ordered the project taken up. It was taken up. Five or six hundred thousand dollars was expended. It has been an absolute failure from that time to this. The President is sincere—yes; absolutely. Honest—yes; absolutely. Why did he do it? Because somebody went to him and told him that it ought to be done and that it was all right, and they presented facts and figures, and all that sort of thing, and convinced him that it ought to be undertaken. So, because he had supervisory power, he directed the Secretary of the Interior to take on the project, and he could not do anything but do it. As I say, it has been a failure ever since.

That is just what will happen in a case like this. The shipping board will say: "We do not want to purchase your ship," and all sorts of influences will be coming to the President, trying to show him why it ought to be purchased, and that he ought to direct the shipping board to do it, and they will get lots of them purchased just in that way. No, gentlemen; if you are going to have a shipping board you ought to have it, at least after it is appointed, absolutely free and independent of Executive dictation, and you ought not to expressly provide in the bill that the President shall have power over the matter. If you are going to have this done by a shipping board, have it done by a shipping board, and hold them responsible for it.

SEC. 4. That the shipping board is authorized to transfer the vessels purchased or constructed as herein provided to such corporation, and such corporation shall issue to the United States in payment thereof its gold bonds bearing interest at not less than 4 per cent per annum, and upon such further terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the shipping board, such bonds to constitute a first and paramount lien upon such vessels thus transferred and upon all the property of such corporation: Provided, That the amount of bonds received by the United States in payment for such vessels shall not be less, at the then par value, than the total amount expended by the United States in the purchase or construction of such vessels, and same may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion and with the approval of the President, to reimburse the Treasury for expenditures made in the purchase or construction of vessels. Such corporation shall make suitable provision for sinking fund and for the depreciation charges under the rules and regulations to be prescribed by such shipping board.

SEC. 5. That vessels purchased or constructed by such shipping board and conveyed to such corporation as herein provided shall be entitled to registry under the laws of the United States, and shall be deemed vessels of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels, except such vessels shall engage only in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands, the Hawaiian Islands, and the islands of Guam and Tutuila. Such vessels shall be subject to the navigation laws of the United States except as herein provided.

SEC. 6. That, subject to the direction of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce are hereby constituted a board to be known as the shipping board, with full power to vote the stock of the United States in such corporation and to do all other things necessary to protect the interests of the United States and to carry out the purposes of this act.

Mr. President, that section provides for a purely unadulterated political board, wholly partisan, changeable with every administration that comes along. That is the way the bill was introduced. That seemed to be your idea, in the first place, about it. You would not have changed that if it had not been for the discussion on this side. We talked about it; we pointed out the dangers of it, and in your caucus you changed it. I have not seen the latest edition. I have not been able to see that yet. You have not had it printed. I do not know whether, in your latest edition that you propose, you are going to change it or not, but my recollection is that you have five members of this board in one of your substitute bills, and you have two of them Cabinet officers, and you have provided for three others outside of the Cabinet places; but that does not at all change the partisan character of the board—not a bit. These three members, to be appointed by the President, will be partisans and under his control. I would just as soon have a Cabinet officer as a man from the outside appointed by the President, without regard to his politics. I do not know but that I would rather have a Cabinet officer than to have somebody from the outside. You would have a man who was certainly responsible in some ways, anyhow, if you had them all Cabinet officers; but you ought not to have a single Cabinet officer on this shipping board. You ought not to have the executive branches of the Government complicated with this great business industry that you are going to try to start up and carry on.

If you are going to have a shipping board, you ought to get a board of men who know that business, who know how to develop products by transportation lines, who know how to open up lines of supply for your ships in the different countries to which you are going to send the ships.

What about these Cabinet officers? What time have they to give to this business? What do they do? What will they do? They will have to have some subordinate to do it. That is what they will have to do. They will have to depend upon the recommendation almost entirely of some subordinate. The Secretary of the Treasury has all he can do as Secretary of the Treasury, without being on a shipping board looking after transportation matters.

How about the Postmaster General? Does he have anything to do? I know he had something to do when we were in the majority. I imagine he has something to do since you have been in the majority. I have been down to see him once or twice and have had to wait sometimes for hours to see him. Why? He was attending to the duties of his office, filling positions all over the country, looking after the policies of the Post-Office Department, trying to develop that great governmental function so that it will serve the best interests of the people. That is plenty to take up all his time and all his ability. If you are going to enter upon this great business undertaking, you had better get business men and let them give their time to it.

It is one trouble with our Government to-day that we are piling duties upon men who already have more duties than they can perform. What is the result? The result is that they are turning it over to somebody else who looks into it, and he decides what ought to be done and prepares a letter and puts it on his desk and he signs it and on it goes, and if you want to get in some crooked work you will get it in with that subordinate. That is where you will get it. Your Cabinet officer will act honestly in approving the matter.

Mr. President, we from the West have a good deal of business to do with the departments. I expect we have more to do than you from the South. I am going to give you another illustration which came under my own observation. I will not say when, because I do not think there was anything wrong, but it simply illustrates how things can be done and how things are done.

There was a certain railroad that had gotten a permit to go across an Indian reservation, and in that permit it was specified that it should have its road through the reservation by a certain time. There were some very prosperous farming communities depending upon it. Several farming communities had been developed in anticipation of the railroad coming through, and they had their crops in and expected to get them out by this railroad. The railroad apparently dillydallied along and did not build its road very fast, and it was not getting its road through. The people in that community heard that the railroad company was going to apply for an extension of time within which to complete its road across the reservation and they protested against it. They said, "This company has plenty of time to build its road, and we insist that its road ought to be built within that time. Do not grant this permit for an extension. Our crops will be lost if the railroad is not built through."

These protests came to our delegation and we saw the department officials. We saw the head of the department, and he saw the attorneys of the railroad, and finally they said: "Here, we want to put this road through just as fast as we can; we are doing the work just as rapidly as possible; we had trouble with help; the winter has been cold; we have been delayed in that way. If you will just agree to an extension of time, we will have our road built to a certain point by a certain time in the year, and by a certain other time we will have our road built past a certain other point."

Well, it looked reasonable to us, and we concluded that if we did not have the permit granted at all the people there would not get any railroad, and that they would be worse off if the railroad was not built than if an extension of time was granted on the assurance that the road would be built within a certain time.

So we had the matter up with the department, we talked it over with the department and we expressed our views about it. We said, "Now, these people will agree to get their road through by a certain time, and notwithstanding our people are protesting we will consent to this extension of time." It was assured in writing that the road would be built through; the department granted a permit setting out these very things, and the people accepted the result and things were going on.

We supposed the road would be put through in the time we were assured it would be done, and we paid no more attention to it. What happened? One day I got a letter from some of the people out there, and they said:

> This railroad company has not got its road through. We understand that they are getting another extension; we protest, because they have not complied with the permit; they are not treating us right.

I went up to the department, and what did I find? This is what I found: I spoke to the Assistant Secretary having the matter in charge. What did he say? "Why," he said, "I think there was a letter on my desk two or three weeks ago about that matter." Well, what did he do? He called for a man and brought him in and asked him about it. He said, "Yes; there was a letter about this." He brought the letter out, and what was it? It was a permit for a further extension of time granted simply because the agent of the railroad company had gone to the department and had satisfied some subordinate that they ought to have an extension of time, and without advising the people there, without advising the delegation here with whom they had conferred before and who had conceded to them more than the people wanted conceded, a letter was prepared, and it went to the Secretary or Assistant Secretary and he signed it in a routine sort of way, granting a permit without any hearing by the department.

There was not anything at all corrupt about it. The railroad agent simply went to a subordinate and showed him, on their side, that they ought to have an extension. He did not hear anybody on the other side, and prepared a letter and it went through in a routine sort of a way.

That is the way things are done in the departments. It is the way they have to be done; there is so much to do. The head of a department can not look into such things. That subordinate knew the protests were there. He knew our delegation had conferred about it before and that we had reluctantly agreed to the first extension. He ought to have called our attention to this request, but he did not do it. That is the way things will be done under this bill.

These Cabinet officers have more than they can do now. They will have to depend on their subordinates. Letters involving the rights and interests of the people of the country will come and pass over their desks in a routine way and be approved, and then it will be too late to get any injustice corrected.

> SEC. 7. That, with the approval of the Congress, such shipping board may at any time sell the stock of such corporation owned by the United States.

Now I will read the next section:

> SEC. 8. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to charter, lease, or transfer vessels purchased or constructed under the provisions of this act and such naval auxiliaries now belonging to the Naval Establishment of the United States as are suitable for commercial use and which are not required for use in the Navy in time of peace, and vessels now owned and operated by the Panama Railroad Co., to any corporation now or hereafter organized as in this act provided, or to any other corporation or corporations now or hereafter organized, upon such terms and conditions as the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall prescribe. The vessels purchased or constructed by the United States through the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall be of a type, as far as the commercial requirements of the foreign trade of the United States may permit, suitable for use as naval auxiliaries in the Naval Establishment of the United States.

Under section 8 the President may charter, lease, or transfer these vessels to this corporation or to any other corporation. That was to carry out the idea of the President, I suppose, that this should be a temporary proposition, and especially that they should get the Government out of this business as soon as possible.

I have heard of jokers in bills and it seemed to me that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in the discussion of this measure disclosed a joker here if there ever was one disclosed with reference to legislation. I do not mean that there was a joker here in the ordinary meaning that we give to that term. As I understand, we mean by a joker something that is slipped in to accomplish some particular purpose without letting the people know about it, and to accomplish some sort of sinister purpose. Here of course a lawyer reading this bill would at once see what it does. The ordinary man might not. Our friends in the Amen Corner might not notice exactly the effect of these provisions. They might think that this allowed the President to lease these vessels and the shipping board still to keep control, and that they could not dispose of this matter without the consent of Congress. Section 7 provides that with the approval of Congress the shipping board may sell the stock of such corporation, but you do not have to have the consent of Congress to lease those vessels or sell the vessel or charter the vessels. In other words, the President might lease all the vessels of this corporation for 99 years to some private corporation.

What would the stock amount to? What would the consent of Congress amount to for the disposal of this stock after all the vessels were disposed of, especially if disposed of for 99 years? The stock would not amount to anything. The consent of Congress would not amount to anything at all in reference to that. The Senator from Nebraska made that perfectly plain.

Now, what are our friends going to do over there? I do not know, but they are going to do something. They have brought in here this afternoon about 5 o'clock and they have offered as an amendment to the motion to recommit a direction to the committee to report some proposition with reference to the leasing. Now, I do not know what it is. We have not had an opportunity to see it. We have not had an opportunity to read it. We have not had an opportunity to study it.

Mr. President, I would not suggest that they are trying to slip anything in here. I would not suggest that they are trying to put anything "over on us," to use a common expression, but what did the President say some time ago in a speech at Indianapolis? I want to remind the Amen Corner of that. He said in reference to the trade commission bill that there is something in there that we Republicans had not gotten on to, and what did he say? "We took pains to get it in." I wonder if they have taken pains to get something in here that we did not know about.

Is it any wonder that we are rather suspicious about these things? Is it any wonder that we are anxious to look at these things that come out of a secret caucus, from behind closed doors, where you have been talking about things without representatives of the press present, where the Amen Corner could not get any information about it? Is it any wonder that we want to look at them closely and scan them carefully?

Why is it, Mr. President, that our friends on the other side were not willing to wait until morning before they began to press this new proposition that they present? Why is it that they would not let it be printed and let us take a recess until to-morrow? We did not ask to adjourn? We did not ask to start in on a new legislative day. We simply asked to take a recess, to do away with the morning hour, have no right for the people of the country to present petitions and to have bills introduced, but to take a recess until 11 o'clock in order that we might have an opportunity to examine this proposal.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question.

Mr. CLAPP. In view of the fact that the Senator's speech is laying bare to the public the methods employed here, would it not be well at this point to plainly point out in his speech the difference between recessing, cutting off all public business of the Government and of the people, and an adjournment, under which upon reassembling pursuant to adjournment the public business of the country can be taken up by the Senate?

Mr. JONES. I think so, although the Senator in his question has covered it pretty fully.

Mr. CLAPP. I have not made the question as full as I might, expecting the Senator to further elaborate upon it. I do not believe the public knows. Some way or other it is impossible to get these things to the public. It seems to me that the difference between recessing, shutting off all public business, and an adjournment, under which pursuant to adjournment we can take up the regular business of the Senate, ought to be made plain to the public.

Mr. JONES. I think the Senator is right, and I shall take up a little of the valuable time we have to do that, even though it may take more time than I had calculated on consuming.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator if he does not think that ought to be done when a quorum of the Senate is present?

Mr. JONES. Oh, no.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES. I do not yield, Mr. President, myself. Of course I think the Senator from Florida has a right to call for a quorum at any time he wants to do so, but I do not yield for it myself. I think he has a constitutional right, however, to call for a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Senator from Washington has the floor, but he states that he believes that the Senator from Florida has a constitutional right to call for a quorum. So the Secretary——

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from Washington also states that he does not yield.

Mr. JONES. I am not going to yield. I am not yielding myself, but I can not take away from the Senator from Florida his constitutional right. I do not think I am yielding for the purpose of calling a quorum.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Florida suggested the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has suggested the absence of a quorum. The Senator from Washington admits the point of order. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. JONES. I do not yield to anybody to make a point of order. The Senator from Florida can take whatever rights he has; but he can not take any of mine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington concedes that the Senator from Florida had a right to make the point of order.

Mr. JONES. I do; I concede that he had the right to do it; but he can not take any of my rights away. I concede that; but if the Chair should hold that he has not the right to make it, of course I want to be protected by the Chair, because I do not yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not attempting to take any of the rights of the Senator from Washington from him at all; but I do insist upon my right, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum of the Senate present. I do suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	James	Oliver	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Johnson	Overman	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Jones	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Catron	Kern	Page	Stone
Chamberlain	La Follette	Pittman	Sutherland
Chilton	Lane	Reed	Thomas
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	Thompson
Clark, Wyo.	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Thornton
Fletcher	Lewis	Sheppard	Walsh
Gore	Lippitt	Shields	Warren
Gronna	Martin, Va.	Shively	Weeks
Hollis	Martine, N. J.	Simmons	White
Hughes	Myers	Smith, Ariz.	Williams

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think I will digress from the question asked by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] for just a moment to congratualte the majority on coming back to the Constitution. I regard it as a hopeful sign. I do not know whether I have any right to arrogate to myself the thought that I have brought you back or not, and I will not do that, but I am glad that you are back. I want to say to the amen corner I am sorry you are having to come back, but I am glad you are coming back to the Constitution. I want to say to the amen-corner people of the country that some little time ago a ruling was made in this Chamber that no matter if there were only two or three Senators present and a Senator was speaking, no Senator could rise and call attention to the fact that there was no quorum present without taking the Senator off the floor or getting him to yield, and, if he did yield, he had ended his speech. I am glad that the Senator from Florida in charge of the bill has insisted to-night——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES. In just a moment.

Mr. REED. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES. I do not yield.

Mr. REED. I do not want anybody to yield to me when I am making a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state his point of order.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that the Senator is by his confession out of order, having yielded the floor——

Mr. JONES. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. Or having permitted himself to be taken off the floor.

Mr. JONES. No, no.

Mr. REED. And that therefore he is now out of order.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; Mr. President, the Senator was not here when the matter came up. The Chair understands that I did not yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is bound to state that the Senator from Washington did not lose the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is not a question of the construction which a Senator may put upon his act. The question is what was the act? If the act was of such a nature as to necessarily take him off his feet, no agreement or understanding he may have had with the Chair or with any other Senator can alter the case. So, while I was willing not to raise this question, since the Senator seemed to want to make it a cause of assault——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I insist on the floor now.

Mr. REED. I insist on my point of order.

Mr. JONES. The Senator can not take me off the floor by raising a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the right to suggest the point of order.

Mr. JONES. But he can not interrupt me according to his construction——

Mr. REED. I insist that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. JONES. I am not yielding to the Senator.

Mr. REED. The Senator has yielded the floor, whether it was voluntary or involuntary, and he has no right to proceed.

Mr. OLIVER. I rise to a point of order——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will allow the Chair to dispose of the matter now before him, then the Senator will be recognized. The point of order made by the Senator from Missouri, with all courtesy, is overruled.

Mr. REED. With all courtesy to the Chair, I respectfully appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. REED. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, what is the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not debatable.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What is the point of order? That is a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is, Has the Senator from Washington the floor? The Chair holds that he has, and there is an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And that appeal, Mr. President, I submit is debatable. An appeal to the body is debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair may be wrong about that and will be glad to be informed. [A pause.] The Chair finds he is in error. An appeal from a decision of the Chair is a debatable question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question for information, as I was out of the Chamber when this matter arose. My understanding is that the Senator from Washington declined to yield the floor, and that the Senator from Florida made the point of order that a quorum was not present. Of course, the making of a point of order would not take the Senator who had the floor from the floor. Am I correct as to what occurred? I ask the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is a correct statement.

Mr. JONES. That is a correct statement of what I heard. The RECORD will show that I did not yield the floor, but claimed my right to it. The Chair was perfectly right in his statement.

Mr. President, as the appeal is debatable, I will take the floor on that.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. JONES. Well, Mr. President, I am recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky will be recognized.

Mr. JAMES. I make the point of order that the appeal is not debatable except in so far as the Chair desires to hear argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that the point will not lie in this particular case. The question is on an appeal from the decision of the Chair, which is debatable.

Mr. JAMES. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is not debatable. The Senator from Kentucky moves to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRYAN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I ask that this announcement stand for the night. I vote "yea"; I believe I voted inadvertently "nay" when my name was called.

Mr. CHILTON. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], who is not present and therefore I can not vote, but I desire to be counted present to make a quorum.

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CLAPP (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I inquire whether he has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that that Senator has not voted.

Mr. CLAPP. I am paired with that Senator, but for the purpose of making a quorum I will transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and will allow my vote in the affirmative to stand.

The roll call resulted—yeas 25, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS—25.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the motion to lay on the table the yeas are 25, the nays are 2—not a quorum voting.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the presence of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms is directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

After a pause,

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask that the roll be called to disclose whether there is a quorum present.

Mr. JAMES. It has already been called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri request that the names of absentees be called?

Mr. REED. No; the roll of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, Rule V, paragraph 3, provides that—

> Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present—

And so on. This refers to a roll call made on the suggestion of the absence of a quorum. It does not apply to a roll call upon the yeas and nays. It is a roll call formally made to determine whether there is a quorum present on the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WEEKS, Mr. LIPPITT, and Mr. CLARK of Wyoming addressed the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And before an order is made to send for the absentees, I think that a call should be had to test the presence of a quorum on the suggestion of the lack of a quorum.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. A parliamentary inquiry. My parliamentary inquiry is whether the lack of a quorum can be determined and the result obtained by a yea-and-nay vote, or if it is not necessary to make the point of the absence of a quorum in order to determine that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The roll call disclosed the absence of a quorum, and the Senator from Florida moved—and the Senate agreed to the motion—that the absentees be requested to attend.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. A parliamentary inquiry. When, upon the yeas and nays being had, the result shows the lack of a quorum voting, has it not been the rule that the roll shall be called immediately?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair confesses very frankly and freely that he is not an expert parliamentarian, and is not wholly familiar with the rules. It is the present idea of the Chair that the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia is the correct procedure. He would be glad to hear from the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wyoming will pardon me, I should like to make a suggestion. When the roll is called to disclose whether there is or is not a quorum present, and it is disclosed that there is not a quorum present, the Sergeant at Arms is requested to request the absentees to appear; and as they appear they answer the roll, and thus a quorum is disclosed as soon as one arrives. Under the present condition, however, there is no means by which we can determine when we have a quorum. We can not call the names of these Senators on a vote the result of which has been already announced. We can not call their names as they come in.

It seems to me a short way out of this is the one that I am going to suggest now, by suggesting the absence of a quorum, which calls at once for a roll call. If that is done, we can determine whether we have a quorum or not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wyoming will yield to me for a suggestion on the question of order——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It has been the universal practice of the Senate ever since I have been here, for 10 years, that when the yeas and nays are taken and the vote on its face discloses the absence of a quorum, the Chair has so announced, and the Chair did so in this case. The Chair announced to the Senate that no quorum had voted, whereupon the Senator from Florida rose and had the Senate pass an order, directing the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators. The Sergeant at Arms, if he is doing his duty, is now executing that order of the Senate.

I am aware of the theory which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] propounded the other evening, that as the Senators are produced in the Chamber in response to such an order of the Senate they should be compelled to vote upon the question which has been voted upon, if I understood him correctly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And the Chair had no authority, in the opinion of the Senator from Georgia, to announce that no quorum had voted, if I understood him correctly. I did not consent to that theory.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I never made that contention. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I am mistaken, I would rather withdraw the statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I never made that statement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is as I understood the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But, at any rate, there is nothing to do at present except to reconsider the order made at the request of the Senator from Florida, directing the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators or to wait for its execution; and as Senators enter the Chamber I assume that the Chair, if the Sergeant at Arms produces them, could recognize them, and they could vote upon the question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the vote has been announced. The result has been determined.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But no quorum was disclosed.

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Hence it is not a legal vote.

Mr. REED. And the vote can not be held open indefinitely for Senators to appear. At least, even if it could be, the result has been announced. Now, as I understand, any Senator has the right at any time to suggest the absence of a quorum; and in order that this matter may be cleared up, I now suggest the absence of a quorum. If a quorum is disclosed, well and good. If it is not disclosed, then the order to the Sergeant at Arms will continue in effect until he brings in a quorum.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the view I desire to present goes further than the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri. I do not think the Senate has authority, with only a minority present, to direct the Sergeant at Arms to take steps to compel the presence of Senators until after the formal call has been made for a quorum on the suggestion of the lack of a quorum. This power of the minority comes from the Constitution. It provides that a minority can compel the presence of a quorum under such rules as may have been provided. Now, we have a rule. It is found in Rule V, and Rule V authorizes the minority to act only after the lack of a quorum has been suggested and a call of the Senate has been made to determine whether there is or is not a quorum present. It does not permit such action by the Senate until after this call is had. I am pressing this view now because I think the Sergeant at Arms, to enforce the order of the minority, must do it under this rule, following a call for a quorum under the suggestion of the lack of a quorum.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, when the Chair itself declared that no quorum had voted, it was then, I think, under the practice of the Chair, the duty of the Chair to have the roll called to see whether a quorum was developed or not. That is the universal custom here. The Presiding Officer says there is no quorum voting, and he has the roll called to see if a quorum is present.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee and Mr. GORE. Call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Gore	Owen	Sutherland
Bryan	Gronna	Page	Thomas
Catron	James	Pomerene	Thompson
Chamberlain	Jones	Reed	Thornton
Chilton	La Follette	Shafroth	Warren
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Weeks
Clark, Wyo.	Lippitt	Shields	White
Fall	Oliver	Smith, Ga.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-five Senators only having answered to their names, a quorum is not present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has the floor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask that the absentees be called.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. OLIVER. Is it not a rule of the Senate that the absentees shall be called when the call does not disclose a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair knows of no such rule.

Mr. OLIVER. It is the custom. There are Senators on this floor who did not answer.

Mr. LIPPITT. I think the Senator from Utah was recognized by the Chair and asked that the absentees should be called; and it seems to me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has moved——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] recorded as present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is not recorded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is in his seat. I ask that his name be called and that the names of the absentees be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has made a motion, which is that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absentees.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I answer "Present."

Mr. OWEN. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. If it is in order, I should like to move that a committee be appointed to inform the President that the Senate has been in session since the 7th of December and that owing to the character of its rules it is unable to do business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is not in order at this time under the rule. The Sergeant at Arms will proceed to carry out the order of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH, Mr. VARDAMAN, and Mr. BURTON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

After a delay of 15 minutes,

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to compel the attendance of Senators.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I make a point of order against that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will state his point of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is that the motion is out of order, and if the Chair will permit me I will state why.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly; the Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Rule V provides that—

If, at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Presiding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result, and these proceedings shall be without debate.

Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant at Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no debate nor motion, except to adjourn, shall be in order.

Mr. President, it has, so far as I am informed, been uniformly held that under that rule there must first be a motion to request the attendance of absent Senators, and the Senators must be requested, because it would be an idle ceremony to adopt a motion to request the attendance of absent Senators and then immediately, before the request had been made upon the absent Senators, to proceed to adopt a motion to compel their attendance. So I make the point of order that it is not in order to proceed to compel the attendance of absent Senators until the absent Senators have been requested to attend, and no showing of that kind has thus far been made.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire whether or not the Sergeant at Arms has made his report on that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read for the information of the Senate the report from the Sergeant at Arms.

The Secretary read as follows:

SERGEANT AT ARMS,
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 8, 1915.

To the PRESIDING OFFICER,
United States Senate.

SIR: In compliance with Senate motion that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Members, I herewith report that I am telephoning the same to the residence addresses of the absentees as rapidly as possible.

Respectfully,
CHARLES P. HIGGINS,
Sergeant at Arms United States Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But, Mr. President, that is not a showing that the request has yet been made. It is a showing that it is in process of being made.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, there is a quorum of the Senate now in the Capitol, and if the Sergeant at Arms does his duty he can produce a quorum within 10 minutes.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. As I understand, the point of order has been made that Senators have not been requested to attend. To my personal knowledge Senators have been requested and have declined to present themselves in the Chamber. Therefore it seems to me that unless the Senator is in a position to dispute that fact his point is not well taken.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, Mr. President, since the return of the Sergeant at Arms is simply to the effect that he is in process of making the request he has not reported to the Senate——

Mr. HUGHES. To my knowledge the Sergeant at Arms has notified Members of the Senate to appear in the Chamber, and they have not appeared. Therefore it seems to me that the necessary step is the step that is now proposed to be taken, that the absent Senators be compelled to attend.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I submit the point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear from the Senator from Georgia who rose to address the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have heard this request made a number of times in the Senate, and I have never known the Senate to delay action until every Senator could be telephoned or until every Senator could be requested to be present. That has not been the procedure for the past three years; but immediately following an effort at requesting Senators to attend, the direction has been given to compel their attendance. Indeed, I do not think the request is necessary. The rule does not say that it shall precede the order to compel. Whenever the Senate deems it necessary to direct the Sergeant at Arms to compel the presence of absent Senators, we are not compelled to wait to see whether or not they respond to the request. We can act at once. The rules does not really require the request at all. The rule provides:

3. Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant at Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate.

The rule does not say that the Senate must wait to see whether or not Senators come when requested. At any time the Senate deems it proper and deems it necessary, it can instruct the Sergeant at Arms to compel the presence of Senators.

Mr. President, the same rule provides that—

No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave.

No Senator has a right to be away from this Chamber without leave when the Senate is in session.

Mr. OWEN. And he violates the rule when he does so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He violates the rule when he absents himself without leave. I submit that we are in a position where we are justified, on account of the necessities of the case, to compel the presence of absent Senators.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia forgets that we are acting under an extraordinary power of the Constitution. The Constitution provides:

And a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide.

Under that provision of the Constitution the powers to be exercised by less than a quorum must be exercised strictly under the terms of the Constitution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Under the terms of the rule, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In pursuance of that——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We must follow the rule. I grant that; I did not forget that at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I understood I had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah is suggesting his point of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In pursuance of that provision of the Constitution we have made a rule, and that rule requires:

A majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant at Arms to request and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators.

Obviously the request must precede the action of the Senate to compel the attendance of Senators, but it can not be made to appear that it is necessary to compel their attendance until it has been made to appear that the request has been ineffectual. That has been the ruling of the Senate. Authorities were quoted here the other day; I do not know whether the Senator from Georgia was present, but I called attention to one or two of them myself——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In a moment. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] called attention to some of those authorities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I said I would yield in a moment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah declines to yield. Will the Senator pardon the Chair for stating that the Chair is ready to rule, but is always glad to hear the distinguished Senator from Utah?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Chair desires to rule and does not desire to hear anything further, very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was simply proceeding to state that the authorities were produced and read into the RECORD, and I think that nothing to the contrary can be found, that there must be a request made upon the absent Senators to put in an appearance, and that it is only when that request has been shown to be ineffectual that a number of the Senate less than a quorum may resort to the more drastic remedy of compelling the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may be permitted to suggest, apropos of what the Senator from Utah has just said, the roll call has disclosed the fact that there is not a quorum present. It appears from statements made on the floor of the Senate by Senators that the request has been presented to certain Senators, and they are not in the Chamber. There could be no stronger evidence that that request to date is ineffectual. If it were effectual, a quorum would be here. A quorum is not here; and, therefore, the request has been ineffectual, and for that reason, it seems to me, that all of the preliminary steps have been taken to justify the arrest of absent Members.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him to name the Senators who have been requested to attend?

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] stated a moment ago that to his personal knowledge the request had been made of some certain Senators.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Were they named?

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from New Jersey did not name them; no.

Mr. FLETCHER. The roll call will establish that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I submit that if it appears that any particular Senator has been requested to attend and has not obeyed that request that Senator should be named and a warrant should be issued for him.

Mr. POMERENE. I submit the fact that more than a quorum of Senators are not in the Chamber, and the further fact that it appears from the statement of a Senator that certain Senators have been requested, without naming them, to be present, and it is physically apparent that they are not present, and that we are justified in concluding that more drastic measures are necessary to effectuate their presence.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming and Mr. OLIVER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule, but does not wish to foreclose Senators, and will hear them.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio a question, with his permission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wyoming for a question?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Is it not also true that the best evidence as to whether or not an officer has performed a duty required of him is the return of that officer in some way?

Mr. POMERENE. That is evidence, and it may be evidence of the highest order, but I do not understand that this body regards its rules as so sacred that it is always obliged to have the best evidence. It may be that it is necessary to have the best evidence to persuade certain Senators that the rule has been complied with, but in our innermost hearts we know, and the public knows, that there is not any intention on the part of these Senators to be here unless they are compelled to come.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. There is a certain amount of respect which is due from those who are here to those who are absent, and there is a certain other amount of respect which is due to those who are here by those who are absent.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In that connection, I was just going to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that, so far as my observation has gone, the only Senator who has complied thus far with the request of the Sergeant at Arms has been the Senator's colleague [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah, when he says that under the rule a Senator shall be requested before he can be compelled to attend, if he means that there must actually be a request made to him? Suppose a Senator can not be found, and suppose the Sergeant at Arms should adopt every reasonable means of conveying to him the order of the Senate, and still he could not be found and there is still the absence of a quorum, shall the Senate still sit idly and helplessly by without authority under the Constitution of the United States to issue its process to compel the attendance of absent Senators who may be in hiding and can not be found?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator asks me that question, as I understand?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator a question in return before I answer the question which he propounds. How could the Sergeant at Arms find the Senators to arrest them if he could not find them to request their attendance?

Mr. STONE. That is, of course, another matter. The Sergeant at Arms might take his warrant and search for them; he might search a day for them; he might search a week for them before we could get a quorum here; but are we to wait all that week until he finds them to notify them before we can issue process to compel their attendance? Now, what does the Senator say to that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say "yes" to that, because the rule is—I have already read it—that—

> A majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant at Arms to request.

Now, obviously, a motion adopted in the Senate is not a request by the Sergeant at Arms. The rule is that the Senators present, less than a quorum, may direct that the Sergeant at Arms request——

Mr. STONE. Oh, Mr. President, that interpretation would absolutely nullify the Constitution of the United States.

Mr SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator is in error about that. The Constitution says in plain and explicit terms that less than a quorum may be authorized to do this thing. Now, that must be done, of course, by a rule or by a statute. In the case of the Senate, which makes its own rules independent of the other House, it would be by a rule of the Senate. The Constitution is not self-executing. If the Senate had made no rule upon the subject at all, then even the Senate would be powerless.

Mr. STONE. Well, who is to judge when it is necessary to compel their attendance?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The rule establishes.

Mr. STONE. The rule speaks out, does it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; the rule says that the request shall be made by the Sergeant at Arms, or, rather, that "a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant at Arms to request" their attendance; and when that request is ineffectual, then they may be compelled to attend.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, the rule does not say that less than a majority may direct the Sergeant at Arms to request and after that to compel. The rule says that less than a majority "may direct the Sergeant at Arms to request and, when necessary, to compel." It does not say "after that." The Senate has never ruled that you could not compel until after you had requested.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I make the point of order that debate is out of order, and I call for the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not understand the observation of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule, but does not wish arbitrarily to shut off Senators who think that they can contribute something to the discussion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; if the Chair is ready to rule, I do not care to argue the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 5 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States reads as follows:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide.

Thus, the Constitution very plainly confers upon the Senate the power to make its own rules regarding the procuring of the attendance of its Members, and it will be observed that the minority is even given the power to compel the attendance of absent Members. Rule V of the Rules of the Senate contains three clause. These clauses are in pari materia, and should be read together. They are as follows:

> RULE V.
> QUORUM—ABSENT SENATORS MAY BE SENT FOR.
> 1. No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave. (Jefferson's Manual, sec. 8.)
> 2. If, at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Presiding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result, and these proceedings shall be without debate. (Jefferson's Manual, sec. 7.)
> 3. Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant at Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no debate nor motion, except to adjourn, shall be in order. (Jefferson's Manual, secs. 7, 8.)

The Chair is of opinion that it is within the discretion of the Senate to say when such a contingency arises as makes it necessary to compel the attendance of absent Members, and that a minority may take that action.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, I move the adoption of the following order:

> Ordered, That the Sergeant at Arms be directed to use all necessary means to compel the attendance of absent Senators, except those detained on account of sickness.

I add that clause because I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] are unwell.

Mr. OVERMAN. And the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. ROBINSON. And also the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to except the Senators who, I understand, are not well.

Mr. OVERMAN. They will all get off on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read an additional or supplementary report that has been laid before the Senate by the Sergeant at Arms.

The Secretary read as follows:

> FEBRUARY 9, 1915.
> To the PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE.
> SIR: In obedience to the order of the Senate ordering the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators, I have the following report to make:
> Senator BANKHEAD, no response.
> Senator BORAH, no response.
> Senator BRADY, not at home.
> Senator BURLEIGH, will come.
> Senator BRISTOW, notified and talked with Senator WEEKS.
> Senator CAMDEN, not in.
> Senator CLARKE of Arkansas, not in.
> Senator COLT, no response.
> Senator CUMMINS, will come if sent for.
> Senator DILLINGHAM, not in.
> Senator HOLLIS, here.
> Senator KENYON, not in.
> Senator LEWIS, no response.
> Senator LODGE, no reply.
> Senator MCCUMBER, will come if sent for.
> Senator SMITH of Michigan, coming.
> Senator SMOOT, coming.
> Senator STERLING, will come if sent for.
> Senator SWANSON, sick.
> Senator TOWNSEND, sick.
> This is as far as we have gotten with the call.
> Respectfully, yours,
> CHARLES P. HIGGINS,
> Sergeant at Arms, United States Senate.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I have listened to the very full return of the Sergeant at Arms, but I fail to notice there anything with regard to Senators who are at present in the Capitol. An hour ago there was——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senator is out of order.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not wonder that the Senator does not want to hear the truth to-night.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not want the Senator to speak when he has not a right to speak.

Mr. OLIVER. I have spoken, and it is going in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For what purpose does the Senator from Iowa rise?

Mr. KENYON. I rose to answer to my name, if I could.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the Senator's name.

Mr. KENYON. I was at my office to-night, and I was not notified.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. KENYON, and he answered "Present."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion submitted by the Senator from Georgia to direct the Sergeant at Arms to compel the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Am I recorded, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the Senator's name.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. WILLIAMS, and he answered "Present."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to inquire whether or not the Sergeant at Arms has invited those Senators to attend the session of the Senate who are at present in the room of the President of the United States—I think Mr. LEA of Tennessee and some others?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is hardly a parliamentary inquiry; but the Chair will cause that investigation to be made.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, is that a parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I offer the supplementary order, which I send to the desk and ask its adoption.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I wish to answer to my name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the Senator's name.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. HOLLIS, and he answered "Present."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. SAULSBURY entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida proposes an order, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Whereas under the rules of the Senate a call of the Senate was ordered; and

Whereas the following-named Senators are absent without leave of the Senate, to wit: Messrs. BANKHEAD, BORAH, BRADY, BRISTOW, CAMDEN, CRAWFORD, COLT, DILLINGHAM, DU PONT, FALL, GALLINGER, HARDWICK, HITCHCOCK, MCCUMBER, MCLEAN, O'GORMAN, ROOT, STERLING, and WORKS; and

Whereas it is necessary to compel the attendance of said absent Senators: Therefore it is

Ordered, That the Sergeant at Arms be, and hereby is, directed to compel the attendance on the Senate of said named absent Senators; and it is further Ordered, That warrants for the arrest of said Senators be issued under the signature of the Presiding Officer, attested by the Secretary; and that the Sergeant at Arms be, and hereby is, directed to execute such warrants forthwith by arresting each of said named Senators and bringing them, and each of them, before the bar of the Senate, and that he make due return to the Senate of the execution of said warrants, and that this order shall be continuing until fully executed, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate.

During the reading of the order,

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HUGHES and others. Regular order!

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of privilege. I have been directed to attend upon the session of the Senate, and I am here, and I desire to answer to my name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will wait until the proposed order has been read; then he will be recognized at once.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the proposed order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to say that I am here, ready to answer to my name. I do not care to be arrested again.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming has the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to have my name called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the Senator's name.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. CUMMINS, and he answered "Here."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to raise a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It relates to the proposition just submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. The Sergeant at Arms already has an order from the Senate for the arrest of absent Senators. Until that order is executed no other business can come before the Senate, and this is other business.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. This is not other business; it is simply formal authority and direction to the Sergeant at Arms. It is not an additional power or authority.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. FLETCHER. It supplements and directs specifically what he is to do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I call the Senator from Florida to order, Mr. President.

Mr. GORE and others. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senators will please suspend.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the name of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] be omitted from the list, of course.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order made by the Senator from Wyoming is very respectfully overruled.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at this time. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. OLIVER. I make the point of order that an order to compel the attendance of absent Senators can only be made by less than a quorum——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. OLIVER (continuing). And that a quorum now being present the order can not be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. JAMES. It has always been overruled, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to inquire if the list that was read contained the names of all the Senators who had not then answered to the roll call.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JAMES. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HUGHES. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. JAMES. The record speaks for itself, and the Senator can look at the record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. What did I understand the Chair to hold?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order made by the Senator from Kentucky is sustained.

Mr. LIPPITT. That it was not proper for me to ask if the list of names was a complete list?

Mr. JAMES. Why, certainly, Mr. President.

Mr. HUGHES. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senators will permit the Chair to put the question.

Mr. LIPPITT. May I say one thing to the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. Regular order!

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Rhode Island to state a point of order. He has that right.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, that is just the point I want to bring up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. HUGHES. The point of order is that the Senator from Rhode Island did not ask permission to make a parliamentary inquiry or to state a point of order. He asked to "say one thing" to the Presiding Officer. With all due respect to the Presiding Officer, he has no right at this stage to submit to anything except a parliamentary inquiry or a point of order.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish to make a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. LIPPITT. It was in explanation of the parliamentary inquiry which I made.

Mr. HUGHES. It has already been overruled.

Mr. LIPPITT. You will find, Mr. President, that when a point of order is made the Chair has a right to inquire for his own information from a Senator the reason for his making the point. If I may say so with all courtesy, the Chairman has done it himself during the evening once or twice, and it has been done by other occupants of the chair over and over again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator making a point of order?

Mr. LIPPITT. I am. I am making a parliamentary inquiry, on which I ask the privilege of giving the Chair some information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unable to give the information. The question now before the Senate is——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair state the question.

Mr. LIPPITT. I am not asking the Presiding Officer to give me information. I am asking that I may be allowed to give it to him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is obliged to put the question, which is as follows——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have just entered the Chamber——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Chair if a roll call is in progress at the present time. If so, I should like to answer "present" to that roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at this time. A quorum has been disclosed.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I desire the RECORD to disclose that I am present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be recorded.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply desire to state that I was notified a few minutes ago by the Sergeant at Arms that a quorum was desired, and I wish to report that I am in the Chamber.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the motion to lay the appeal on the table be sustained? That motion is not debatable.

Mr. LIPPITT. I rise to make a motion.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is——

Mr. LIPPITT. I want to amend the order as proposed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that you can not amend a motion to lay on the table, nor can you discuss it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the appeal be laid on the table? [Putting the question.] By the sound——

Mr. OLIVER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on that, Mr. President.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. LIPPITT. The yeas and nays have been ordered on that question.

Mr. REED. What is the appeal?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the appeal be laid upon the table? The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. REED. What is the motion?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not a sufficient number seconded the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think they have been ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to know just what the question is that is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on laying upon the table an appeal taken from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LIPPITT. It is that a roll call can not be interrupted for any such purpose. A roll call is now proceeding.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I had not exhausted my inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the calling of the roll.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. He has not voted, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (after having voted in the affirmative). I did not announce my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I believe, from what I can understand, that he would vote as I vote, and I will therefore allow my vote to stand.

Mr. OVERMAN. In order to make a quorum, as I am satisfied the Senator from California if present would vote as I do, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I asked for a vote on the order that I offered some time ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is true, but the announcement has not been made of the previous vote. That will be in order just as soon as the announcement shall be made.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Can not the announcement be hurried up?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to have it announced how many Senators have voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just as soon as the Chair receives that information the result will be announced to the Senate. In order to make a quorum, the Chair will vote. The Chair votes "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 47, nays 2, as follows:

So the appeal from the decision of the Chair was laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to move an amendment to that motion.

Mr. JAMES. I make the point of order that an amendment is not in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator on reflection will not make such a point of order as that any motion of this character is not amendable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not undertaking to debate it. I am undertaking to amend it. I was going to suggest this amendment if permitted to do so.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington will state it.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask whether or not this proceeding will take me from the floor. I had the floor when an appeal was taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order that the inquiry is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order made by the Senator from Mississippi is sustained. The Secretary will read the order submitted by the Senator from Florida.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Whereas under the rules of the Senate a call of the Senate was ordered; and

Whereas the following-named Senators are absent without leave of the Senate, to wit: Messrs. BANKHEAD, BORAH, BRADY, BRISTOW, CAMDEN, CRAWFORD, COLT, DILLINGHAM, DU PONT, FALL, GALLINGER, HARDWICK, HITCHCOCK, MCCUMBER, MCLEAN, O'GORMAN, ROOT, STERLING, and WORKS; and

Whereas it is necesary to compel the attendance of said absent Senators: Therefore it is

Ordered, That the Sergeant at Arms be, and hereby is, directed to compel the attendance on the Senate of said named absent Senators; and it is further

Ordered, That warrants for the arrest of said Senators be issued under the signature of the Presiding Officer, attested by the Secretary, and that the Sergeant at Arms be, and hereby is, directed to execute such warrants forthwith by arresting each of said named Senators and bringing them, and each of them, before the bar of the Senate, and that he make due return to the Senate of the execution of said warrants, and that this order shall be continuing until fully executed, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I offer the following amendment, to add to the names given in the list the names of the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE]——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, I am here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] is here and answered to his name.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me state my amendment before any exposure.

Mr. JAMES. Everyone mentioned by the Senator is in the Chamber and has answered to his name.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They had not answered when I rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is out of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (reading). The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]——

Mr. JAMES. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Has he just arrived? I am glad he is here. And the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is detained at home by illness, and has been so reported by the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am not debating any proposition, but I wish to state to the Senator from Utah I can not understand how, in the name of Heaven——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey will pardon the Chair. He did not receive recognition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Utah on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. OLIVER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to ask to have stricken from the list the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who has appeared in the Chamber, and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who is not well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the amendment of the Senator from Utah be laid on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). Transfering my pair as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], and withhold my vote unless it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I make the same transfer as before, and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], which I transfer to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and vote "yea."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia (when Mr. SWANSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SWANSON] is detained at home by sickness. He is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], who is absent, and therefore I withhold my vote. I desire to be counted as present for the purpose of a quorum.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 37, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—37.

Ashurst	Kern	Reed	Stone
Bryan	Lea, Tenn.	Robinson	Thompson

So Mr. SUTHERLAND's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I make a point of order——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I do not yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not asking the Senator to yield. I am making a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My point of order is that a quorum being present, this motion is not in order, inasmuch as Senators can not be arrested except when a quorum is not present. I call the attention of the Chair to the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to read the rule.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let me make this statement. I do not care to debate it or consider it. I am not admitting the ground of the point of order, but I ask leave to withdraw the motion or order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is quite satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida withdraws the proposed order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES. No; I do not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington will proceed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am sorry that I have lost so much valuable time. I might have been through if this interruption had not occurred. I was calling attention to the fact that the majority under the ruling of the fair and honorable Chairman has gotten back once more to the Constitution of the United States. I am certainly glad of it, and I want to call attention to the fact upon which I base this statement, so that the amen corners may fully understand it; not only the amen corner of Tacoma, but the various amen corners throughout the country.

Some time ago a ruling was made by the Chair that, even though there were only two or three Senators present in the Chamber, a Senator could not rise and interrupt a Senator who was speaking to raise the point of no quorum without the consent of the Senator speaking and without taking him from the floor. This ruling was sustained by the majority of the Senate. It seemed to me at the time perfectly clear that under the Constitution of the United States and under the rules of this body the point of the presence of a quorum can be made at any time except when the Senate is dividing, and that such ruling was not only unconstitutional and deprived a Senator of his rights on this floor, but also that it is in plain violation of the rules of the Senate.

I am glad that the Senator from Florida insisted upon what I think is his constitutional right to make the point of no quorum without asking permission to interrupt a Senator, and that the honorable Senator in the chair, with his usual fairness and with the justice that I expected from him, upheld the right of the Senator from Florida to make such a point of order without depriving me of my right to the floor.

Now, Mr. President, I certainly hope that this right will not be abused. I would not feel disposed to make the point of order simply to obstruct the business of the Senate. I believe that it would not be proper to do that.

So I feel satisfied that this rule which we have followed for a long time, that has been followed because it was recognized that this was one of the rights under the Constitution of a Senator, will not be used improperly.

Now, I want to call the Amen Corner's attention also to another fact, a ruling of our friends on the other side. They have held that even if a Senator has the right to interrupt another Senator without his consent and without taking him from the floor to raise the point of no quorum, that that point can not be raised if nothing has intervened between that time and the last roll call except debate, no matter how extensive the debate may be.

Mr. President, it seems to me that that rule is one without any foundation in justice. It seems to be based upon a precedent that was made several years ago. A Senator had the floor and was speaking against a bill, had raised the point of no quorum, and a roll call had been had. A quorum was disclosed, and then, after just a word or two of debate probably, not any hardly at all, he again raised the point of no quorum, and it was held in that case that business had not intervened. It seems to me that a case like that is not applicable where legitimate and reasonable extensive debate has intervened.

It seems to me that debate upon the merits of a bill is business; that it is the real business of the Senate; and to hold that that is not business, but that the presentation of a petition or the mere recording of the vote, the recording of the verdict that we have reached after discussion is business, is illogical and unreasonable. I think the discussion of these various measures is the more important of the business in the consideration of a measure. The mere recording of the vote, the mere recording of the verdict of this body, which it has reached after discussion, after consideration, is less important than the discussion of the measure iself.

As I said, I regret very much this interruption. I do not understand why it occurred; I do not understand why the majority consumed all this valuable time here for nearly an hour and a half that I thought I was using, with some consideration for them, at least. I do not understand why they used that, unless it was in accordance with their filibuster that they have been conducting here for over a week with reference to this measure, while they have indicated this afternoon that they wanted to proceed to a vote on this bill. They either have gotten into such a habit of filibustering that they can not stop it all at once or they have not yet finished their filibustering; but they certainly unnecessarily consumed about an hour and a half of the time of the Senate, which I think, under the circumstances, is very valuable.

I notice another fact that I want to call the attention of the Amen Corners of the country to, and that is this: The majority here have been trying to get a quorum for some little time; having called the roll, they found that there were certain absentees, and they issued an order directing the attendance of those absentees. Then a subsequent order was issued naming certain Senators whom the roll call showed to be absent. I want to call the attention of the amen corner to the fact that that list omitted the names of certain Senators who did not answer the roll call, who have not answered it to-night, who are absent, and yet they were left out of this proposed list. Why? I do not know. When the amendment was offered to insert the names of those Senators the majority voted to lay the amendment on the table. Why they want to show such favoritism I do not know. I do not object. The only ones who have a right to object are those whose names were omitted. It puts them in a rather embarrassing position. Some of them voted against taking a recess at 6 o'clock, and they have not been here to-night. They have not been put on the list to be arrested and brought here, and I leave it to the amen corner to surmise as to why this favoritism is shown by the majority.

Mr. President, just before the point of no quorum was made I was starting, at the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], to explain the difference between a recess and an adjournment of the Senate, and I think I shall proceed to do that in the best way that I can, so that the amen corners throughout the country can fully understand just exactly what effect a recess has upon the business of the Senate and what effect an adjournment has upon the business of the Senate.

Mr. President, we refused to take a recess this evening. A motion was made to take a recess until 11 o'clock. What would have been the effect of that motion if it had carried? The effect would simply have been to have continued this legislative day, which is also the legislative day of, I think, last Friday, February 5. If we had taken a recess this evening to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, that would have still been the legislative day of the 5th of February. No petitions could have been presented except by putting them in the basket or handing them to the Secretary; no bills could have been introduced, except those of a private nature, which could have been introduced here simply by handing them to the Secretary; no petitions could have been presented by a Senator on the floor of the Senate except by unanimous consent; no bill could be reported; no committee could submit a report; nothing could be done except to proceed with the consideration of the bill which is now under consideration; in other words, the effect of a recess from one day to the next day is to cut off all business except that which was the unfinished business at the time the recess was taken.

If we had adjourned last evening—had taken just an ordinary adjournment—we would have then met at 12 o'clock to-day. We would have commenced a new legislative day. Every Senator who had not spoken on this bill, or on some proposition connected with it, could have spoken twice on the bill and on any distinct proposition connected with it. Petitions could be presented; we would have had what we call the morning hour, which might run until 2 o'clock; bills could be introduced, petitions presented, reports of committees made, and resolutions coming over from the preceding day could have been taken up and considered; and we might have proceeded to the consideration of the calendar, and have taken up bills on the calendar, unless, after the close of the morning business, or at the close of the morning hour, the Senator in charge of the unfinished business might have moved to take it up and proceed with its consideration, or any Senator could move to proceed to the consideration of any other bill. At 2 o'clock the unfinished business would come before the Senate.

By taking the recess, then, from day to day, we cut off all this intervening business—the right of petition, the right of presenting bills, and so forth, continue the legislative day, and continue the unfinished business on that calendar day.

Mr. President, I was considering the bill as first introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I had read section 7 and section 8 of the bill and had called attention to the point brought out very clearly by the Senator from Nebraska with reference to those provisions. Now I desire to read section 9 of the bill:

SEC. 9. That the President of the United States shall at any time have the right, upon giving written notice of his intention to the corporation using the vessels under the provisions of this act, to take possession for use as naval auxiliaries in the United States Navy, or for other purposes, of any vessels used by such corporation at a reasonable price or rental.

That, of course, Mr. President, is a very wise provision in the measure. It might occur to those who have not given the entire bill very much consideration that the right to pass this bill may be founded upon the right of the Government to provide naval auxiliaries. This point has been referred to quite a number of times in the discussion; but it is not amiss to say that that is not the primary and the fundamental purpose of the bill. The primary and fundamental purpose of the bill is disclosed in the first section of the bill, and is shown clearly to be to enable the United States, through a corporation, to buy merchant ships and operate them in the carrying trade of the country.

I have seen it stated from very high authority that these ships can not be constructed so as to be suitable for mercantile purposes and also suitable for naval auxiliaries. I am not an expert; I do not know very much about that; but it seems to me that it would be a very doubtful thing to do; and that these vessels would not be very suitable for mercantile purposes if they were properly built for use as naval auxiliaries. I suppose, however, they could be so constructed as to be changed and made available in a reasonable way for that purpose, so that I see no serious objection to that feature of the bill.

SEC. 10. That a detailed statement of all expenditures under this act and of all receipts hereunder shall be submitted to Congress at the beginning of each regular session.

Mr. President, why is that required if these are not vessels of the United States, if this is not really the operation of merchant ships by the United States itself?

Then section 11 provides:

SEC. 11. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000.

Now, I simply want to say, with reference to that section, that I remember the time during the last 16 years when if a bill were to originate in the Senate providing directly for an appropriation of money when it went over to the House of Representatives, it would not be considered there at all, but the House would report its own measure and send it over to this body, insisting that it alone had the right to originate appropriation bills. I am not going to argue that proposition here. I suppose that no question of that kind would be raised at this time, although I think ordinarily another body, the action of which we probably may not refer to in a parliamentary way, would not permit the passage of a measure appropriating $10,000,000 directly, as this measure does, and originating in the Senate, as it does.

SEC. 12. That this act shall take effect from its passage.

Mr. President, that bill was introduced on the 9th day of December. Everybody recognizes that it is a very important measure; everybody recognizes that it involves many important questions upon which there is a great difference of opinion in the country, and questions as to the effect of which upon our country and its industries there is a great difference of opinion. It is usual and customary in cases of this kind for the House or the Senate to have hearings upon these important measures, to give the people of the country who are interested in them an opportunity to be heard, to present their views, and to point out the good effects and the ill effects that are likely to come from the legislation. We generally assume that men who are familiar with certain lines of business, with the methods of conducting certain lines of business, are better able to tell what should be done and what the effect of legislation will be along certain lines than anybody else. I know that it seems as though the Congress acts sometimes upon the theory that those who know the most about certain lines of business are the ones who should be consulted the least with reference to legislation along those lines; that those who know the most about certain propositions are the least able to advise Congress as to what ought to be done and what ought not to be done.

In this case I understand—I do not know, but I am pretty reliably informed—that requests were made for hearings before the committee, at least that certain members of the committee asked that hearings might be had, and that those requests were refused. I am not a member of the committee, and therefore I can not say whether that is true or not; but the fact appears from the records that while this bill was introduced on December 9 it was reported back by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] on December 16, 1914, or just seven days from the time it was introduced, and that, as a matter of fact, there were no hearings upon it. The committee did not listen to anybody who knew anything about shipping; it did not listen to anybody who knew anything about the merchant marine industry; it did not listen to anybody who knew anything about the possible lines of industrial development that might be followed by any ships they might purchase; they did not call anybody before the committee to find out anything about what vessels could be bought or secured if the act were passed. They did not find out anything about what it would cost to build a vessel, and, strange to say, when the matter was up for discussion on the floor and the Senator from Florida was asked what it would cost to build a vessel, he did not know, but had to refer to a statement of some Senator on this side, who said he understood that vessels could be built for about $50 a ton. So they knew nothing about the business they are going into; they knew nothing about how many vessels they could acquire under the appropriation they provide; they knew nothing about how many vessels they could build for the money; they knew nothing about what it would cost to operate those vessels; they knew nothing about whether they would be operated, how they would get business, how they would have terminal facilities, how they would have means of loading and unloading, where they would get their sailors, or anything on the subject. They just simply brought in here a proposition to enable the United States, through a shipping board, to take $30,000,000 of the people's money, possibly $40,000,000, and invest it in this undertaking. They are simply jumping in the dark. They want to build up the merchant marine, as we all do, and they think all that is necessary is to appropriate some money to do it. Why, Mr. President, a business man who would proceed along that line would go into bankruptcy in a very short while, and, in my judgment, any legislation undertaken in that way and with such little consideration will bring this enterprise also into bankruptcy in a very short time.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. JONES. No; I do not yield. I should like very much to do so; but I want to get through as soon as possible, and I do not feel that I should take the time to yield. I have quite a lot of matter here that I wish to consider.

Mr. GORE. I will say——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this bill——

Mr. GORE. I wish to ask a question.

Mr. JONES. No; I do not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. JONES. I do not yield at all. Mr. President, I should like very much, of course, to yield to the Senator, but I have been very liberal, I think, in yielding to-night, and if I should yield to all interruptions I would not be able to get through in a reasonable time, and I do not want to detain the Senate too long. I have quite a bit of matter that I want to get over, so I shall have to refuse to yield.

Mr. GORE. I wish to ask that the Senator's time be extended.

Mr. JONES. I shall have to refuse to yield to anyone from now on until I am able to conclude my remarks. I am glad to say that in this body we do not have to have time extended. We do not have to go to anybody to ask him for time here, as they do in some other legislative bodies that it would not be proper for me to refer to, and therefore I will not do it. This is the one body yet where we can have discussion and deliberation upon matters of legislation.

As I said, on December 16 the bill was reported by Mr. FLETCHER with amendments. Now, I want to read the bill as reported from the committee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I feel that I ought to read this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. JONES. I can not yield, Mr. President.

Mr. GORE. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. JONES. I do not yield at all, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma rises to a point of order. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GORE. I make the point of order that the Senator from Washington is discussing the merits of the pending bill, which, under section 120 of Mr. Reed's rules of parliamentary practice, he is not privileged to do pending a motion to recommit, for the obvious reason that if the measure is recommitted and is never reported back there is no occasion to waste the time of the Senate in its discussion, and if it is recommitted and reported back it is then before the Senate for discussion. I send to the Chair Mr. Reed's work on parliamentary law, and call the Chair's attention to section 120.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the point of order is not well taken, and therefore overrules it.

Mr. GORE. I should be glad to have the rule read into the RECORD, so those who chance to read the RECORD will understand why I raised the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not care to have that done. It is not in order.

Mr. JONES. I do not yield, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington will proceed.

Mr. JONES. I simply want to suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that we are not acting under the rules of order as practiced in the House of Representatives.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to say——

Mr. JONES. I do not yield, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. GORE. Very well. I do not care to have the Senator misrepresent my suggestion, however.

Mr. JONES. The bill was reported by Mr. FLETCHER on December 16. I desire to read the bill as reported. I simply want to suggest to the amen corners throughout the country that I should be very glad indeed if they would watch the RECORD here to see how technical our friends on the other side sometimes get, and to see how anxious they are to preclude the discussion of this measure, and to see why it is not possible for us to make a "frontal attack," as my friend suggested in his letter.

After the title of the bill, which is the same as it was when it was offered, the bill is reported as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States, acting through the shipping board hereinafter created, may subscribe to the capital stock of any corporation now or hereafter organized under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof or of the District of Columbia upon the terms and conditions herein mentioned.

Mr. President, it will be noted that they still have the blanket clause in here with reference to the organization of the corporation. It can be organized anywhere throughout the country where there is any law under which it can be organized. They did not know whether there was any State that had any law under which this organization could be perfected, and apparently they had made no investigation of that subject when they reported the bill. It was after the bill was reported from the committee that the discussion was had upon it and that point was made clear, and they afterwards made amendments which covered it.

SEC. 2. That the object of such corporation shall be the purchase, construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels in the trade between the Atlantic, Gulf, or Pacific ports of the United States and the ports of Central and South America and elsewhere to meet the requirements of the foreign commerce of the United States—

Here is where the committee reports an amendment to the bill. It is in lines 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9, and this is the language of the amendment that the committee reports:

Or to charter vessels for such purposes, and to make charters or leases of any vessel or vessels owned by such corporation to any other corporation, firm, or individual to be used for such purposes: Provided, That the terms and conditions of such charter parties shall first be approved by the shipping board.

Mr. President, it will be noted that under that amendment the shipping board could lease these vessels for a term of 99 years or a term of a thousand years, so far as any limitation in the bill is concerned. It could lease them to another corporation or to private individuals, just so the purposes were defined by the shipping board.

The initial capital stock of such corporation shall not be over $10,000,000, of the par value of $100 per share, but the shipping board, with the approval of the President, may consent to or cause an increase of the capital stock from time to time, as the interests of the corporation may require: Provided, That the United States shall subscribe for 51 per cent of each and every such increase. The United States shall subscribe for 51 per cent of such stock at par, and the remainder thereof shall be offered for public subscription. The United States may further subscribe at par to an amount of such stock equal to that not taken by public subscription. Such corporation may begin business as soon as 51 per cent of such stock has been subscribed and paid for by the United States.

I might just as well suggest right here what has been suggested in the argument already, and that is that while this bill provides that private parties may subscribe to 49 per cent of this stock, as a matter of fact there will be no private subscriptions for the stock. There has not been any suggestion by the friends of the bill that they know of anybody who would be willing to subscribe for this stock. There has not been any statement made here that anyone has proposed to subscribe for it or has offered to subscribe for it. It seems to be generally conceded that no private parties will subscribe for any of this minority stock, but that it will be taken by the Government of the United States; in other words, that the Government of the United States will not only have 51 per cent of the stock, but it will have 100 per cent of it, and that as a matter of fact it will be a Government corporation and entirely Government owned and operated ships.

There is only one way in which it seems to me private capitalists could afford to subscribe for this stock with any hope of getting anything out of it. There is not any guaranty on the part of the Government that any dividends shall be paid on this stock to the minority stockholders. They admit that it will be a losing proposition when they start into it, and therefore no private capital will put its money in, and no private capital will go in it with the practical assurance of the promotor of it that it will be a losing proposition, when that promoter does not guarantee any dividends or interest on the stock. Now, how can anybody afford to subscribe to this minority stock?

I can see a possible way by which this could be done. There are, I see by the press, I think this morning, about 66 interned ships at the ports of the United States. These ships are lying idle. They are making no money. Some of them are fine ships. Probably most of them are good merchant ships and would be good for the purposes designed by this bill, but they are not making any money now. They are not reaping any of the harvest that our friends point to with reference to other ships engaged in the carrying trade at the present time. These ships are owned by somebody. These people would like to get something out of them. They do not know what will happen to these ships. They do not know whether they will ever get anything out of them or not; and it may be—I do not know, but I think it is very likely—that somebody has some understanding with those interested in these ships that they can be bought at a certain price, possibly at a low price. Now, if these parties could in some way get somebody or some company to buy these ships, they, of course, would realize something out of them.

If such parties should become minority stockholders in this company, they would be on the inside. Some of them might even be members of the board of trustees or directors, and how natural it would be for them to suggest to the authorities that these ships could be purchased cheaply, that they were in a position where they could be bought cheaply, and how natural it would be to favor such stockholders. How natural it would be to favor these patriots who had subscribed for a part of the minority stock in this corporation. How natural it would be to favor those who had risked their money in an undertaking of this sort; and therefore the corporation might buy these ships. In that way these parties would probably get the money that they paid for them, with a profit.

Then, after these ships were being operated by this shipping board, by this corporation, and after this emergency passed away, after this war stopped and the merchant ships of the world got back into their normal routes, the rates would come down, competition would be active, and profits, if they had gotten any before on this line, would very likely fade away. The result would be that the company would have ships that they were making nothing out of, and how natural it would be then for these minority stockholders to say: "Well, we will take these ships off your hands, but they are not worth much. They are not making much money. You are not getting any profits from them. We can not afford to pay you very much, but we will give you 50 cents on the dollar." They would get these valuable ships, take them out into private enterprise, handle them under private conditions, and handle them in such a way that they could take advantage of foreign flags, foreign regulations, foreign marine conditions, and probably make some money. So they might make some money by selling the ships to the corporation, and they might make money by buying them back.

Mr. President, I can not conceive of any other inducement that would lead anyone to subscribe to any of this minority stock unless it would be that some big shipper at some point might think if he were a stockholder he might get some special favors, and he very likely would. Do we want to get in a condition like that? Do we want to get our Government officials under the charge and under the suspicion that they are being influenced by outside pressure with reference to the purchase or sale or lease of any of these ships, or that they are acting improperly with reference to them? I do not think so. I do not think we ought to put officials in that position. There are enough charges and enough suspicions now against public officers, many of them absolutely and wholly unfounded, to lead us to be very careful in framing important legislation not to make it possible or furnish a foundation for making other charges against other public officials in the handling of public business.

Then section 3, as reported, reads as follows:

That the United States, through the shipping board and with the approval of the President, is authorized to purchase or construct vessels suitable, in the judgment of the shipping board, for the purposes of such corporation, with a view to transferring them to such corporation, and for this purpose the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the request of the shipping board, may issue and sell or use for such purchases or construction any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury of the United States under the act of August 5, 1909, the act of February 4, 1910, and the act of March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, the total amount not to exceed $30,000,000, for the purpose of purchasing or constructing such vessels.

That section is just exactly the same as it was in the original bill introduced by the Senator from Missouri.

SEC. 4. That the shipping board is authorized to transfer the vessels purchased or constructed as herein provided to such corporation, and such corporation shall issue to the United States in payment thereof its gold bonds bearing interest at not less than 4 per cent per annum, and upon such further terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the shipping board, such bonds to constitute a first and paramount lien upon such vessels thus transferred and upon all the property of such corporation: Provided, That the amount of bonds received by the United States in payment for such vessels shall not be less, at the then par value, than the total amount expended by the United States in the purchase or construction of such vessels, and same may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion and with the approval of the President, to reimburse the Treasury for expenditures made in the purchase or construction of vessels. Such corporation shall make suitable provision for sinking fund and for the depreciation charges under the rules and regulations to be prescribed by such shipping board.

SEC. 5. That vessels purchased or constructed by such shipping board and conveyed to such corporation as herein provided shall be entitled to registry under the laws of the United States, and shall be deemed vessels of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels, except such vessels shall engage only in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands—

Now, here is an amendment put in by the committee after very careful consideration, I suppose, of the bill. They insert the words:

the Hawaiian Islands—

Then the substitute goes on:

and the islands of Guam and Tutuila. Such vessels shall be subject to the navigation laws of the United States except as herein provided.

SEC. 6. That, subject to the direction of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce are hereby constituted a board to be known as the shipping board, with full power to vote the stock of the United States in such corporation and to do all other things necessary to protect the interests of the United States and to carry out the purposes of this act.

Mr. President, you will note that this committee after a week's consideration, a week's deliberation, still think it is wise to leave the shipping board composed of three Cabinet officers, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce. As was suggested the other day by some Senator, it is significant if this measure is intended as an auxiliary measure for the Navy that the Secretary of the Navy is nowhere suggested for membership on this board. It would seem if they considered the necessity of these vessels as an adjunct of the Navy it would be very important to have the Secretary of the Navy a member of the board connected with the administration and operation of this enterprise, but nowhere in this bill is any suggestion of that kind made.

SEC. 7. That, with the approval of the Congress, such shipping board may at any time sell the stock of such corporation owned by the United States.

As I suggested in connection with the original bill, the stock would not be worth very much if the vessels, the property of the corporation, should be leased to some other corporation for ninety-nine or a thousand years or disposed of in some other way. The consent of Congress would not amount to anything. It would not affect anything of any substantial value or character.

SEC. 8. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to charter, lease, or transfer.

After the word "transfer" there is an amendment made by the committee. They struck out these words: "vessels purchased or constructed under the provisions of this act and," so that it reads:

SEC. 8. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to charter, lease, or transfer such naval auxiliaries now belonging to the Naval Establishment—

I assume that they struck out these words because in section 2 they provided for the lease, transfer, and charter of the vessels of this corporation—of the United States as are suitable for commercial use and which are not required for use in the Navy in time of peace, and vessels—

Now they amend by inserting, after the word "vessels," these words—belonging to the War Department suitable for commercial uses and not required for military transports in time of peace and vessels—

Then the original text proceeds—

now owned and operated by the Panama Railroad Co., to any corporation now or hereafter organized as in this act provided—

Then they strike out these words—or to any other corporation or corporations now or hereafter organized—

They struck that out for the reason that they insert that, I think, in section 2 as an amendment, so that the matter is covered by that amendment and it was not necessary to repeat it here. Then it reads—upon such terms and conditions as the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall prescribe. The vessels purchased or constructed by the United States through the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall be of a type, as far as the commercial requirements of the foreign trade of the United States may permit, suitable for use as naval auxiliaries in the Naval Establishment of the United States.

Under that section the vessels that are now used as naval auxiliaries and the vessels that are now used in the transport service of the United States, if not needed for that service, can be transferred to this corporation and used by it. There is nothing especially wrong about that if we are to have this board, but apparently the War Department would have nothing to say as to the operation and management of the vessels that might go from it to this department, and it does not seem to require the consent of the War Department for the transfer of these vessels to this company.

SEC. 9. That the President of the United States shall at any time have the right, upon giving written notice of his intention to the corporation using the vessels under the provisions of this act, to take possession for use as naval auxiliaries in the United States Navy or for other purposes of any vessels used by such corporation at a reasonable price or rental.

SEC. 10. That a detailed statement of all expenditures under this act and of all receipts hereunder shall be submitted to Congress at the beginning of each regular session.

That provision is just as it was in the original bill.

SEC. 11. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000.

That is the same as in the original bill.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from its passage.

Mr. President, that is the bill as it was reported by the committee on the 16th day of December.

From the 16th day of December until January 6 we had discussion in the Senate, but I think not entirely on this measure. I think we had the District of Columbia appropriation bill before the Senate. For some reason our friends on the other side permitted that bill to come before the Senate. It was considered and debated, debated in a reasonable sort of a way, and various important propositions came up and caused considerable discussion. I think some of our friends on the other side claimed that we were using that bill as a buffer against the shipping bill. I know, however, that all the discussion was germane to the bill. It arose very largely upon some very important amendments or provisions in the bill. No one can examine the RECORD and find that there was any extraneous discussion on that measure. It was finally passed.

In the meantime, I am not sure, but, I think, our friends had been considering this measure, and probably not in caucus; but some important speeches had been made on the floor of the Senate with reference to the provisions of the measure as it was reported by the committee. As I said, the committee had not had any hearings, they had not invited any suggestions from anyone, but reported the bill with only two or three amendments. They did not discuss it on the floor. I think the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] made one speech, and that was all. It was discussed by several Members on this side. Some very glaring defects in the bill were pointed out and very strong and convincing arguments were presented to show how the bill should be changed. It seems that the committee got together. I suppose the majority of the committee got together, and then a majority of that majority determined upon some changes in the bill.

On January 6 the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], reported an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the original bill and for the bill as reported by the committee.

Now, I want the Amen Corners throughout the country to know that there was not a simple amendment presented by the committee, but that the committee went to work and in a way reframed the bill entirely and offered an amendment the caption of which reads as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute moved by Mr. FLETCHER on behalf of the Committee on Commerce to the bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States—

And so forth. Then giving the title of the bill—

Namely, strike out all after the enacting clause and insert.

Mr. President, this committee, after having refused to have any hearing, after having refused to inquire of anybody who knew anything about this subject as to what would be proper legislation, after having reported the bill with some minor amendments to the Senate, after discussion on this side of the Chamber, decided that the bill ought to be remodeled, and so, as I said, on January 6 they reported a substitute.

The discussion of this measure prior to that time certainly was not out of place; it certainly was of value, but after January 6 we had a new bill before the Senate. They complain about the delay. Here the session was nearly half gone and the committee of the majority was just presenting to the Senate for its consideration an entire substitute for this bill. And then they complain because there is delay in reference to its consideration.

Now, then, what is the substitute? I want to read it into the RECORD so that we can compare the substitute or the original bill with the report from the committee and see what changes have been made as the result of the arguments on this floor.

That the United States, acting through the shipping board hereinafter created, may subscribe to the capital stock of any corporation now or hereafter organized under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof or of the District of Columbia which shall have for its object—

Now, they still keep this blanket clause with reference to the organization of this corporation. They still do not know whether there is any State that has any law under which it can be organized or not. They still do not know whether if they would pass this legislation there would be any authority anywhere to provide for the organization of this corporation—shall have for its object the purchase, construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels to meet the requirements of the foreign commerce of the United States, or to charter vessels for such purposes, and to make charters or leases of any vessel or vessels owned by such corporation to any other corporation, firm, or individual to be used for such purposes: Provided, That the terms and conditions of such charter parties shall first be approved by the shipping board, the initial capital stock of which corporation shall not be over $10,000,000, of the par value of $100 per share.

Mr. President, it will be noted that in the original bill and in the bill as reported from the committee in section 2 there was a provision setting out the ports between which these vessels should go, naming the Gulf ports, the Atlantic, the Pacific, South American ports, and elsewhere. The substitute does not name any of these places, but simply says:

And operation of merchant vessels to meet the requirements of the foreign commerce of the United States.

I do not know that that language has any special significance, but there is quite a change made there in the language, at any rate. It seems to me that we ought to take time to compare these different changes that are made so as to be certain that nothing gets into this unintentionally that would be injurious or injuriously affect the interests of the United States or the people of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the United States shall subscribe to 51 per cent of the initial capital stock of such corporation at par and the remainder thereof shall be offered for public subscription at not less than par, and the United States may then further subscribe at par for any amount of such stock not taken by public subscription, but such corporation may begin business as soon as 51 per cent of such stock has been subscribed and paid for by the United States. The shipping board, with the approval of the President, may consent to or may cause an increase of the capital stock from time to time as the interests of the corporation may require, but the United States shall subscribe for 51 per cent of each and every such increase.

Mr. President, I have not time to compare these bills at this time, but I have placed them in the RECORD, so that our friends in the Amen Corners throughout the country and others who may examine the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, who have the time to do so, may compare the various provisions in these various bills and see what changes are made.

SEC. 3. That the United States, through the shipping board and with the approval of the President, is authorized to purchase or construct vessels suitable, in the judgment of the shipping board, for the purposes of such corporation, with a view to transferring them to such corporation, and for this purpose the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the request of the shipping board and the approval of the President, may issue and sell or use for such purchases or construction any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury of the United States under the act of August 5, 1909, the act of February 4, 1910, and the act of March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, to a total amount not to exceed $30,000,000 for the purpose of purchasing or constructing such vessels: Provided, That the bonds issued and sold or used under the provisions of this section may be made payable at such time after issue as the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may deem advisable and fix, instead of 50 years after date of issue, as in said act of August 5, 1909, not exceeding 50 years: Provided further, That payments for such purchases or construction from proceeds of sales of bonds, or delivery of bonds in payment thereof, shall be made only as ordered and directed by the shipping board.

Mr. President, I have not investigated the decisions of our courts with reference to the raising of revenue to defray the expenses of the Government as they would affect provisions like we find contained in all these bills. It seems to me, however, that these bills do provide for the raising of revenue—the raising of revenue by the sale of bonds that have heretofore been authorized but that could not be used for this purpose without legislation. We have a constitutional provision that all bills for the raising of revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. This is a bill originating in the Senate. I simply call the question to the attention of the constitutional authorities of this body as to whether this measure is subject to the constitutional objection on the ground that it provides for the raising of revenue. They certainly recognize the fact that the possibilities are that we will require for the operation and purchase of these vessels more revenue than will come from the ordinary revenues of the Government, and this bill clearly makes provision for supplying any deficiency. It seems to me that to that extent it is a revenue measure.

SEC. 4. That the shipping board is authorized to transfer the vessels purchased or constructed as herein provided to any such corporation in which the United States has become a stockholder as hereinbefore provided, and such corporation shall issue to the United States in payment thereof its gold bonds bearing interest at not less than 4 per cent per annum, and upon such further terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the shipping board, such bonds to constitute a first and paramount lien upon such vessels thus transferred and upon all the property of such corporation: Provided, That the amount of bonds received by the United States in payment for such vessels shall not be less, at the then par value, than the total amount expended by the United States in the purchase or construction of such vessels, and the same may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion and with the approval of the President, to reimburse the Treasury for expenditures made in the purchase or construction of vessels. Such corporation shall make suitable provision for sinking fund and for the depreciation charges under the rules and regulations to be prescribed by such shipping board; and all vessels acquired under this act or in which the United States shall otherwise be interested as owner in whole or in part, or upon which the United States shall have or hold any mortgage, pledge, lien, or other security, shall, when and while employed solely as merchant vessels, be in all respects subject to the rules, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels under the principles of international law, in like manner and to the same extent as merchant vessels in private ownership when duly registered under the laws of the United States.

Mr. President, I want to suggest that we have not heard from anybody on the other side as to what they propose to do with reference to the crews of any vessels that they may acquire under this act and what sort of officers they expect to use on those vessels.

In this connection I want to call attention to the fact—which I shall probably refer to later on—that under the emergency law that we passed some time ago providing for the purchase of foreign-built and foreign-operated vessels and their registry under the American flag we authorized the President to suspend for such time as he deemed proper the provisions of the law which require that watch officers should be American citizens, and also for such time as he might deem advisable the laws regarding the inspection of vessels. If this act is passed, and we acquire vessels under it, or this corporation gets vessels under it, do they intend that such vessels may be admitted to registry and be operated under the emergency act that we passed and under the suspension that the President made?

I called attention once before on the floor of the Senate to the action of the President with reference to this measure. I want to refer to it again. I am satisfied that the Senate when it passed that measure never had in mind that the President would for any considerable length of time suspend the law requiring watch officers to be American citizens. But what was done? Apparently the United Fruit Co. had several ships that they had been sailing under a foreign flag with foreign crews and foreign officers. Why had they been doing that? They had been doing it because it was cheaper to operate their vessels in that way and under a foreign flag than to operate them under our flag and under our laws and regulations. So when danger came, when the flag that they were flying was likely to bring them into trouble, this emergency legislation was suggested. It was passed, and what did they do? They suggested that the law requiring watch officers on vessels flying the American flag to be American citizens should be suspended for a period of seven years.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the Senate would have passed any such provision as that if it had supposed that the President would suspend these laws for such length of time as that; but, nevertheless, the order was issued. These laws were suspended for that time; and so for seven years vessels may be admitted to registry from foreign flags to the American flag without complying with the law requiring American citizens as watch officers. They can bring their foreign officers in as officers under the American flag. They will probably continue to pay them, I suppose, the wages that they were paying before they came under this flag; and in that way they will be able to operate their ships more cheaply than other ships under the American flag are operated, which have had to employ American officers.

Then the laws requiring the inspection of vessels before they are granted American registry were suspended for a period of two years. I do not make any criticism of that. If we should authorize the President to suspend those laws, I think that two years is probably a reasonable time. I think two years would have been a reasonable time for the suspension of the other law, but I do not think it ought to have been suspended for seven years.

Furthermore—I shall refer later on to the figures in detail—it was shown very clearly and distinctly to the department before the suspension was made that there were over 2,000 Americans qualified to act as watch officers who were idle, who were available for these vessels at the time the suspension was made. We put an express provision in our law that permitted the President to suspend this law if it was deemed necessary; and my recollection is, though I am not positive about it, that we had a provision in the law, providing for the suspension if American officers were not available. They were available at any rate. A report has been made to the Senate, pursuant to a resolution I introduced, showing that the department was advised that there were over 2,000 such officers available at the time the suspension was made. I have also a circular letter here from the United Fruit Co., which I shall read probably later on, in which they suggest that this suspension should operate for seven years; and that suggestion was followed.

SEC. 5. That vessels purchased or constructed by such shipping board and conveyed to such corporation as herein provided shall be entitled to registry under the laws of the United States, and shall be deemed vessels of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels, except such vessels shall engage only in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands, the Hawaiian Islands, and the islands of Guam and Tutuila. Such vessels shall be subject to the navigation laws of the United States except as herein provided.

I think that section is substantially, if not exactly, the same as the section in the bill as reported.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce are hereby constituted a board to be known as the shipping board, with full power, subject to the approval of the President, to vote the stock of the United States in said corporation, either as a body or by one or more of its members duly authorized by a majority, and to do all things necessary, whether specifically enumerated or not, to carry out the purposes of this act and protect the interests of the United States.

They still, in this substitute, hold the provision that this board shall be composed of Cabinet officers.

SEC. 7. That, with the approval of the Congress, such shipping board may at any time sell the stock of such corporation owned by the United States.

That prohibition is the same, I think, as found in the bill as reported.

SEC. 8. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to charter, lease, or transfer such naval auxiliaries now belonging to the Naval Establishment of the United States as are suitable for commercial use and which are not required for use in the Navy in time of peace, and vessels belonging to the War Department suitable for commercial uses and not required for military transports in time of peace and to direct or cause to be chartered, leased, or transferred vessels now owned and operated by the Panama Railroad Co., to any corporation now or hereafter organized as in this act provided upon such terms and conditions as the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall prescribe. The vessels purchased or constructed by the United States through the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall be of a type, as far as the commercial requirements of the foreign trade of the United States may permit, suitable for use as naval auxiliaries in the Naval Establishment of the United States.

Mr. President, it strikes me that there is a rather peculiar provision there. It authorizes the President to charter, lease, or transfer the naval auxiliaries to this company and to direct or cause to be chartered, leased, or transferred vessels operated by the Panama Railroad Co., to any corporation upon such terms and conditions as the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall prescribe. The President is to charter or lease the vessels to himself. He not only does the leasing and the chartering but he must approve the terms that may be submitted by the board upon which this is done.

SEC. 9. That the President of the United States, upon giving to any such corporation in which the United States shall be a stockholder, through its president, vice president, secretary, or manager, notice in writing for such reasonable length of time as in his judgment the circumstances require and will permit of his intention so to do, may take possession, absolutely or temporarily, for use as naval auxiliaries, of any vessel or vessels owned or leased by or otherwise in the possession of said corporation, and said corporation shall be entitled to a reasonable price or rental therefor, to be fixed by the shipping board with the approval of the President: Provided, That if in the judgment of the President an emergency exists requiring such action he may take possession of any such vessel or vessels without notice.

SEC. 10. That the shipping board shall make to Congress, at the beginning of each regular session, a report of expenditures and receipts under this act and of the operations of any corporation in which the United States may have become a stockholder hereunder.

SEC. 11. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000. But the corporation in which the United States shall become a stockholder as herein provided shall pay all necessary expenses of the shipping board in this behalf.

Mr. President, that provision is not in the original bill. I do not know where this corporation is going to get this money—I suppose out of the minority-stock subscriptions, or probably out of the subscriptions by the United States.

SEC. 12. That the President is hereby authorized and empowered to designate from time to time such ports of the United States as he may for the purposes of this section deem advisable at which the several collectors of the ports so designated shall for such periods of time as the President may prescribe inspect all goods, wares, and merchandise of whatever description offered for shipment from any such port to any foreign port upon any vessel directly or indirectly owned in whole or in part by the United States or in which the United States may have a proprietary interest, when employed solely as a merchant vessel, or upon any vessel whatsoever when duly registered under the laws of the United States. It shall be, and is hereby made, the duty of the collector of the port at each of the ports so designated, and authority is hereby granted to such collector for that purpose, to make such inspection and examination before the same shall be loaded and stored aboard ship of all goods, wares, and merchandise of whatever description offered for shipment from such port to any foreign port upon any vessel defined in this section as may be necessary to inform him as to the exact character and description of the goods, wares, and merchandise so offered for shipment. It shall be unlawful for any person, whether as principal or agent, to load and store aboard ship, or attempt to load and store aboard ship, any goods, wares, or merchandise subject to inspection under this section before the same have been duly inspected and examined as herein required; and it shall be unlawful for the master or other chief officer of any vessel defined in this section to receive and store aboard ship any goods, wares, or merchandise subject to inspection under this section before the same have been duly inspected and examined as herein required. Any person who shall knowingly violate the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction shall be sentenced to pay a fine of not more than $5,000, and shall be committed to prison until such fine and the costs of the prosecution shall be paid; and clearance shall not be granted to any vessel whose owners or chief officers shall knowingly violate the provisions of this section: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce may upon hearing and for satisfactory reasons permit and direct the clearance of any such vessel, stating his reasons therefor in a written opinion to be filed as a public document in the Department of Commerce.

That, I think, is an entirely new provision. That is not all of that section, however; but it seems to me that that provides for an inspection at the different ports of the United States by the collectors not only of the vessels of this corporation, of the vessels acquired or leased or chartered under this act, but of all vessels of the United States, no matter by whom owned or operated. The result, Mr. President, of that will be very soon a demand for a whole lot of assistance at the different ports of the country. It will result in demands for increased appropriations for additional employees, it will increase the expense upon the people of the country, and it will be an expense that I do not see how it can be charged up to the vessels that are being operated by private interests. It will simply be, as I understand it, an expenditure for officers to issue certificates under which the private owners and operators of vessels will probably secure protection in taking their goods from this country to a foreign port. It is nothing more nor less than a form of subsidy that will be done at the expense of our people. I do not see where they will get very much out of it. I do not know whether you would call that a subsidy or not—probably not—but it seems to me that it is considerable of a subsidy for the benefit of the private operators of these ships and these vessels.

I have not had the time to study that provision with very much care, but that is the way it strikes me as I read it.

Then the section goes on as follows:

It shall be, and is hereby made, the duty of the collector of the port from which any such vessel clears—

Now, "any such vessel" means not only the vessels of this corporation—this company—but all other vessels carrying goods to foreign ports—to inspect the manifest or cargo invoice of each vessel subject to the provisions of this section to ascertain whether the manifest or cargo invoice sets forth a true exhibit of all goods, wares, and merchandise aboard ship at the time of sailing; and if the collector of the port shall be satisfied that the manifest or cargo invoice does set forth a true exhibit of all goods, wares, and merchandise received aboard ship at the time of sailing, he shall in every such case attach to the manifest or cargo invoice his official certificate under seal, setting forth that he has inspected and examined the goods, wares, and merchandise aboard such ship, and that the manifest or cargo invoice sets forth a true exhibit of the same. No such vessel shall be granted a clearance at any such port until after the certificate, herein required to be issued under his official seal by the collector of the port, has been issued and delivered by him to the chief officer or other proper officer of such vessel.

That will certainly add to the expenses of the Government. That will certainly require, at practically every port in the country where any considerable business is done, additional employees to make this examination and inspection, and if they make a proper inspection so as to make a proper certificate it is going to take a good many employees to do it; and this does not appear to be a temporary proposition. I can see some reason for doing this while this war is going on over in Europe. Probably that might afford protection from any unnecessary search or investigation for contraband, and so on, but certainly it should end when this war ends. This bill, however, does not make any provision of that kind. It does not say that we shall stop these investigations so as to give clearances within six months after the close of the war, or at the time of signing the treaty of peace. It is a permanent proposition; and I want to say to the Senate it is very difficult, after we have provided employees and got them on the rolls, to get them off, even though it may not be necessary, and I do not see the necessity for this examination and certificate in time of peace. It may be absolutely unnecessary, and yet Congress will find very great trouble in getting rid of these additional employees and their salaries. It may seem that there ought to be some provision in this bill that would end that condition of things when this war stops, because I take it that is the real reason for that provision.

I think that if I could get this address in the RECORD in time, probably with the presence of my friend the chairman of the committee, it might be well if that suggestion could be taken back to the Democratic caucus, and probably you might consider it behind closed doors, and you might feel justified in bringing in a provision here, a new substitute, possibly, with a provision making this temporary, making it end at a certain time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I really can not yield, Mr. President. I regret it. I am very sorry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES. No; I am very sorry, but I can not yield. I am just making these suggestions——

Mr. FLETCHER. I simply wanted to say that the Senator is discussing something that is not in the substitute at all.

Mr. JONES. I have just read the substitute, and the language seems to me to be very plain. Of course, it may not be the last substitute. I do not know. I am trying to consider the different editions of this bill, so as to find out just what they are. Probably when I get around to the final draft I will find that my suggestions have been met.

Then the section continues:

> It shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Navigation, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, to make and promulgate all needful and proper rules and regulations for administering the provisions of this section; and for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

I find that my surmise that this is likely to cost considerable money is justified by the language of the bill itself. It seems that these provisions for inspection that have been made here require an appropriation in the bill itself of $500,000, and instead of leaving the rules and regulations to the shipping board, they make it the duty of the Commissioner of Navigation. Now, it may be that that is changed in a later edition of this bill. I know that there is a provision in a later edition with reference to the various rules and regulations affecting our navigation, and that I wish to refer to a little bit later on, when I come to it in that edition, and call the attention of the committee and of the Senate to what I believe they do not know.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. In section 13—I am very sorry, but I can not yield, Mr. President.

Mr. HUGHES. Will not the Senator designate which edition he is discussing?

Mr. JONES. I am discussing the edition of January 6.

Mr. HUGHES. Oh, yes. It would be very considerate if the Senator would refer to these various editions by date.

Mr. JONES. I did that on the start. The Senator was not here, I guess, when I started in on that.

Section 13 is as follows:

> That this act shall take effect from its passage.

But, Mr. President, that is not the final edition for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, without jeopardizing his right to the floor, does not the Senator think it would be proper at this period of the proceedings to get down to and discuss the final edition, inasmuch as that is likely to be the one that is voted on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey will please speak louder. It is impossible for the Reporter to hear him.

Mr. HUGHES. The Reporter can hear all right.

Mr. JONES. No; I can not yield. I have already explained why I am taking up these different substitutes. The Senator probably was not here, and so it will necessitate my taking some of the time of the Senate to repeat what I have already said.

Mr. HUGHES. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. JONES. I regret very much to use so much of the valuable time of the Senate for that purpose.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I can not yield to the Senator.

Mr. HUGHES. I want to ask the Senator not to put me in a false position before the country, inasmuch as I am one of the very few Senators who are here.

Mr. JONES. I can not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. Very well.

Mr. JONES. I am very sorry. I know that the Senator from New Jersey has been here as much as other Senators.

Mr. HUGHES. And more.

Mr. JONES. I am willing to concede that, so far as that is concerned. I am not complaining at anyone not being here. I do not expect the Senators to be here. I am talking largely to the Amen Corners of the country. As I explained a while ago, we have out in the city of Tacoma a sort of organization of business men who meet every day together at a club and take lunch, and, sitting about the table, they discuss various matters of interest to the people, and they call it the Amen Corner. I received a letter a few days ago from a friend of mine who is a member of this Amen Corner, and he put a little postscript to it suggesting that the Amen Corner did not approve filibustering, but that they approved frontal attacks. Now, I am satisfied there are a great many Amen Corners throughout the country, and I just want to explain to these people in the Amen Corners the situation here in the Senate and how this bill has been considered and how it has not been considered, and I want to call their attention to the various steps through which it has passed in order to reach the final draft that we will be supposed to act upon.

Some of our friends have complained because we have discussed the matter and debated it, and yet I am showing here that, while the bill was introduced on the 9th of December, there was a new edition of it brought out on the 6th of January, or when the session was almost half gone. Now, we would not be expected to discuss that new edition before the 6th of January. We ought to discuss it and understand it some time after the 6th of January. I want to show to the Amen Corners throughout the country that this 6th of January edition was not the final edition, however, and that still we were not permitted to discuss the final edition until much later in the session. It is not our fault that this bill was not brought out sooner. That rests with our friends on the other side, who control the committee and who control the caucus. They have gotten the benefit, I concede, of some of the arguments on this side made by the able Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and the able Senators from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS and Mr. LODGE] and the able Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and they have profited by these suggestions. They have made corrections in the bill; they have improved it, I think, in many respects. And now we come to another edition of this bill, the edition of January 15.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. JONES. I am very sorry that I can not yield. I am taking more time than I had expected to take.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. HUGHES. I hope the Senator will yield for just a moment.

Mr. JONES. No; I can not yield.

Mr. HUGHES. Not even for a question?

Mr. JONES. I am sorry—no; not even for a question, it takes so much time.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator seemed to have such a grasp of the subject that I desired to ask him a question about it.

Mr. JONES. I announced when I began, after the very unnecessary, dilatory, and filibustering tactics of our friends on the other side, which consumed about an hour and a half of this evening of very valuable time, that I could not afford to yield further; so I am very sorry. I should like to yield to my friend, but I do not feel that I ought to waste the time by allowing interruptions, because if I yield to one Senator of course I have to yield to others, and most of our time would be taken up by these interruptions, and it would break the continuity of my remarks and probably be confusing to the amen corners of the country.

Mr. HUGHES. That is sufficient reason for my refraining from interrupting the Senator.

Mr. JONES. On January 15 another substitute was brought in by the Senator from Florida—another edition—but "January 15" on there does not mean January 15 at all. It means something else. It means the calendar day of January 25. What does that mean? Why, it means that from January 15 we had been recessing from day to day instead of adjourning. Why had we been recessing? We had been recessing because the majority on the other side insisted upon recessing. Why did they insist upon recessing? They insisted upon recessing so as to continue the legislative day of January 15. Why did they want to continue the legislative day of January 15? Why, they wanted to continue that day in the hope of exhausting debate on this side, in the hope that the Senators who wanted to talk on this measure would have spoken twice on the bill during that time, and that then our friends on the other side would make the point of order that debate was exhausted, and the bill would have to come to a vote.

The debate during that time was on this old substitute of January 6, and during that time what were our friends on the other side doing? I want the Amen Corner people to understand this. They were not discussing the bill here in the Senate, but what were they doing? Why, they were discussing it from day to day in the caucus, behind closed doors, without any representatives of the press being present, without agents of the people to give publicity to what they were talking about or what suggestions were made or the reasons they gave for changing the bill. Why did they go into caucus? What was the necessity of taking the bill into caucus? Well, the trouble seemed to be that some suggestions had been made on this floor that appeared to be of considerable force. There were some defects in this bill pointed out in what our friends would term "useless discussion" by this side of the Chamber. They apparently were not willing to discuss it on the floor. They were not willing to discuss it in the open. They were not willing to discuss these questions where the people of the Amen Corners of the country would be able to hear them and read what they said and know what they said and what they thought about this measure and about these suggestions; but as we talked in the daytime on the floor of the Senate our friends on the other side talked at night in the caucus. As we talked on the floor of the Senate in the open, they talked on the floor of the caucus in secret. As we talked before the press and before the country and on the floor of the Senate, they talked behind the closed doors of the caucus. We could not adopt anything here, because we were in the minority. Our friends on the other side adopted things in the caucus and tried to bind, if they did not bind, all of their members to support what they agreed to there in secret, and then proposed to bring it out to the Senate and present it to us with the decree that "This is what we have agreed to. We have the votes to put it through. It is useless for you to talk. You ought not to do it. You ought not to take the time."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OWEN in the chair). The Chair will ask the Senator to suspend for a moment while the Chair presents to the Senate a supplementary report of the Sergeant at Arms. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SERGEANT AT ARMS,
February 9, 1915—2.45 o'clock a. m.

To the PRESIDING OFFICER UNITED STATES SENATE:

In compliance with Senate motion, to wit, "Ordered, That the Sergeant at Arms be directed to use all necessary means to compel the attendance of absent Senators, except those detained on account of sickness," I beg to report that the following Senators have entered the Chamber in response to the above or telephonic requests:

Senators BURLEIGH, BRADY, MCCUMBER, and WORKS.

My deputies could get no response at the residences of Senators BORAH and BRISTOW.

Senator HARDWICK'S residence reported by telephone that he was not there. No response to telephone calls at residences of Senators GOFF and HITCHCOCK. Deputies are out in automobiles endeavoring to serve the absent Senators with the order of the Senate.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES P. HIGGINS,
Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I said while we were discussing this substitute of January 6 in perfect good faith on the floor of the Senate, discussing its merits, and while our friends were discussing it in caucus and trying to meet the objections which had been made here, and while they could go to caucus they would not permit the Senate to take a recess. While they knew the bill they had reported January 6 would not be the bill that they would try to pass, they were not willing to lay it aside and take up the other business of the Senate that ought to have been taken up, and that could have been taken up just as well as not. They would not allow us to go to the calendar, and they would not allow appropriation bills to be reported. They would not allow appropriation bills to be taken up and considered. Mr. President, they would not allow anything to be done on the floor of the Senate except that they required us to use the time of the Senate or else come to a vote upon a proposition that they did not intend to pass.

I want the Amen Corners of the country to understand that situation. They kept up a legislative day from January 15 to January 25, and then the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], on behalf of the Committee on Commerce, offered an amendment, not an amendment to the substitute which they reported January 6, but an amendment in the nature of a substitute, "moved by Mr. FLETCHER, on behalf of the Committee on Commerce, to the bill to authorize the United States," and so forth, "namely, strike out all after the enacting clause and insert." There seems to be no reference there to the substitute of January 6.

By the way, Mr. President, the print that I have here is marked "Confidential." I suppose the committee got together in secret. It may be just the majority of the committee, and I do not know, got this up, and it is marked "Confidential." It has printed on it "January 15, calendar day January 25, 1915, ordered to lie on the table and to be printed."

I want the Amen Corners of the country to note that as a matter of fact that substitute was not presented to the Senate until the calendar day of January 26, but on the legislative day of January 15; and when that came in, then it was that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] made the declaration I read here from the RECORD, that from that time on the minority must be prepared to continue in session day and night, and that if any Senator became exhausted there would have to be somebody to take his place or they would proceed to take a vote. That announcement was made on the floor of the Senate before that substitute was printed, except this confidential print. That statement was made on the floor of the Senate by the Senator from Indiana on the very day the Senator from Florida sent his substitute to the Senate and before it had been officially printed.

Yet they say we have been filibustering. They say we have been delaying this measure. Mr. President, we have been improving this measure right along. We have been getting this measure in shape, so that if it must be passed it will be a reasonably satisfactory measure.

The discussion that we had on this side was, as I said, taken and digested in the secrets of the caucus, and the result was the substitute of the calendar day of January 26, but the legislative day of January 15. Now, on January 26, with the session two-thirds gone, with the bill which you insist upon passing not presented to the Senate until the 26th day of January, you say we have been delaying matters. What had you been doing up to the 26th of January? Why had you not been passing other legislation? Why were you not considering other legislation? When you did consider this bill in the caucus at night, as you did, why did you not on the floor of the Senate consider other legislation and get it through? Why was it that you stopped all legislative business, because you say debate is not business, and you say discussion is not business, that an interchange of ideas will not amount to anything. You got in the caucus and you did some good there. Yet we were delaying matters, and we were delaying legislation. The majority was delaying legislation. The majority actually forced all legislation aside and kept us going here, in order that you might take things up in caucus.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the Senator permit me to submit a request that we vote on the pending motion at 12 o'clock tomorrow?

Mr. JONES. I am very sorry, but I can not yield the floor.

Mr. HUGHES. Will not the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey will address the Chair.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator seems so distressed at the fact——

Mr. JONES. I am calling the attention of the Senate to the fact——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is requested to address the Chair.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I can not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is out of order.

Mr. HUGHES. On account of not addressing the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He is out of order because he is not addressing the Chair, but he is addressing the Senator from Washington.

Mr. HUGHES. I said "Mr. President."

Mr. JONES. I can not yield.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield the floor.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I simply——

Mr. JONES. I am sorry; I should like to accommodate the Senator, but I do not feel that I can do so.

On January 26 another substitute was brought into the Senate. It was brought in by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], a very dear friend of mine, a very able Senator, and a very fair Senator. He no doubt acted under the direction of the Committee on Commerce, and it says it is "moved by Mr. FLETCHER on behalf of the Committee on Commerce to the bill S. 6856," and so forth, giving the title, "strike out all after the enacting clause and insert." There is no reference made in this print to the substitute of January 6. It does not say that that is stricken out or that that is cast aside or that it is thrown away or this is presented as a substitute for it; but it simply refers to the original bill and strikes out all after the enacting clause and inserts the following.

Mr. President, I must read this substitute so that one may see just what came out of this secret caucus that you were conducting for almost a week. My recollection is that you either recessed or adjourned over from Friday until Monday for the avowed purpose of giving your caucus an opportunity to meet on Saturday and discuss this measure, and according to the newspaper reports, some of which I have here but which I will not take the time of the Senate to read, you did meet in caucus and discuss the measure. But that is about all we learned. We learn nothing about what was said there or what action was taken there or what differences arose there or anything of the sort. I did call attention a while ago to a statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] that he was one of the members of the caucus who was in favor of bringing the bill here on the floor of the Senate and considering amendments to it and acting upon it openly in the Senate without being bound by the caucus to certain amendments and bound to oppose other amendments. But apparently he was voted down, and he accepted, I suppose, cheerfully the verdict of the majority of his brethren, and he has acted with them with reference to this substitute. The substitute reads as follows:

That the United States, acting through the shipping board hereinafter created, may subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation of the District of Columbia.

That is a very material difference from the other bills. All these other bills have provided for the organization of a corporation under the laws of a State or the District of Columbia, or somewhere else, anywhere that it might be organized, but, as I said, nobody knew whether there was any State that had any laws under which this corporation could be organized, and apparently they had to supplement the corporation laws of the District of Columbia in order that this corporation might be organized here. But now in this substitute of January 26 we have the situs of the corporation fixed. We have got it somewhere. We know where it is. It is going to be in the District of Columbia. That was not suggested on the other side. It was not suggested by our friends of the majority. That defect in the original bill was suggested over here, and you finally came around to our view with reference to it. The fact that you have accepted so many of our suggestions, although apparently reluctantly, deliberately, and slowly, leads us to examine these final substitutes and make our suggestions with reference to them in the hope that probably we can get you to change other provisions of the bill.

I have here the substitute when it was introduced in the Senate on January 26, ordered to lie on the table and be printed. It reads a little different from this confidential print. The confidential print simply says:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute moved by Mr. FLETCHER.

Now, this substitute says:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute for the original bill and all amendments heretofore reported thereto from the Committee on Commerce.

Now, then, we have for the first time a suggestion that what is reported is not only a substitute for the original bill, but for all the amendments that have theretofore been suggested or reported. After the title it says:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the United States, acting through the shipping board hereinafter created, may subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation of the District of Columbia. Said corporation shall have for its object the purchase, construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels to meet the requirements of the foreign commerce of the United States, or to charter vessels for such purposes, and to make charters or leases of any vessel or vessels owned by such corporation to any other corporation organized under the laws of a State, a majority of the stock being owned by citizens of the United States, firm or individual, citizen or citizens of the United States, to be used for such purposes and shall have power to carry out said objects and purposes: Provided, That the terms and conditions of such charter parties shall first be approved by the shipping board, the initial capital stock of which corporation shall not be over $10,000,000, of the par value of $100 per share.

It seems that under that provision these vessels can be leased only to certain corporations—not to all corporations, but to corporations a majority of the stock being owned by citizens of the United States, firms or individuals.

I suppose that would require an investigation on the part of the shipping board, if any corporation should apply for a lease of any of these vessels, to see whether the owners of the stock are citizens of the United States or not. It would require another official or other officials of the Government, and these people could not act without a salary. So under that provision we will have a good many more offices created, and I think a good many useless ones, and entail upon the people of the country a large expense.

The members of said shipping board, as incorporators, may, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, form a corporation of the District of Columbia by making and filing a certificate of incorporation, as provided in subchapter 4 of chapter 18 of an act entitled "An act to establish a code of laws for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901.

That is nearly all new.

The corporation so formed, its officers and trustees and stockholders shall possess all the powers conferred and perform all the duties imposed by said subchapter 4, except as the same are by this act limited or qualified.

Mr. President, I have not examined that chapter of the laws of the District of Columbia. I do not know whether that chapter imposes any duties upon these officers that they can not perform as officers of the United States Government or not. I do not know whether the committee has examined those laws very carefully or not. From some other provisions of this bill, I would not be surprised if there are other provisions in that act of the District of Columbia which would make it very embarrassing for this corporation to do business.

The powers of said corporation shall be limited to the purposes of this act and to such as are necessarily incident thereto.

Said corporation may sue and be sued in any district court of the United States, and may remove to said courts any cause brought against it in any other court.

Said corporation may require any officer or employee to give security for the faithful performance of his duties.

Persons subscribing to the stock of said company shall pay for the same in full at the time of subscription.

The stock owned by the United States shall be voted by the shipping board or its duly selected representative.

I do not know just what that means. I do not know whether that means that the shipping board shall select some foreigner or some party who does not own stock and authorize him to vote the stock of the United States or not. There is no limit given in this on the power of this board. I do not know whether the representative who is selected will receive a salary or not. It might be that the shipping board might select somebody on the Pacific coast, give him a nice trip down here to Washington City, pay his expenses, give him a per diem, and furnish him a very nice junket. I do not say that that would be done, but, nevertheless, it seems to me that it is not prevented.

It seems to me that we ought to provide that this stock shall be voted by the shipping board and stop there. The shipping board will have its place of business here in the District of Columbia. Three of the members will have their offices here and be here. It seems to me that this duly selected representative ought to be cut out, that there is no use for it, and it simply opens the door to some action and some conduct that would produce scandal and criticism.

The officers and trustees of said corporation shall be citizens of the United States, but need not be citizens of the District of Columbia. Such officers and trustees shall be subject to removal at any time by vote of a majority of the stockholders at any meeting thereof.

Said corporation and its capital stock shall, so long as the United States owns a majority of said stock, be free from all public taxes.

I remember a discussion between the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with reference to that provision. My recollection is that the Senator from Florida admitted that that would relieve the stock from the taxation not only by the National Government but by the State government if held in a State. I do not think that such a discrimination as that ought to be permitted. I do not think that persons in the State of New York ought to be permitted to hold stock in this public corporation and have it free from taxation, at least by the State of New York. It ought to be subject to tax just the same as the stock of any other company. As a matter of fact, it merely carries out the idea that this corporation is simply a subterfuge; that it is simply an indirect way for the United States to do things itself. As a matter of fact, this is a United States corporation. Its stock is the stock of the United States. It will not be subscribed by anybody else. It will all be owned and held by the United States itself.

At no time—

I think this is a new provision in this substitute; that it is not contained in any of the others. How that came to be suggested, where the suggestion came from, I do not know. I never heard of any suggestion of that kind on the floor of the Senate. That suggestion must have come behind the closed doors of the secret caucus. Somebody suggested it somewhere. The suggestion may have come from somebody in New York City, who hoped to get an option on some of the interned ships and to be able to dispose of those ships to this company in some way. I do not know whether or not that is true; but, Mr. President, we can not be criticized for making these suggestions, for, when things are done in secret, we are justified in surmising almost all sorts of things. After awhile I shall present to the Senate the views of some very celebrated gentlemen with reference to doing things in secret. I shall try to submit to my friends on the other side some very good advice that I think they should follow and should have followed in the preparation of this measure. I want to get that advice, too, especially to the amen corners throughout the country. It will be very interesting reading. The bill continues:

At no time shall less than 51 per cent of the stock of said corporation be held by the United States, unless the United States shall dispose of all of its stock.

Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

That is not the end of it; that is just the beginning; that is just the close of the first section.

SEC. 2. That the United States shall subscribe to 51 per cent of the initial capital stock of such corporation at par and the remainder thereof may be offered for public subscription at not less than par, and the United States may then further subscribe at par for any amount of such stock not taken by public subscription, but the shipping board may cause such corporation to begin business as soon as 51 per cent of such stock has been subscribed and paid for by the United States. The shipping board, with the approval of the President, may consent to or may cause an increase of the capital stock from time to time as the interests of the corporation may require, but without authority of Congress the portion of such increase to be paid for by the United States shall not exceed $10,000,000—

My recollection is that that is a new provision—neither shall the proportion of stock held by the United States at any time be less than 51 per cent: Provided, That a sufficient number of the shares of stock of said corporation shall be set apart for holding by the persons for whom the stock of the United States may be voted as trustees, and such shares shall be issued or transferred to such persons to qualify them as trustees of such corporation, and such shares shall be transferred to the successor or successors of any such person or persons.

SEC. 3. That the United States, through the shipping board and with the approval of the President, is authorized to purchase or construct vessels suitable, in the judgment of the shipping board, for the purposes of such corporation with a view to transferring them to such corporation, and for this purpose the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the request of the shipping board and the approval of the President, may issue and sell or use for such purchases or construction any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury of the United States under the act of August 5, 1909, the act of February 4, 1910, and the act of March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, to a total amount not to exceed $30,000,000, for the purpose of purchasing or constructing such vessels: Provided, That any Panama Canal bonds issued and sold or used under the provisions of this section or other existing authority may be made payable at such time after issue as the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may deem advisable and fix, instead of 50 years after date of issue, as in said act of August 5, 1909, not exceeding 50 years: Provided further, That payments for such purchases or construction from proceeds of sales of bonds, or delivery of bonds in payment thereof, shall be made only as ordered and directed by the shipping board.

I think that is very much like the provision in the other substitute.

SEC. 4. That the shipping board is authorized to transfer the vessels purchased or constructed as herein provided to any such corporation in which the United States has become a stockholder as hereinbefore provided, and such corporation shall issue to the United States in payment thereof its gold bonds, bearing interest at not less than 4 per cent per annum.

I will say that I am surprised right there that our friends on the other side used the word "gold."

Shall issue to the United States in payment thereof its gold bonds.

I did not suppose the Democratic Party had gotten so far over as to expressly declare that the bonds issued should be gold bonds; but it has. It has got apparently clear over to the gold standard, openly avowing it; and not only to the gold standard, but expressly providing that these bonds shall be gold bonds, without saying that they may be paid in legal tender or anything of that sort. I wonder whether there are some people in the country who are more interested really in the issue of bonds than they are in having shipping provided, and I wonder whether some of those persons, who might be not a thousand miles from Washington City, had probably more to do with the framing of this legislation than the shipping interests or those needing shipping facilities; but there is this language, anyway.

And upon such further terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the shipping board, such bonds to be secured by a first-mortgage lien upon such vessels, severally, thus transferred: Provided, That the amount of bonds received by the United States in payment for such vessels shall not be less, at the then par value, than the total amount expended by the United States in the purchase or construction of such vessels, and the same may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, and with the approval of the President, to reimburse the Treasury for expenditures made in the purchase or construction of vessels. Such corporation shall make suitable provision for sinking fund and for the depreciation charges under the rules and regulations to be prescribed by such shipping board; and all vessels acquired under this act, or in which the United States shall otherwise be interested as owner, in whole or in part, or upon which the United States shall have or hold any mortgage, pledge, lien, or other security, shall, when and while employed solely as merchant vessels, be in all respects subject to all laws, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels, in like manner and to the same extent as merchant vessels in private ownership when duly registered under the laws of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I come to one of the strangest provisions in the bill and one of the most amazing provisions to me that there is in it. I wonder where it came from; I wonder who suggested it; and I wonder whether the framers of the bill know what it means, what its effect will be, and what it will do. This provision reads as follows:

All rules and regulations relating to or which affect shipping, navigation, or water-borne commerce of the United States, heretofore made or published, by authority of law, shall only be and remain in force until midnight on the 31st day of December, 1915, and by proclamation of the President shall cease to have any force or validity at any prior date when new shipping rules and regulations shall as provided hereby take the place of those now in existence.

Mr. President, I say in all sincerity and frankness that I do not believe the members of the Commerce Committee know what they have done in that provision. Where did it come from? It was never suggested on this floor; at least I never heard it suggested. It came out of the bowels of the secret caucus. Who suggested it there? Where did that suggestion come from? What does it mean? I invite the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to that proposition. Notice what it does. It says:

All rules and regulations relating to or which affect shipping, navigation, or water-borne commerce of the United States.

It is expressed in the broadest possible language, not only as to the rules and regulations, but as to what they affect. If they are issued by authority of law, if they in any way affect commerce or relate to water-borne commerce of the United States they are repealed; they are done away with; they are annulled. Why is that? What is the need for that? Why should that be done? Why is it that in order to start this Government line every rule and regulation affecting the commerce of this country anywhere, on streams no matter how small, on lakes no matter how great, or where they may be, should be repealed?

Mr. President, what are the rules and regulations affecting the commerce of the United States? What is it that we are going to have to consider in connection with that section? What is it that we are going to have to read to see what they have done? You see this pile of books [exhibiting]; you see this pile of documents [exhibiting]. Those are the rules and regulations issued and made by authority of law affecting the water-borne commerce of the United States. I do not know whether that is all of them or not. It is, however, all that I have been able to gather together. The navigation laws are in this volume [exhibiting]. These are the rules and regulations that it is proposed to repeal. Is there any member of the committee who knows what he is doing or what the effect of the bill will be upon the rules and regulations? Is there any member of the committee who knows what the authority and what the provisions of law are under which these rules and regulations have been issued?

I feel that a proper consideration of this bill and of this provision in this substitute requires that these shall be read. How can we know what we are doing if we do not examine them, if we do not read them?

Mr. President, this provision came from the secret caucus. Somebody has some purpose to serve by the repeal of all these rules and regulations. I know that no member of the committee has any purpose to serve except the public good. This suggestion came from somebody in whom they had confidence. Who was it? Was it some insidious lobbyist, working quietly, as they can work through a secret caucus? Who was it that suggested in this last substitute that all these rules and regulations should be repealed? I shall refer to this before long.

Further:

The shipping board herein provided for shall propose such rules and regulations applicable to the shipping—

Not of this corporation, not of this Government-owned institution, but—

The shipping board herein provided for shall propose such rules and regulations applicable to the shipping and water-borne commerce of the United States—

All of it everywhere, on the lakes of Vermont if there are any that are navigable; on the rivers of the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I am very sorry, Mr. President, but I can not yield to the Senator.

Mr. PAGE. Not for a question?

Mr. JONES. No; not for a question. I should like very much to do so, but I feel that I must hurry along.

The provision continues:

In lieu of those now in force and covering matters of like character as they may determine suited to the present needs of such shipping and commerce, which, when approved by the President and published, shall apply and become of full force and effect in lieu of such rules and regulations as are now applicable thereto. In the rules and regulations hereby authorized to be adopted and put into force—

Notice what leeway is given to this board, with reference to the other commerce of the United States—different classes of shipping, navigation, and water-borne commerce may be appropriately and differently treated and provided for. Such rules and regulations when promulgated may be modified, changed, or amended by the shipping board.

Now, Mr. President, not only does that first provision provide for the repeal of every rule and regulation issued or promulgated by authority of law affecting every kind of water-borne commerce of the United States, but it places in the hands of the shipping board, that is supposed to handle and operate these Government ships, all of the water-borne commerce of the United States. It allows the shipping board to make any and all kinds of rules and regulations for the Government of the water-borne commerce of the United States everywhere and anywhere, and expressly gives to that board authority to fix rules at one place different from rules at another. It gives it express authority to fix certain rules for one class of vessels and authority to fix other rules for another class of vessels; in fact, it expressly gives it authority to do anything that it wants to do with reference to the water-borne commerce of the United States. I can not believe that the committee really appreciated what it was doing, and I hope that at some time during the discussion on this bill some friend of the bill will tell where this suggestion came from and why it was put in here, why it is necessary to undo and uproot all that has been done under the law for many, many years with reference to the water-borne commerce of this country.

Then I want them to explain why it is that they must give this board the authority to differentiate between different vessels, possibly in the same locality. Is it possible that they want to place in the hands of this board a power under which one concern can secure the adoption and promulgation of rules and regulations that will put a competitor out of business? Not that this board would do this deliberately and purposely; but this board can not investigate for itself and acquaint itself personally with all these various conditions. This board will have to take the reports of other people and other officers.

Mr. President, how are they going to do that? How are they going to investigate all these different conditions? Are you going to provide for a lot more officials? That is what you are going to have to do if you do not provide here that the officials who have already recommended these rules shall report to this shipping board and recommend what shall be the rules. No; you provide that this shipping board itself shall promulgate these rules.

How is it going to get the information? Is this shipping board going to take a junketing trip all around over the country to examine these different localities, and find out wherein the rules that we have now should be changed? Are they going to go at the Government expense? Why, we remember that when the banking act was passed we had a great trip around over the country to ascertain where the different banks should be located I do not think there was anything improper about that, but do you expect anything of that kind here? Are you going to appropriate a lot of money for this shipping board to go around and get the information that it must have before it acts upon these matters? How is this shipping board going to act unless it does that? You do not say so, but are you going to repeal the different laws under which these rules and regulations are enacted? These rules and regulations are enacted, in a great many cases, by authorities entirely different from those mentioned in this act. There are some rules and regulations in here that are provided by the Secretary of War and placed under the Chief of Engineers of the Army. Are you going to take away his authority? Are you going to deprive him of all jurisdiction with reference to navigable streams? That is what they do. That is what you do by this provision, because the law provides, as I shall point out later on, how these rules and regulations shall be prescribed. Where did those provisions come from? Who suggested them, and in whose interest are they proposed? Why is it that we must put all the commerce of the country under a shipping board, when we started out with the idea that it was to handle just certain ships?

SEC. 5. That vessels purchased or constructed by such shipping board and conveyed to such corporation as herein provided shall be entitled to registry under the laws of the United States, and shall be deemed vessels of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels, except such vessels shall engage only in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands, the Hawaiian Islands, and the islands of Porto Rico, Guam, and Tutuila, provided that the above restrictions shall not apply to such of said vessels as are built in the United States.

I think that is a different provision from what was in the other bill, but I am not certain.

Such vessels shall be subject to the navigation laws of the United States except as herein provided.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce, and three additional members, two of whom shall be of practical experience in the management and operation of steamships in the foreign trade, are hereby constituted a board to be known as the shipping board, with full power, subject to the approval of the President, to vote the stock of the United States in said corporation, either as a body or by one or more of its members duly authorized by a majority, and to do all things necessary, whether specifically enumerated or not, to carry out the purposes of this act and protect the interests of the United States, said three additional members to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The salary of each of the three additional members of said board so appointed shall be $6,000 per annum.

Mr. President, that is a very material difference from any of these other bills and substitutes. All these other bills provided for a board of three Cabinet officers. This provision provides for a board of two Cabinet officers and three additional members to be appointed by the President. I know that something of that kind was suggested in the discussion on this side of the Chamber. It must have appealed somewhat to our friends on the other side, so they took the suggestion in their secret caucus, and they worked it out in this way. So far as I am concerned I do not see very much improvement in it. It is nothing in the world but a partisan board after all. These three members are appointed by the President. They will no doubt be of his political party. It does not make any difference who the President is.

I am not referring to the present Chief Executive at all, because the chances are, if this bill is passed, they will not be appointed before his term is out. That is the only hope I have, really, with reference to this bill—that if it is passed the President will take so long in selecting the members of the board and organizing it and getting it into operation that it will not amount to anything, so far as the war is concerned. If he takes as much time with reference to appointing the members of this board as he did with reference to the banking board and with reference to the Trade Commission, whose members have not been appointed yet, possibly he will not get this board appointed at all, and will not get it organized; but if he does, it will be a partisan board.

Why did they leave the Postmaster General out of this? Of course, as I suggested a while ago, I think they ought to leave all Cabinet officers out. The Secretary of the Treasury has lots to do now—more to do than he can attend to. The great trouble with our departments is that the heads of departments have to depend too much upon subordinates. They can not investigate matters that come before them. They can not even dictate the general policies of the department, because they can not get information along the various lines and avenues that the departments act; and so they have to take the judgment and the opinion of somebody else.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this shipping board ought to be made up very much like the Interstate Commerce Commission is made up. It ought not to change with every political party. What is the matter with the Interior Department of this country to-day? The trouble with it is that the head of it changes with every political change, and sometimes oftener. We have one policy to-day and another policy to-morrow. Why should this shipping board be put on that basis? Why should we have a board one year in favor of Government operation as well as Government ownership, and perhaps the next year a board opposed to Government operation, even though it might be in favor of Government ownership? We will find this shifting, vacillating, changing policy that is bound to bring failure to it.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], I think, has offered an amendment to this bill taking the Cabinet officers out of this board. That amendment ought to have been adopted in full. I do not understand why the caucus did not do it. I suggest that the caucus get together again and consider that phase of the bill. If the caucus could get together and make a few changes in this bill, it would get lots of support from this side of the Chamber as well as from that side. If, as a matter of fact, instead of the caucus doing this they would come out in the Senate, and every Senator would free himself from dictation from somewhere else and consider this bill in its relation to the United States, consider the interests of the United States and the people of the United States, and vote his real convictions and his real judgment, we would soon inaugurate a policy that would provide a merchant marine for this country, that would keep us free from all danger of becoming involved in this strife, and put it upon a basis so that when that strife does cease we will be ready and prepared to compete with the nations of the earth and develop the trade of this country as it ought to be developed.

If nothing can be done with this bill except what is approved by a secret caucus and by secret arrangements in order simply to secure enough votes to pass this bill, of course a bare majority, if it can get the bill to a vote, will do whatever it has agreed upon, regardless of the discussion and regardless of the suggestions that may be made here. We have had some very peculiar actions with reference to this measure when it was found that the caucus proposition could not command a majority on this floor, even with the caucus rule. Then negotiations took place between the majority, or the supposed majority, and some of our friends on this side, and they were perfectly willing to meet some suggestions that they made over here, and had made from the beginning, but which the majority were not willing to accept until they got into a position where they did not have the votes.

Why, they talk about stifling the will of the majority, about throttling the will of the majority, about thwarting the will of the majority. We are not stifling the will of the majority; we are not thwarting the will of the majority. You have not a voluntary majority on that side—not at all. You have been driven to the position you have taken. You have been driven, day after day and week after week, to the provisions of the bill that you finally presentetd to the Senate. You have not a majority for this substitute that I am just reading. You have not a majority of the Senate for the substitute that was presented here on January 26, and you know it. You could not pass that substitute. You have not the votes to do it. Here we were on the 26th of January, with two-thirds of the session gone, with not a single appropriation bill in conference except the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with not a single other appropriation bill passed by the Senate. That is the legislative situation that our Democratic friends have gotten into—absolute legislative chaos existing here because of the absolute incapacity of the Democratic majority to legislate and transact business. You found yourselves without a majority in favor of the substitute that you reported on the 26th of January; and what have you been doing the last week? You have been filibustering to prevent a vote on it. You have been filibustering to prevent a vote to recommit it to your committee, bringing Senators clear across the continent in order to get them here to have votes—what for? For this substitute? No; not for this substitute. You might bring all your Senators across the continent, you might bring all your Senators from the sick beds of their families, and you would not have enough votes for this substitute. I want the Amen Corners throughout the country to know that—that while you have been denouncing us as throttling the will of the majority you have not had a proposition before the Senate that would command the votes of the majority of this body, but that as a matter of fact the majority was against it even with the caucus dictation and even with the dictation that comes from the White House.

So, what have you been doing the last week? Yon have been getting your Senators here from across the continent, and you have been trying to frame up something else that would command the requisite votes. First, according to the newspapers, you appointed a committee to try to bring back some of your Senators on that side who protested against this substitute, who declared they would not vote for it, who would not abide by your caucus dictation. You have been trying to get them back. You could not do it. You could not get any of them to abandon their convictions and their honest judgment; so, anything to pass the bill; anything to get it through in any shape, just as near what you have been trying to get as you possibly can, in order to get enough votes to do it. So, knowing some of the objections that some of the Senators on this side make to the bill on certain particular points, you are trying to meet their objections, and you have practically abandoned the substitute. If you had followed your usual course that you have followed heretofore, you would have called another caucus, and you would have adopted a new substitute and brought it in here as a new proposition, and I expect now you wish you had done it. You have made another mistake. You have brought in here a proposition that involves three or four propositions—propositions that ought to be discussed, propositions that will be discussed, propositions that the country must be made acquainted with. You probably wish you had gone to caucus and brought out another substitute and presented that to the Senate; but instead of that, with a motion pending before the Senate to recommit this substitute to the Committee on Commerce that you know has a majority in its favor, you have prepared some amendments that you propose to put into this bill. How? Not by having them go to the committee and letting the committee consider them; not by having them considered, really, on the floor of the Senate; but you have consulted among yourselves and with some of our Senators over here, and you have gotten up some proposition that seems to be reasonably satisfactory to them, and so you bring in an amendment to the motion to recommit.

You say we will agree to the motion to recommit, but we want instructions to the committee. You are not willing to trust the committee. You are not willing to let the committee consider the propositions that you have framed up. You are not willing to have those propositions referred to the committee and let the committee act on them, not by reason, not by good judgment, but simply by force of numbers you propose to recommit with instructions to the committee. That deprives the committee of all discretion, it deprives the committee of all power and does not make the committee a free agent of the Senate at all. It does not leave the committee even the agent of the majority of the committee; it does not leave it even the agent of the majority of the majority of the committee; but you say to the committee, "You must report this bill forthwith with certain amendments which we have agreed upon, which we are not willing for you to consider, which we are not willing for you to pass judgment on, but which by force of numbers we have finally gotten together, and we are going to adopt them in the Senate, and we direct you to send them back here."

We do not know what they are. They have not been printed. It is another edition of this substitute.

Mr. President, it may be said, why not direct the committee to do that; it is simply the servant of the Senate. Yes; that is true; it is. What do you want to direct them to do it for if you are not going to allow them to consider matters which you send to them? What is the use of recommiting this bill and sending it to the committee? What have you the committee for? Of course, it is a servant; but you have got it for a purpose. We know that we can not all investigate these matters. There are other committees which have other duties to perform. We have these committees as the servants of the Senate, in order that they may give special consideration and special attention to the various matters that come within their jurisdiction.

It is a farce to send this bill back to the committee and tell it that it has to send it right back here with certain amendments which you have decreed yourselves. Of course, it is the servant of the Senate, and it will have to do what the Senate directs.

SEC. 7. That, with the approval of the Congress, such shipping board may at any time sell the stock of such corporation owned by the United States.

SEC. 8. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to charter, lease, or transfer such naval auxiliaries now belonging to the Naval Establishment of the United States as are suitable for commercial use and which are not required for use in the Navy in time of peace, and vessels belonging to the War Department suitable for commercial uses and not required for military transports in time of peace, and to direct or cause to be chartered, leased, or transferred vessels now owned and operated by the Panama Railroad Co., to any corporation now or hereafter organized as in this act provided, upon such terms and conditions as the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall prescribe. The vessels purchased or constructed by the United States through the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall be of a type, as far as the commercial requirements of the foreign trade of the United States may permit, suitable for use as naval auxiliaries in the Naval Establishment of the United States.

I think that provision is substantially the same as in the other bill.

SEC. 9. That the President of the United States, upon giving to any such corporation in which the United States shall be a stockholder, through its president, vice president, secretary, or manager, notice in writing for such reasonable length of time as in his judgment the circumstances require and will permit of his intention so to do, may take possession, absolutely or temporarily, for use as naval auxiliaries, of any vessel or vessels owned or leased by or otherwise in the possession of said corporation, and said corporation shall be entitled to a reasonable price or rental therefor, to be fixed by the shipping board, with the approval of the President: Provided, That if, in the judgment of the President, an emergency exists requiring such action he may take possession of any such vessel or vessels without notice.

SEC. 10. That the shipping board shall make to Congress, at the beginning each regular session, a report of expenditures and receipts under this act and of the operations of any corporation in which the United States may have become a stockholder hereunder.

It seems that provision is no different from the last. Probably it is a little different.

SEC. 11. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000, or, in lieu of such appropriation, the Secretary of the Treasury may sell Panama Canal bonds to the amount of $10,000,000 in addition to those provided for in section 3, and on the same terms, and set apart and use the proceeds thereof for such purposes.

My recollection is that the last provision with reference to getting the $10,000,000 through the sale of Panama bonds is new and different from that in the other bills.

Mr. President, that is the last substitute presented from the committee, but it is not the last proposition from the committee. On February 3d or 4th, there are two dates here, a bill was introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], a shipping bill, with the same title as is found in these other bills, and providing for about the same things as the last substitute. I do not think I shall take the time to read it. It has a provision in it somewhere that, I understand, meets the objections made by some of the Members on this side, and to a certain extent these provisions are incorporated in the motion, as I understand it, that the Senator from Florida presented to-day.

Here is a provision in this bill that is different from these other substitutes, but I do not know whether it is the same as that presented in the motion to amend the motion to recommit or not. However, I shall read it:

And provided further, That said corporation shall make no charter or lease of any vessel to any corporation, firm, or individual for a longer period than 12 months, and said corporation shall specify in the charter or lease the rates, charges, and fares to be observed by such corporation, firm, or individual chartering or leasing any such vessel or vessels as a maximum to be charged during the life of such charter or lease, and there shall be contained in said charter or lease a provision terminating the same whenever the charterer or the lessee shall violate any of its provisions. It is hereby made the duty of such corporation to take such steps as may be necessary to terminate any such charter or lease whenever the corporation, firm, or individual, party to such charter or lease, shall violate the provisions of the same.

Mr. President, as I said, I do not know whether the provision I have just read is exactly the same as the provision placed in the motion to recommit or not. It is intended to limit the power of this board with reference to leasing these boats, and as far as it goes I am rather inclined to favor it. It prohibits the lease for more than a year at a time. But that is very easily gotten around. These leases may provide for renewals, and there will be renewals, no doubt, from time to time indefinitely. But the really important provision or attempted provision is on page 6, beginning at line 15, which provides—

That in making purchases of ships during the continuance of the present European war no purchases shall be made in a way which will disturb the conditions of neutrality.

Mr. President, that proposition involves the proposition upon which my opposition to this bill is most strongly grounded. The bill came here at the start, apparently with the sole purpose of acquiring interned ships. As a matter of fact, everybody knows that the only ships that can be purchased at reasonable rates under this bill are ships that are now idle in ports of the United States, because they are afraid to go out from those ports, because they know if they do go out they will be captured or destroyed. So apparently the bill was introduced with the idea that the Government would acquire those ships. That was the only way the shipping facilities could be added to or increased.

Prior to this war these ships were engaged in commerce. When the war came on they were driven out of commerce, and they were the only ships practically that were driven out of commerce. Other ships were destroyed; some ships were sunk; of course, they are gone. We can not get them back, even if we pass this bill. They can be replaced only by new ships. These ships interned in the ports of this country were the only ones that were available under this or any legislation we might pass.

So the bill has been presented in the first place, and has been urged with apparently the avowed purpose of acquiring these ships and putting them in the foreign trade of the United States.

Mr. President, when the question was raised by the Government to acquire these ships and put them into commerce, which would involve us in trouble with some of the belligerent nations, the friends of the administration and some of the members of the official family and Senators on this floor at once came to the rescue with the legal argument that it would be no violation of neutrality to acquire these ships and operate them by the National Government. On this side some great Senators urged that it would be dangerous, that it was likely to involve us in war, that in the purchase of these ships we would purchase a quarrel and get into trouble. It was said that these Senators were afraid, that they were timid. Our friends on the other side were not afraid, they were not timid. They at once came with legal arguments and profound deductions and earnest statements to combat the legal proposition advanced on this side of the Chamber, arguing that we had the legal right to acquire these ships and operate them.

Mr. President, I do not care very much about the legal propositions. I have my ideas with reference to them, but it seems to me it ought to cause us to hesitate when we find that men of equal ability, of equal sincerity, of equal patriotism, differ with reference to the wisdom or the unwisdom of this course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington will suspend for a moment. The Chair lays before the Senate a report of the Sergeant at Arms.

CHARLES P. HIGGINS,
Sergeant at Arms, United States Senate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I was proceeding to say, when we find such a radical difference among men of such profound knowledge and sincere patriotism, it seems to me that very fact of itself ought to make us hesitate. It ought to make us seek a safe course, because we can not afford to take any chances on getting involved in this struggle.

No, Mr. President; we can well afford to waive some strict rights. We can well afford—and I say it deliberately—to even wink at some violations of our rights in order to keep our citizens out of this strife.

We see some newspapers, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] said one day, not a thousand miles from here, that seem to want to get this country into this strife. They seem to have been trying to arouse the passions of our people. They seem to be trying to incite our people. They seem to want the war to come for some reason. I do not know why.

Those same papers were urging us several months ago to march our armies into Mexico. Why? For what purpose? To protect some big landed proprietors down there. The Senator from Mississippi is not in favor of anything of that kind and is glad that we did not do it. I hope he will stand against any possible proposition here of involving us in this struggle. Let us not take any chances. We can not afford to do it. We, as the representatives of the people of this country, can not afford to take any chance on their behalf. They are going to suffer; they are going to have to fight, if there is any fighting done; they are going to have to die, if there is any dying done; they are going to have to furnish the boys to feed the cannon; they are going to have the broken hearts and the destroyed homes and suffer the horrors of war if it comes.

Mr. President, we, as their representatives, can not afford to take any chances; and we are doing it with every Government ship that heads its way toward those belligerent waters. If I have a ship, if I operate it, I can fly the American flag; I can take some chances. But if I take the chances, if I run the risks, and if I get caught, the American people are not responsible. I must suffer the loss, as I ought to do; my vessel is confiscated, as it ought to be; and if the prize court determines that I have violated the law, then the people of this country have no cause of complaint, and they will not complain; they will not even take a stand about it.

If we had very many of those cases we would probably have a sentiment worked up in this country by and by that even where vessels flying our flag were properly taken there would be a great uproar that might lead us into war; but suppose the United States Government sends one of its own ships toward those ports and it is boarded by a foreign power, it would not take very many such instances as that to inflame the people of this country from one end of it to the other. If one of these ships owned by the Government was started from New Orleans to Bremen, and was stopped by a British cruiser, and boarded by a British officer, you would find some of the newspapers in this country with headlines occupying a whole page, crying out to the people to resent it; and they would do so.

Mr. President, it means more to board a ship owned by the United States as well as flying our flag than it does to board my ship flying the American flag. You may talk all you please about the legality of this and the legality of that in war, but war is war, and rules and regulations and laws and practices of peace fade away like the mist before the rising sun, when nations grapple in deadly conflict.

If a couple of families are engaged in strife I may have a right to be around, I may have a right to be close to them; my land may come up close to theirs; I may have a right to come up and hang around; but, if I do, I am very likely to get into the trouble; I am very likely to get mixed up in it even in insisting upon my legal rights. I had better stay away until they get through their strife.

Oh, Mr. President, when there is such a terrific maelstrom of passion, hate, bloodshed, crime, and pillage as is going on now in Europe, it seems to me that it is almost criminal for us to invite in the least degree any attacks from any of those enraged and infuriated peoples and nations. Why are we asked to take this risk? Because somebody is asked to pay a little more freight than usual for the transportation of his products. Oh, is it possible that the United States Senate can risk placing over against the lives and the happiness and the peace of our people a few paltry dollars, a few cheaper transported cargoes?

Why, Mr. President, it is inconceivable to me, and I know that those who do not agree with me are just as sincere as I am, and just as desirous that this country shall be at peace as I am, and just as desirous that we should keep out of this trouble as I am. It seems to me that we are awfully reckless; it seems to me that it is possible we have gotten into a position where we do not just like to give up. We are all that way, more or less. We like to have our own way; and if we get started along a certain line to accomplish a certain purpose, if we have met with considerable opposition, we get a little stubborn and we want to carry out our purposes. While away down in our hearts we may know that we are not doing just exactly the right thing, we hate to give up; we hate to acknowledge that we are wrong; and we press on for the goal that we know we ought not to reach; and I sometimes think we have gotten into that position with reference to this legislation. Our friends on the other side have been pressing it; they have some pride in it, and they want to get it through; they want to pass it. They do not really think we are going to get into any trouble; they hope we will not get into any trouble, but they seem to be willing to take the chance.

I saw in the paper the other day that one of the honored leaders on this floor on the other side said that if some of our ships were sunk or fired at there would be shooting back. I expect that is true; but let us keep our ships away from that place. We do not want to get to shooting back. We may have a right to go there, but let us not do it. We ought not to do it. We can not afford to do it. We are trustees of the people, who have got to bear the brunt; and if we get into war we do not expect to do much of the fighting; we can not do much of it. We might be willing to go, but we ought not to take any chances until we are willing to go.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is a man of peace. I have heard him denouncing war in language far more vivid and eloquent than any I can use; I have heard him pleading for peace, and I have thought from what I have heard him say that he would go almost to any length to have peace, and yet I have heard him admit that human nature and the conditions and feelings of the people were such that they were not ready and willing to go as far as he would go, and so in his philosophical way he has said that we must take conditions as we find them. While he would not approve of the code duello, yet back in the time when it was in operation, if his honor were attacked, of course he would resent it; but he hoped the time would come when things would not be settled in that way, and he is glad it has come now. He wishes the time would come when the disputes between nations would not be settled by war, and he hopes that time will come soon. I hope so, too, but it has not come; but we can keep out of it if we are careful, and there is no reason to justify us in putting ourselves in a position where we might be involved in the trouble.

Mr. President, this is a serious matter with me. It is the only proposition in this bill because of which I would feel justified, as I have said before, in using every power to defeat it; but I do feel that I am justified in doing that. There are others on this side who feel very much as I do.

The committee has presented a proposition in the amendment to the motion to recommit trying to meet that situation. They are not doing it voluntarily; they are not doing it willingly; they are not doing it cheerfully; but they are doing it simply because they have to do it to get the votes to put their bill through, if they can get it to a vote. That is all they are doing it for.

Have you framed up a provision that meets the situation, that saves us from the danger that we fear? What provision have you got? I do not know; I have not seen your motion; you have not had it printed. You presented it this afternoon and you insisted that we should proceed to consider it before it was printed and laid on our desks so that we could examine it. I do not know what it contains; I do not know whether it has this proposition or not, but here is what is in the Gore bill, which was offered the other day:

And provided further, That in making purchases of ships during the continuance of the present European war no purchases shall be made in a way which will disturb the conditions of neutrality.

Mr. President, that does not mean a bit more than the bill means now without it, because you have contended from the beginning that you would not do anything that would violate the conditions of neutrality. Nobody expects the administration to deliberately do something to violate or disturb the conditions of neutrality; I do not think your President would do that willingly; I do not think the shipping board would do anything of that kind willingly. The trouble is that the President and the shipping board can not do all the things that are to be done under this bill; they will have to depend upon somebody else; they will have to depend upon subordinates; they will have to act on their judgment. They are subject to influence—and when I say "influence" I do not mean corrupt influence; I mean that they will have the proposition presented to them from one side and from those who know their side.

The Senator from Mississippi knows from experience here in the Senate how men can come before a committee representing one side and make it look all right. You can see no flaw in their argument, no flaw in their reasoning; but somebody else versed in the business, knowing all the conditions and facts regarding it, comes before you, and, like a flash, points out the weaknesses in the previous argument. But these men will not have anybody to present the other side; they will have one side presented to them, and on that side they will act and prepare their recommendations, which will be signed by the President in a formal sort of way. So the matter will go through, and something may be done that develops into an unneutral act. Suppose the shipping board gets some ships in a perfectly proper way, without violating neutrality, and starts them across the ocean. A ship may have a captain who is not under the control of the board when he gets out on the sea. You do not know then what he will do; he will take risks and chances. It will not make any special difference to him that he is running a Government ship any more than if he were running my ship. He will take chances against a belligerent submarine or a belligerent cruiser or a belligerent regulation, or something of that sort; and, like a flash from a clear sky, we may be involved in trouble. What good would that provision do? That provision amounts to nothing. Who is it who is to determine whether our acts are disturbing neutrality or not? Well, our people will determine what they will do. Belligerent nations will determine very largely what they will do; they will determine whether our acts are considered by them as unneutral, but you let them take a Government vessel and carry it to a prize court, and the people of this country would rise in indignation against it.

No, Mr. President; this provision amounts to nothing. What you want to do, if you are going to do anything, if Congress has any policies that Congress wants to put into effect, is to declare it. Let us say, "You shall not do so and so."

Why, Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] has offered an amendment to this bill that I should like to see in it, and if you will adopt it my speaking will stop, even though there are other provisions in the bill that I do not like. I will take a short time to tell you why I might not vote for the bill, and then, so far as I am concerned, let you come to a vote. I want to read his amendment, if I can find it. I have here all the amendments proposed to this bill. A good many of them were laid on the table Friday night when you were ordered to pass this bill. They will all be subject to be offered to this measure again. I do not know whether you will lay them on the table or not again. You did not have a very satisfactory experience before. I will read it, Mr. President. This is proposed as an amendment by Senator POINDEXTER:

Add as a new section the following:
"SEC. 12. That no ship shall be purchased under the authority of this act from a belligerent nation"—

Now, that is plain. That is simple. That is direct. That is a legislative declaration of policy which no Executive can violate or will violate, and it does not impose any burden upon the Executive. It leaves him an Executive pure and simple.

That no ship shall be purchased under the authority of this act from a belligerent nation nor the citizens thereof.

That is clear and definite.

And no ship shall be operated by the United States, nor the shipping board, nor the corporation provided for herein, nor any lessee thereof, under the authority conferred by this act, to or from any port of a belligerent nation; nor to or from any European port during the continuance of the present war in Europe.

Mr. President, that will keep us free from any trouble. It will keep us free from any danger. It will save us from any risk. It will protect the interests of the American people clearly and completely. It does not leave any discretion in the Executive that may be exercised and abused by some subordinate officer—none at all. Place beside it this senseless, meaningless provision:

That in making purchases of ships during the continuance of the present European war, no purchases shall be made in a way which will disturb the conditions of neutrality.

Why, that does not mean anything. That lets the Executive do anything. It leaves entirely to his judgment what shall be done. The people of the United States take all the risk. Why? For a few paltry dollars, a few cheaper freight rates which you hope for, but which only a few favored ones will ever get.

Mr. President, those are the only two changes that I know of that the Gore bill proposes over this substitute that was brought in here on the 26th day of January. Why, that is only a little over a week ago, and yet they say we have been delaying this bill; and yet you did not bring out here the bill that you expect us to vote on until the 26th day of January. You did not bring out the bill that you expect us to vote on until the 8th day of February, 1915, with the end of the session only three weeks off, not a single appropriation bill enacted into law, only one appropriation bill passed through the Senate, the Democratic Party in full control of Congress, crying "Economy, economy, economy," practicing extravagance, extravagance, extravagance, appropriations piling upon appropriations, deficits piling upon deficits, special taxes piled upon special taxes.

Oh, the promises you made to the people! How you are keeping them! You told the people that you would relieve them from the burdens and the oppressions of Republican laws, and you passed legislation that necessitated additional and greater burdens. What have you been doing ever since you got in? You have been talking and crying for emergency measures, emergency measures! You began just as soon as you passed your tariff law. You passed your tariff law pursuant to your promise. You told the people that you would relieve their burdens of taxation, that you would lower the cost of living, that you would make greater the prosperity of the country. Ever since you passed that law you have been crying for emergency measures, and my dear friend from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] has been appealing to us in fervid tones month after month: "Pass an emergency measure, and bring relief and prosperity and happiness to suffering people." We pass this emergency measure, and things get worse, and they come in with another measure, and they say: "Pass this emergency measure, and that will bring you prosperity and happiness"; and we pass it, and things get worse and worse and worse. After you had passed the tariff law, and things did not come as you thought they ought to, then you said: "We must stay in session, and we must pass a currency law." I think the President said: "We have made you half free by the passage of the tariff law; now, then, we must make you wholly free by passing a currency law." We worked and we toiled and we strove about that, and we finally got a bill through. It was an emergency measure. We provided for a Federal Reserve Board. Everybody knew, for a long time before the bill was passed, that it would provide for a Federal Reserve Board, and yet what was done? Were the appointments made promptly? No. Months passed—months passed, with no Federal Reserve Board appointments. Why? What was the matter? Well, it looked to me as if they were afraid to put their system into effect, and when the stress came we had to depend upon the old, denounced Republican emergency measure for stability and strength and relief in our financial system.

After 6, 8, or 10 months the board was appointed. Names came in here. Some of them were not satisfactory. Some of them were opposed, and our friends said, "Oh, let us pass them. Let us hurry them through now. We must confirm them promptly and quickly." They wanted us to rush them right through. The Executive took all the time he wanted to appoint, but the Senate must hurry the confirmation. The Senate, however, showed a little independence. Some of the majority objected to some of the men whose names went in, and some of them had to be withdrawn and others were appointed. Finally we got the board, and finally we got the system established, but the prosperity did not come. Still we had trouble. The deficit was growing. The revenues were falling off, appropriations were piling up, and then what? Well, we must have an emergency tax. You relieved the people, as you said, of burdens at one end and piled on taxes at the other. No lowered cost of living, higher taxes, more imposition, greater burdens, vexatious investigations, and all that sort of thing. No wonder the conditions of the people got worse. No wonder their condition became worse; and then you said we must have what? "We must have a Trade Commission law. That will bring prosperity. That is an emergency measure that we need. That will tell business 'where it is at.' That will tell business what it wants, what course to take. That will bring them out of this slough of despondency and uncertainty and trouble in which they are now." We worked on that bill until we finally got it through. It provided for a commission. No appointments have been made yet. Months have gone by, nobody has been appointed. What is the matter? Are you afraid to put it in operation? Are you afraid to put it into effect? Why do you not get the appointments made?

Oh, some of these days, along about the close of the session, these appointments will come in, and we will be told to put them right through. "Do not investigate. Do not look into them. The President has appointed them. Confirm them at once." Do you suppose we will do it? Oh, I expect so. That is not the way to do, however.

I hope the President will get good men. I have not any doubt that he is trying to get good men, but the longer he takes very likely the poorer men he is going to get. If there is any body of men that we ought to look into carefully as to their ability and their experience and their capacity, it is the members of this great commission. We ought not to be hurried about their confirmation, either. If they are held off until the close of the session before they come in here and we do not have time to investigate them, they ought not to be confirmed. What are you going to do? Suppose they come in here in a week or so; are you going to drop this bill in time to have them confirmed? Are you going to keep this bill before the Senate and preclude the consideration of all other legislation, all other bills, and the confirmation of these important officers if their appointments should come in? You are going to be confronted with that possibility before long.

Then you called for the Clayton bill, and you said that was an emergency measure. You said that was needed to set business free, to take the shackles off of business, to mark out the course it should follow, to make it free. We passed it. There does not seem to be very much activity under it. Nothing seems to be done. No results have followed—no prosperity. It is not worth the paper it is written on.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THORNTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. JONES. I am very sorry, but I can not yield, Mr. President.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I wanted to ask whether the Senator believes it was unwise legislation, even though no results have come?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator has not done me the honor to be present all the time I have been speaking.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. No; but I have for the greater part of the time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You get them on that every time.

Mr. JONES. Yes; I have "got them on that," as the Senator from Mississippi says. I explained my position with reference to these measures. I have supported the majority of the measures of this administration.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I know that; I realize that.

Mr. JONES. I have not acted as a partisan on these measures at all.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. No; I am willing to admit that.

Mr. JONES. I supported the Clayton bill as it passed the Senate, but when it came back here in a conference report, with the things that were done to it I could not support it here then. I could not vote for it, and I did not. I did not think it was a wise measure then. I agreed with some of the friends on that side. I think I agreed with the Senator from New Jersey in reference to that measure.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I know that.

Mr. JONES. And I doubt if that measure does us any special good, but it was hailed as an emergency measure. I hope it will bring good results. We have not seen any yet. Then the war came on. Of course, that caused trouble. Of course, that disturbed business. Of course, it disturbed almost everything. We must expect things of that kind, and you can not remedy those things by legislation.

Why, Mr. President, as I said some time ago, I voted for the measure that was proposed here to help out the cotton people in the South. I voted for that measure, not as a general principle but because of its applicability to the special conditions that existed in that country, and because of the very large number of our people that seemed to be very injuriously affected. It seemed to me from the stories that were brought here by the people from that section, that if the Government could not do anything to help them, it was a very impotent Government. So I was one of the few—I think there were only one or two on this side—who voted for that measure. It did not pass. The emergency has not entirely passed away, but the conditions are getting much better. They are probably getting better just about as rapidly as they would if we had passed that legislation. I do not know. I hoped it would help out, but we did not get it. However, things are getting better, and I rejoice.

I notice that they have worked up a loan pool, I think, of about $135,000,000 to help our friends down South, and I saw a statement the other day that only $12,000 had been applied for. They have not all got in a good condition, but they are getting better.

Then there was another emergency measure. We must have ships, no matter when they were built, and bring them under the American flag, so as to furnish adequate transportation, largely for what? Largely for the southern country. I tried to get something for the Pacific coast. The great lumber industry out there was prostrated, and I wanted to get some ships to carry lumber through the Panama Canal and get into the Atlantic market. I wanted to get into our home markets with our home products. They would not give them to me; they would not do it. But we had a measure for our southern friends. I do not know whether it has helped very much or not. I do not know just how many ships, but I think 50 or 60 ships have been brought under American registry under that special act. But what kind of ships are they? They are largely old tubs; some of them 30 or 40 years old.

I know this, that when I was on the Merchant Marine Committee in the House several years ago, the testimony was uniform that the life of one of these ships is only about 20 years, and that the underwriters would write it off at the end of 20 years. We know that our battleships last about 10 years. Yet we admitted under that law without inspection, with foreign crews and foreign officers, 50 or 60 old ships, some of them 34 years old of 3,000 tons. They did not amount to much. Several of them belonged to some big corporations that in times of peace would not sail under the American flag, because they would have to pay too high wages and have to use American officers. So they went under foreign flags to get cheaper crews and cheaper officers, and then when danger came, like cowards, they came to the flag for protection, and they got us to admit them. They got us to let them come in with their foreign crews and foreign officers. They have come in with their foreign officers for seven long years, with thousands of our own men idle, men competent to fill these places, yet this administration pretends to be the friend of the people, the friend of the poor, the friend of the laborer. We have the United Fruit Co. and the Standard Oil Co. bringing their ships under our flag for protection.

What do you want the legislation for? This is another measure now, and you want it for what? I have here the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, giving the letters upon which his recommendations for this legislation is based very largely. Both the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce, for whom I have the highest respect and warm personal regard, are going about over the country reading letters to show the people the necessity for this legislation. What are they saying? They are saying that we should have this legislation to help the farmers of this country, and they point to the high freight rates.

Mr. President, this bill will not help the farmer. This bill is not intended to help the farmer by the people who are really behind it. This bill is a measure I will not say intended, but a measure that will place in the pockets of speculators, if it helps anybody, thousands of dollars at the expense of the Government.

Mr. President, they say they want to help the farmers of the country. How will they do it? They say by furnishing them cheaper freight rates. The farmers of the country now and the grain people are not suffering. I thought I had all my documents here, but I left one of my packages. However, I will have to tell you what it shows and then I will have to bring it over probably when I discuss one of the other divisions of the motion, which I may have to do. I have daily clippings showing the market reports at Chicago on wheat, oats, barley, rye, and things like that.

Mr. WEEKS. And the London price?

Mr. JONES. I am not particular about the London price. I do not care much about it. In Chicago they are getting what for wheat? One dollar and fifty cents, $1.60, and $1.65 a bushel. Who is getting it? I do not know how it is in the East, but I know out in our part of the country most of the wheat was sold some time ago and the farmers are not going to get the benefit of the cheap rates you furnish by this legislation. Who will get it? The men who are cornering wheat are the men who will get it. The exporters of wheat are the men who will get any benefit that comes from this bill. When my friend, the Secretary of the Treasury, goes about over the country telling the farmers and the people of the country that he wants this bill passed for their benefit, to give them a better price, I do not know what he is thinking about.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES. I am very sorry, but I can not yield to my friend. I would like very well to yield, but I have refused to yield to others, and I must decline.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. JONES. Then take oats. I have kept track of the price of oats a little during the last three or four years because my brother-in-law has been raising oats in Illinois. What do I find? I find he had been getting about 28, 30, and 31 cents a bushel for oats, and he thought he was getting a pretty good price when he got 30 cents a bushel. What is the price of oats now in Chicago? My recollection is that the last quotation was either 60 or 80 cents a bushel. Sixty-odd cents for a bushel of oats is a great price. Are the farmers getting it? No; they have sold their oats. They are not going to get the benefit of any cheap rates that this bill will furnish, but the cheap rates will redound to the advantage of the speculator and the people who have cornered and secured the supply of oats in the country and who will extort from their customers every dollar these necessities make possible, and every dollar saved in transportation they will pocket. If they do not get the benefit, then the people across the water who buy wheat or buy flour will get the benefit in reduced rates.

I had some clippings in my pocket here. It was just a news item, which stated that on account of the freight rates in London the price of wheat and flour was almost out of sight.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I am sorry; I dislike to refuse, but I have declined to yield to others, and I can not let the Senator in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. JONES. I will let the Senator in at another time, but I think it would be better for him to wait. I want to be courteous in this matter. I do not want to get in any belligerent attitude or furnish any reason for involving the belligerency of my friend. I am sorry that the people across the water are paying these high freight charges. I am sorry they have to pay such a big price, but I do not see why we should bring our people into danger to help those people out over there in a struggle they have brought on themselves, a condition, deplorable as it may be, for which they themselves are responsible.

Mr. President, I want to notice some of these letters, and I will bring the clippings in that I have later on so as to put them in the RECORD. I have this letter from the Treasury Department, signed by Mr. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, and also signed by Mr. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, sending letters down here with reference to the high charges of freight rates and showing the necessity for this legislation. I am not going to read all of it, but I am going to read as many things in it as may be advisable and call attention to what I think is an error in judgment and wrong deductions and so on.

As I said, we may expect results just like we have them from the conditions that now exist in Europe. I can get letters from people in different parts of the country almost any time in the year and in almost any year showing how things are high in their locality or how things are low, and that they would be helped if the Government would do this and if the Government would do that.

Out in my part of the country last year apples were allowed to waste in the fields. Why? Because we did not have any way to distribute them. Shall we say, then, because there are people in the country who want apples the Government shall go into the business of distributing apples? We would like to have had it done. It would have helped us wonderfully. Our people suffered very greatly.

I noticed in a paper the other day that some man sent his apples off to market and he got a bill for his freight after the apples had been disposed of and they did not pay the cost of transportation. There is something wrong. We ought to bend our efforts to try to correct a condition like that. My friend from New Jersey might think so, but I hardly think the Government should go into the distribution of our apples.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think it would be a very helpful proposition for the Government to interpose.

Mr. JONES. I think the Government could help some, that is true. I am not so set against those things as some of my friends are, but I would not be in favor of the Government going into the Yakima Valley and either stopping the production of so many apples or furnishing a market, buying up the apples there in order to maintain the price. I would not want them to do it. Yet that is what you propose to do in this case.

Freight rates are high. Of course they are high. They are bound to be high. They must be high under present conditions. You can not reduce them by furnishing a few ships. Fifteen or thirty or forty or fifty ships would be a drop in the bucket, and the rates would not be reduced, except on what? Except on the products that are carried by the ships of the Government, that is all. You will not have enough ships to start from all the various ports of this country to all the ports of Europe. Suppose you have a ship to go from New Orleans and have not any to go from New York? Will the fact that freights are low or cheap from New Orleans affect the freight from New York? Not a bit of it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Have you ever seen a grocer coming into a town and lowering the price of eggs?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. JONES. No; I can not yield.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yet he has not eggs to supply everybody in the community.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield to the Senator from New Jersey. The Senator from New Jersey will please not interrupt.

Mr. JONES. No; but if a man comes into North Yakima and brings in some Iowa eggs and lowers the price there it does not affect the price at Waukegan.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not know the distance between Waukegan and Yakima.

Mr. JONES. I knew the Senator did not know, and that is why I used that example. That is the way it will be in this case. The ships will only go from certain ports. Here is the great trouble with it, Mr. President: Take a railroad. I would rather have the Government operate a railroad than operate a ship. Why? Because when you have a railroad you know where the termini are. You know the line along which it is going to go. You know what competitors it is going to have. You know where their line is and where their termini are, and you know the business of one and the business of the other.

Shipping is entirely different. Unless Congress says that these ships shall go from certain ports to certain ports you do not know where they are going. You leave it to whom? You leave it to a political board. That is where you leave it. You leave it to a board to which you and I and your colleagues and my colleagues would go upon the urgent request of our constituents. In some of our big cities who would present to us their needs? They would say we must have a ship. If it is a Republican board they might pay more attention to me than they would to you. If it is a Democratic board they might pay more attention to my Democratic friends than to me. They can send the ship from your port to mine or from my port to yours, or they can send a ship to the port of somebody else who had more influence than I. So you would have this business controlled and directed very largely by political pressure and political influence.

Mr. President, it would bring about a condition of things that I think would be deplorable; and yet with all that, if you put the amendment of my colleague into the bill, I would simply state my reasons and objections to it and then let you pass it, so far as I am concerned.

But I want to notice what this letter says. I do not think I will do that now. I think I will wait until I get the clippings that I have. I am going to take up these rules that this committee has repealed and destroyed. I do not know whether the Senator was in here when I mentioned that or not.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think I was.

Mr. JONES. The Senator knows what they have done then. There are so many substitutes here that it is hard to keep track of them. Here is one in the nature of a substitute repealing all these amendments, but it does not seem to be the one that I want. Yes; here it is. I want Senators to pay attention to this provision, because this is a serious matter, and I wish those who are here anyhow to notice, and possibly we can get the caucus, at any rate, to consider this proposition.

All rules and regulations—

All rules and regulations—

relating to or which affect shipping, navigation, or water-borne commerce of the United States, heretofore made or published, by authority of law, shall only be and remain in force until midnight on the 31st day of December, 1915.

Here [exhibiting] is all that I have been able to find of these rules and regulations. That is enough, though there may be more; but they are all repealed, nullified, and abrogated, and all the shipping of the United States anywhere and everywhere is put under the control and domination of this shipping board. Why that has been done nobody has said; I do not know; I do not know who suggested it; I do not know who proposed it; I do not know where it came from; but I want to say that, in my judgment, wherever it came from, they had a purpose and object in view in having that done; and it is a purpose and object which I think the Senate ought to know about and ought to investigate.

I want to call your attention to these rules; I want to show you what they have done, and in order to do that I shall have to read more to the Senate than I should like to do; but the only way that we can get at these things is, of course, to examine them. I venture to say that my good friend the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] has not examined these rules; I venture to say that he does not know—I am not charging him with ignorance—what that provision of the bill means and what it does. As I have said, I sent to the various departments and asked them to send me copies of the rules and regulations that affected the water-borne commerce of the United States, and here [exhibiting] is what I have gotten so far. The first one is what? Rules for the St. Marys River, approved April 15, 1911.

Now, then, why is it that they have to interfere with the St. Marys River? Why is it that they want to put the St. Marys River and the commerce on it under the control of this shipping board? Why is it that you want to put that commerce under the shipping board? Is it possible that this suggestion came from the department? Is it possible that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce, who are the only ones who are to be on this shipping board, are trying to get all the power that comes with such authority as that? Is it possible that they want to take away from the War Department some of the control it exercises over navigable streams? What has the War Department to say about it? Has the War Department been mentioned? Has the War Department been consulted? I do not know, but here it is.

Rules for the St. Marys River.

I must read this. Notice that we passed a special law for the anchorage and movements of vessels in the St. Marys River. We did not seem to think that the general legislation affecting navigation was sufficient for the St. Marys River, and we passed a special act governing that river. What do we provide in this law?

Be it enacted, etc.—

This is the act of April 26, 1906—

That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to adopt and prescribe suitable rules and regulations governing the movements and anchorage of vessels and rafts in St. Marys River from Point Iroquois, on Lake Superior, to Point Detour, on Lake Huron, and for the purpose of enforcing the observance of such regulations the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to detail one or more revenue cutters for duty upon the request of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor on said river.

After quoting the law which I have read, the regulation of the department continues:

The officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service, who are directed to enforce the regulations prescribed by this rule, are hereby required and directed in case of necessity or when a proper notice has been disregarded to use the force at their command.

Now, Mr. President, I want to ask the lawyers of this body what effect this provision has on that law? This provision says:

The shipping board herein provided for shall propose such rules and regulations applicable to the shipping and water-borne commerce of the United States in lieu of those now in force.

That is, those rules and regulations. This does not propose to repeal any law; it simply says the "rules and regulations" adopted pursuant to law are repealed, but it does not repeal the law. The law says:

The Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to adopt and prescribe suitable rules and regulations governing the movements and anchorage of vessels and rafts in St. Marys River.

Does the provision of the bill repeal the law? It does not say so. It simply annuls the rules and regulations that are adopted pursuant to law. It does not say that "all such in conflict herewith are hereby repealed."

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Washington?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. I think I will yield, if I can do so without losing the floor, because the Senator is going to answer a legal question.

Mr. CLAPP. Any law that contravenes an existing law pro tanto repeals the existing law without containing any repealing clause. This would repeal all the rules and repeal, by implication, all the laws that directed the making of rules, because it would take the making of the rules from those various bodies to the body created by the pending bill.

Mr. JONES. I doubt very much whether the language of this provision here would repeal the law.

Mr. CLAPP. It would if it contravened it.

Mr. JONES. Well, it does not contravene the law. It contravenes the rules and regulations. It annuls them, but it lets the law stand.

Mr. CLAPP. No; it contravenes the prior law so far as the prior law was the authority for the making of the rules, transferring the authority from that law to the pending bill, if it should become a law.

Mr. JONES. Well, Mr. President, I want to read this, and I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota what effect the provision in the bill has on this:

That in the event of the violation of such regulations or rules of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor by the owners and masters or person in charge of such vessel, such owners, masters, or person in charge shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $200.

Is that a repeal?

Mr. CLAPP. Is that a law?

Mr. JONES. That is a law.

Mr. CLAPP. No; that would not be a repeal, because there is nothing in the pending bill that contravenes it.

Mr. JONES. But there is no penalty provided for.

Mr. CLAPP. The penalty would remain.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; this is a penalty for the violation of rules made by the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. CLAPP. Exactly.

Mr. JONES. These are not made by the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, no. The law from which the Senator read first authorized the making of rules. That is the repeal of the prior law. That would transfer the making of the rules to another body. The law which the Senator read also contains a penalty for the violation of the rules, and that penalty would remain because it is not contravened by the pending bill.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but there is nothing to indicate whether the rules and regulations are repealed under this section.

Mr. CLAPP. I think that under rules and regulations there could be no violation, but if there was the penalty would remain.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but the Senator knows that criminal statutes are construed strictly.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course they are construed strictly.

Mr. JONES. But when it makes it a crime to violate a rule made by the Secretary of Commerce, does the mere fact that you take away from the Secretary of Commerce the power to make the rules make a man criminally liable for the violation of a rule made by somebody else?

Mr. CLAPP. It does not make the violation depend upon the fact that the Secretary of Commerce makes the rule.

Mr. JONES. The law says so.

Mr. CLAPP. No.

Mr. JONES. Yes, it does; and I want to read it to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. The violation of the rule is followed by the penalty.

Mr. JONES. It reads that in the event of the violation of any of the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. CLAPP. Exactly.

Mr. JONES. That is not the shipping board.

Mr. CLAPP. No; but it is the shipping rule governing the shipping.

Mr. JONES. That is true. Well, Mr. President, my friend and I differ about that; but I do not believe that if you take the provisions of this bill you can punish anybody for the violation of a rule made by the Secretary of Commerce, because he violates a rule made by the shipping board, and you do not provide any penalty for it. You do not authorize the board to provide any penalty for it.

Mr. CLAPP. You could not do so.

Mr. JONES. You do not.

Mr. CLAPP. That is an authority you can not confer on them. Congress alone can provide the penalty.

Mr. JONES. Well, Congress has not provided any penalty for violating the rules made by the shipping board under the provisions of this bill. So how will you punish anybody for a violation of it? We have not provided any penalty, and a man does not know, when he violates a regulation of the shipping board, that he is going to be punished, for there is no law——

Mr. CLAPP. He may not know the penalty, in any event; but, if he violates the law, he takes the consequences of a violation of it, whatever they may be.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; but there is nothing in the law that fixes a penalty on him for violating a rule made by the shipping board.

Mr. CLAPP. If the law to which the Senator refers is limited, I suppose it relates to violating the rules relating to shipping——

Mr. JONES. It relates to a penalty for violations of the rules relating to shipping on a certain river, made by certain officials.

Mr. CLAPP. Well, then, there might be a very serious question.

Mr. JONES. That is it; that is what the law does; that is what the law says. They have apparently let the law stand, but they have repealed all these rules and regulations. In my judgment, when it comes to the penalty for the violation of these rules, they will find that the courts will let the penalties out, and they will come in here asking us to revise the whole range of the navigation laws. At least that is a proposition that, it seems to me, our friends ought to look into very carefully. I do not believe they have considered that at all.

Mr. CLAPP. I think that is a point that the Senator and I would abundantly agree upon. The idea of repealing a stack of rules and regulations like that by one sweeping provision! Of course, it will lead to interminable confusion.

Mr. JONES. Rule 1 provides:

RULE 1. These rules shall apply to the waters of the St. Marys River beyond Point Iroquois on Lake Superior to Point Detour on Lake Huron, except those waters included in the St. Marys Falls Canals. The speed under these rules shall in all cases be over the bottom.

I do not know what the shipping board will do with reference to that. I do not know whether they will provide that the speed shall be speed over the bottom or something else. I do not know how they are going to find out about it. I do not know whether or not they are going to send somebody up the St. Marys River to look into the conditions. The Secretary of Commerce has agents and inspectors all over the country to advise him and recommend these different rules. Now, those employees are not made available for the shipping board, and we have not disposed of their services; they will stay under the Secretary of Commerce, I suppose, and there will come in here estimates for officials for the shipping board to look after the various rivers, and we will have to provide officers and salaries, and all that sort of thing.

Then we do not know what sort of rules they will make. Of course, I do not assume that these are not good rules here. They may adopt them or they may not. Somebody up there on the St. Marys, who is dissatisfied with the way he is being treated, may charge that some favoritism is being used against him and get a Senator or Representative or somebody to come here and go before the shipping board and point out why he should be treated differently. Just look at the burdens that would be imposed on Senators and Representatives under a political organization having control of all the navigation in the United States. Why, Mr. President, it seems to me that the proposition is monstrous, unthinkable, and inconceivable.

I now read rule 2:

RULE 2. No vessel of 500 gross tons or over shall navigate the St. Marys River at a rate of speed greater than 10 statute miles per hour between Everens Point and the float lights in Hay Lake marking the northern end of the Middle Neebish Channel, nor between the post lights in Hay Lake and in Mud Lake marking the upper and lower ends, respectively, of the West Neebish Channel, nor between Six-Mile Point Rear Light and the intersection of Cedar Point and Birch Point Ranges.

Suppose that some fellow up there with a vessel that does not comply with the provisions of that rule comes down here to his Senator or Representative and asks him to go to this political board and get some special privileges with reference to the St. Marys River. Senators know enough about how things are done about the departments to know of the condition of things that that would bring about. Notice in this connection that the bill gives the shipping board the right to make these special arrangements. Listen to it:

In the rules and regulations hereby adopted and authorized to be put in force, different classes of shipping, navigation, and the water-borne commerce may be appropriately and differently treated and provided for.

Giving almost all sorts of authority to this board. They may provide for discriminations, rebates, impositions, oppressions, and all sorts of influences.

Rule 3 provides:

RULE 3. No vessel of 500 gross tons or over shall pass up the West Neebish Channel nor down the Middle Neebish Channel except vessels making a regular local stop on these channels and vessels bound in or out of the St. Joseph or Lake George Channels at Harwood Point.

The chances are, as soon as this is adopted, that there will be some owner of a ship coming down here wanting to modify that rule and give him the right, because they are under 500 tons, to do certain things that are prohibited by this rule; and if the board say, "We do not think we can do it," what will he do? He will come right up here to his Senator or Representative and ask him to go there to that board, and he will make his showing. There will be nobody there to combat it, and he will make a strong showing, and before his competitors up there know what is happening they will be put out of business. That is what they have done in this bill, at one fell swoop, on the St. Marys River, a little bit of a river away up here somewhere, I do not know where; yet we must put it under this shipping board. We started it out with a shipping board to run the vessels of the United States, and it ends up by running all the commerce of the whole United States. I want the amen-corner people to realize what that is, and I want the amen corners out in the Puget Sound country to know that after a certain date in this year all the shipping in Puget Sound will be put under the control of a political board located in Washington City; and I want them to understand that the board will be controlled for a while by a political body to which I do not belong.

RULE 4. No vessel shall pass or approach within one-quarter mile of a vessel bound in the same direction in any of those portions of the channels where speed is restricted to 10 statute miles per hour, except between Bayfield Rock and the St. Marys Falls Canals, and, for upbound vessels only, between Vidal Shoal and Black Gas Buoy No. 3, off Brush Point.

If there is somebody that wants to take a little different course from that up there on the St. Marys River they will come down here to this board, or to their Congressmen and Senators, and ask to have the privilege granted to them to go in a different way.

Tugs without tows and local passenger boats under 500 gross tons are exempt from this rule.

Now, then, about the first thing they will do will be to come down here to get this board to put these vessels of less than 500 tons under this rule. They will go to this shipping board and say that that rule is injurious to their business; that it is running them into bankruptcy; that it is an unjust regulation. We can not pass this bill intelligently without knowing something about these rules and regulations that they propose to repeal and do away with. We can not do it.

My dear friend the Senator from Louisiana suggests that the St. Marys River is a very important river between the Great Lakes, and that through it there passes a tremendous commerce, more than enters Liverpool. I think that is true. That is all the more reason why it should not be under the control of a political board. That is all the more reason why these ships of a limited tonnage in going through this canal should not be placed at the mercy of the great and powerful craft that can bring their pressure to bear on this political board.

No, Mr. President; I can not believe that the committe knew what they were doing when they put that provision in this bill. It certainly will be interesting to know, and I hope my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] will find out where that suggestion came from, who proposed it, who wants to take all the water-borne commerce of this country and put it under a political board. Why not leave this board that we are providing to operate Government ships in control of the business that it is designed to handle? Why take it and spread it all over the United States? Is there anybody who can suggest any good reason for the action that has been taken?

Why, they say that this is intended as a temporary measure. There is nothing temporary about that. If you get a lot of officers established with salaries under that provision, you will never get rid of them. If you try to get rid of a single officer that you think is absolutely unnecessary in the running of this Government, you know what trouble it is to do it.

Let us see some more of these rules:

RULE 5. Any vessel approaching a tug towing a dredge or scow moving in the same direction may pass such tow by giving a signal indicating upon which side the vessel desires to pass, and it shall be the duty of the pilot of the tug to sheer clear of the side of the channel indicated and give the vessel all possible room.

Well, probably they will carry that out all right.

RULE 6. No vessel or raft shall anchor in any of the improved channels nor off Big Point within one-quarter mile of the waterworks intake crib, except vessels in distress or under stress of weather.

Any vessel or raft so anchored shall at once shift anchorage as directed by the supervisor of anchorages.

Now, that says that anybody violating that rule shall get away from there at the direction of the supervisor of anchorages—not the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Of course, I suppose this shipping board will provide that somebody else shall order these boats around. To whom will they give the job? This supervisor of anchorages, I have no doubt, is a civil-service man, a man independent of politics—a permanent position. You do not disturb him. You do not take away his office. You do not take away his salary. You do not provide that he shall act under the shipping board. Now, who is going to do that? The shipping board will designate somebody, and you will have to provide the salary, and you will never get rid of him.

Talk about unnecessary offices! Talk about increasing the offices! Talk about extravagance! Talk about economy! You talk about it in your platforms. You do not do much about it here. You have increased the offices more during the last two years than in all the four or five years preceding, and we do not know yet how many offices you have provided for and have created, and we do not know how many offices you will provide for under this bill, necessitated by this change in the law. Why disturb this situation?

They talk about the regulations affecting our navigation and interfering with the development of it. Are you going to simplify them? How? Why, you are going to make it "confusion worse confounded" by this legislation. You will make it so that the ship man will not know what he is up against. He will not know what rules he has to obey. He will not know who is entitled to order him about. He will not know what penalties he is subject to. Is it possible that the Democratic majority knows what it is doing in that provision? If it does, we want to know, and we hope you will tell us.

RULE 7. Vessels towing, while engaged in shortening or lengthening tow lines or dropping or making up tows; vessels mooring or unmooring, anchoring, or hoisting anchor; vessels loading or discharging stores from boats alongside; and vessels awaiting supply boats are required to haul clear of the ranges when possible and to permit the unobstructed passage of other vessels.

RULE 8. No vessel is allowed to tow more than one vessel through any of the improved channels unless the vessel moves the tow at least 5 miles per hour over the bottom, and no vessel of 10 gross tons or over shall navigate the improved channels under sail power alone.

Mr. President, you will find all sorts of influences coming down here to have that rule modified. They will not want to be limited as that rule limits them. There will be owners of vessels that tow other vessels coming down here and saying that if they are allowed certain rights and certain privileges it will not injure the canal; it will not injure the river if they give them a little more privilege, a little more extensive right, and if they do not get what they ask they will come to the Senator or the Representative and ask him to go down to the board and help them present their case. Why, Mr. President, it is really surprising how many of the people think that all a Senator has to do to get something from a department is to go down and ask for it because he is a Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Washington suspend his remarks until the Chair can lay before the Senate the latest return of the Sergeant at Arms? [Reading:]

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SERGEANT AT ARMS,
February 9, 1915—5.30 a. m.

To the PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE SENATE.

SIR: Pursuant to the order directing me to compel the attendance of absent Senators, I beg to report the following:

Senator GALLINGER appeared in the Senate at 4 a. m.

At 4.40 I communicated the order of the Senate by phone to Senator NEWLANDS, who said that he was sick, but that he would report as soon as possible.

At 4.50 a. m. I communicated the order of the Senate by phone to Senator TOWNSEND, who said that he was not feeling at all well, but that he would report as soon as possible.

At 5 a. m. Senator CRAWFORD and Senator MCLEAN appeared on the floor of the Senate.

I am informed at residence of Senator O'GORMAN that the Senator left for New York last night on account of sickness in family.

Up to the present I have been unable to learn the whereabouts of Senator BANKHEAD.

Very respectfully,
CHARLES P. HIGGINS,
Sergeant at Arms United States Senate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, we have in our State a great deal to do with the Interior Department. A great many people have trouble with their land claims, and they seem to think that all we have to do to get their claims established is to go up to the Secretary of the Interior and ask him to do it. The Secretary of the Interior, of course, is a Cabinet officer. He is a political appointee, but most of those under him are civil-service people and act pretty independently in politics; but here are rules and regulations put under an entirely political board, and that, so far as any provisions of this act go, will have nothing but political appointees under them. There is no provision in this bill that the employee shall be under civil service; none at all. They will hire whomever they please, pay them whatever they please, and we will have to make the deficiency good. The people will have to put up for it. The people of the amen corners throughout the country will have to make good these deficiencies. They will have all the commerce of the country turned over to this political board.

Mr. President, here is rule 10. I will not read all these rules. I have not the time and I have not had the time heretofore to read them all, and I do not want to use the time unnecessarily. I have confined myself to this bill. I would not read any of these rules if I thought any of the members of the committee really knew what they were doing. I would not read any of these rules if I thought the majority of Senators knew the effect of this provision in their bill. I do not believe they do. I think the chances are that we will have to amend this motion a little bit further and provide for striking out these provisions and let this board be confined to the real purposes and objects of this measure. Let them confine their operations and their authority and their influence and their power to the ships that they propose to construct and purchase and operate as Government vessels. Let us not disturb the rules that have been made.

Mr. President, how have these rules been made? They have not been made on the spur of the moment. They have been made after very careful consideration, after very thorough investigation of the different localities and the different needs of the different localities. They are made to fit the condition of each locality, and what earthly reason is there for disturbing the situation?

Rafts are required to use the Old or Lake George Channel. When lying by they shall be moored clear of the channel. From Harwood Point to Mud Lake crib gas buoy they will move only when and as directed by the supervisor of anchorages.

Rafts originating in Hay Lake shall be moved only at such time and under such conditions as the supervisor of anchorages may direct.

Mr. President, who will handle that under these rules and regulations? Has this board any authority over that supervisor of anchorages? This bill does not disturb him in his position, but I find no authority anywhere to this board to use him. I find nothing here that gives them authority over him to direct what he shall do and what he shall not do.

Suppose this board should select somebody else to do this. They will provide for another officer and we shall have to provide for the salary. Then we will find people coming in here wanting different privileges with reference to their rafts. Some of them will come down here and claim that the rafts ought to be allowed to use some other channel than Old or Lake George Channel. They will contend that to have them confined to that channel is a great inconvenience and a great expense. They will ask to be allowed to have their rafts somewhere else, and if this board does not feel disposed to grant their requests they will come right up here to the Capitol and ask their Senators or Representatives.

RULE 14. Whenever vessels collect in any part of the river by reason of fog, smoke, ice, or the obstruction of any of the channels, the supervisor of anchorages shall direct and control their anchorage—

The supervisor of anchorages comes in there again. He has some more duties that he is going to be deprived of, and I do not know who will be in his place—shall direct and control their anchorage and their movements through such channels as the engineer in charge of the improvements of the St. Marys River may declare open and under such restrictions as to order, speed, and towage as the engineer in charge of the improvements in the St. Marys River may deem necessary to facilitate and expedite the passage of commerce. Regular scheduled boats carrying passengers or mails may be advanced in order, and any vessel not ready to move when directed will lose her position. All vessels are required to yield prompt and implicit obedience to the directions of the supervisor of anchorages.

Will this board keep the engineer in charge in control of these matters as he is now, or as soon as our friends find out that this is a political board and that they are political positions to which they may be appointed, will they come down here and ask their Senator or Representative to secure those positions for them, point out how they can handle this matter much better than the engineer, and suggest that they be selected for this place instead of the engineer?

Mr. President, that is all I shall read with reference to the rules for the St. Marys River. There are a great many more here, but I shall not take the time of the Senate at this early hour in the morning to read them.

I have here the rules and regulations relating to the anchorage and movement of vessels in the harbor of Chicago. These are special rules applying to a special locality. They are not general rules, but special rules.

Why is it that this committee proposes to take this special locality out from under the law that was passed for it, to take it out from under the rules which have been adopted after great care and consideration, and put it under a board that does not know anything about such things?

If they would provide that the officers should serve who now fix these rules, under whose direction and supervision these rules are adopted, it would be a little different. I shall point out directly where the law provides that a certain body must get together once every year to revise the different rules, a body composed of supervisors of different districts all over the United States, men who are thoroughly familiar with their locality, who come here to Washington City and meet annually and talk over the situation and point out what ought to be done, and make such changes as ought to be made, as they have learned by experience should be made. There is nothing in this provision here that warrants the idea that this board will make use of those people. There is no authority here allowing the board to do it. These people act directly under a law. They do not act under rules and regulations prescribed by anybody, but they act under positive provisions of law. There is no provision in this bill as proposed which makes those people subordinate to the shipping board.

Now, here are the rules with reference to Chicago. Are there any interests in Chicago that want any changes made in those rules? If there are, what will they do? They will bring their influence to bear upon this board to get whatever changes they want. They come to the officials now, but they come to officials who are largely free from political influence. They know that they will get a square deal and that is all. But when it comes to political matters, political official influence is very different. They do not use corrupt influence; I do not mean that. They do not consider that it is wrong to come and ask us a political favor, that they shall have some special treatment.

We ought not to subject any board that we provide to the possibility of those influences. We shirk our duty when we do it. If we propose to have this board handle these things, we ought to provide the machinery and we shall have to provide the machinery. We ought to make that board free from political influences. If this board is to be a permanent board we ought to make it very much like the Interstate Commerce Commission and provide a long term for the officials, and provide that they shall go out of office at different times, and make them free and independent of the President after they have been appointed and confirmed by the Senate.

Now, we passed a special law with reference to anchoring in the port of Chicago. I am going to read it:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be authorized and directed to define and establish anchorage grounds for vessels in the harbors of Chicago and waters of Lake Michigan, adjacent thereto, to adopt suitable rules and regulations in relation to the same, and also to adopt suitable rules and regulations governing the use of marked inshore channels in Lake Michigan, in front of the city of Chicago, and to take all necessary measures for the proper enforcement of such rules and regulations.

So, I want to ask, suppose this board is authorized to nullify these rules and make other rules, does it have the authority to take the necessary measures for the proper enforcement of the rules? Probably it has. It states that they shall impose such rules and regulations applicable to the water-borne commerce of the United States in lieu of those now in force. They do not say that they have power to enforce them.

SEC. 2. That in the event of the violation of any such rules and regulations by the owner, master, or person in charge of any vessel, such owner, master, or person in charge of such vessel shall be liable to a penalty of $100, and the said vessel may be holden for the payment of such penalty, and may be seized and proceeded against summarily by libel for the recovery of the same in any United States district court in the district in which such vessel may be, and in the name of the officer designated by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. President, you will note that that provision of law is a little different from the one that I read with reference to St. Marys. The St. Marys River provision says specifically that a violation of the rules made by the Secretary of Commerce shall be punishable so-and-so. The Secretary of Commerce does not make the rules under this bill. The question, then, is whether anybody could be convicted for a violation of these rules and punished according to the penalty provided in the statute for a violation of the rules made by the Secretary of Commerce. This provision simply provides for a penalty for a violation of the rules made pursuant to this statute.

Now, then, probably there might not be any question under that as to a punishment for violating these rules made by the new authority.

Then the rules provide as follows:

RULE 1. United States exterior breakwater anchorage, within lines running from Chicago Pierhead Light on North Pier, Chicago River, to the easterly and westerly ends of exterior breakwater and a line parallel to said breakwater, 2,000 feet southwesterly from the same.

If there is anybody dissatisfied with those limits, the interest in Chicago that is interfered with because of those limits will be coming down here just as soon as this legislation is passed, trying to get the board to change those rules or those limits.

RULE 2. Anchorage in the interior breakwater basin: Large vessels measuring 50 tons gross and over shall anchor either west of a line drawn south (true) from the south end of the east side of the lighthouse slip (Ogden Slip) and south of a line drawn east from a point on the dock line of the new lake-front park (Grant Park), 300 feet south of the south side of the Randolph Street Pier and north of a line drawn east from Van Buren Street; or south of a line drawn west from the north end of the southerly breakwater, but not within 100 feet of the southerly breakwater nor within 50 feet of the dock line of the new park, nor within the yacht anchorage described in rule 3.

Mr. President, if a large vessel measuring 50 tons and over will anchor at a certain point some of these people will complain about the limits and will ask this board to change them. Some people who are excluded by reason of the tonnage given here will ask that the limit of tonnage be changed so as to help them and give them some advantage, and if they do not get what they want by requesting the board they will go to their Senator and their Representative and they will make their showing. They will have their plats and they will have their statistics and their maps, and they will have to go down there and try to get the board to change it in accordance with the wishes of these people.

The chances are that the first who come here and get their case presented will get some special privilege of some kind.

Mr. President, our Democratic friends denounce special privilege, but under the provisions of this bill there is an opportunity for the granting of more special privileges than I venture to say is contained in any statute on the books to-day. In lines 5 to 25, on page 7 of this substitute bill, is such power given to a political board as no board in this country ever had before.

What does water-borne commerce of the United States amount to? Fifty million tons a year pass through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal alone, and when you take all the rivers of the country——

Mr. WEEKS. There is more in that one canal than in all the rivers and canals of Germany.

Mr. JONES. Yes; in that one canal, the Sault Ste. Marie, there is more tonnage than on all the rivers and canals in Germany, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. Yet that is just one. There are the Mississippi River, the Ohio River, the Cumberland, the Tennessee, the Kanawha, the Potomac, the Delaware, the Missouri, the Great Lakes, Puget Sound, the harbors of the coast, the harbors of the Gulf, the rivers running into the Gulf, the rivers in all our Southern States, for which we are appropriating millions and millions of dollars for navigation purposes. The control of all this tremendous commerce is transferred by lines 5 to 25 of this bill to this political shipping board.

I hope the Amen Corners all over the country will think about that. I hope they will try to study out in their own minds why it is that this committee has reported a proposition of that kind. I want them to understand that that is not contained in any of the other bills or substitutes that is offered to the Senate. That provision was never mentioned on the floor of the Senate until it was reported in the substitute; at least, it was never mentioned publicly, nobody has referred to it, nobody had the least idea that anybody was thinking about a proposition of that kind.

Now, we come to Chicago, with all its great commerce and all its great interests conflicting, the competing interests trying to get advantage of another, great or small, all given the privilege of coming down here to a political board and trying to get privileges that appear to be small, but that might amount to thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars in their business in a year.

Mr. President, I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read all these rules. Here are some that I am going to read. The general regulation:

No vessel shall tie up to or anchor within 100 feet of any United States pier or breakwater.

This anchorage ground may be valuable; it may be very desirable; it may be very convenient. Here some interest says "There is no use to shut me out 100 feet from the breakwater by a Government pier; let me come up to 50 feet or 75 feet." He presents a showing, convinces the board that no harm can be done, and convinces the board that no discrimination will occur. The board might not hear the other side. Then, the first thing the other interest knows is that somebody is permitted to anchor within 75 feet of the United States pier or breakwater instead of a hundred feet.

Mr. President, here are some more rules and regulations not general, not applying to any general locality, but applying to a particular place or a particular locality. Here are rules and regulations relating to the anchorage of vessels in the port of New York.

Mr. President, New York is quite a city. Anchorage ground there is very important and very valuable. Anchorage rights and privileges might be of tremendous benefit and of tremendous advantage. Some great steamship company, by securing special consideration or a special regulation, might be given a decided advantage over a competitor. You take all these rules and regulations, which have been provided and adopted after great care, and you annul them, you actually declare them null and void after a certain date of this year. How are they to be replaced? They are to be replaced by a political board, by a board that is naturally subject to political influence and political pressure. I have not any doubt that there is considerable pressure from interests in the city of New York not only in regard to shipping legislation, but in regard to other legislation; I have not any doubt that great interests there will use every possible method to influence a decision in their favor. These rules were adopted in 1911. They were adopted under a special statute of the United States, under which the Secretary of the Treasury, now the Secretary of Commerce, is authorized, empowered, and directed to define and establish an anchorage ground for vessels in the bay and harbor of New York, in the Hudson and East Rivers, and to adopt suitable rules and regulations in relation thereto, and to take the necessary measures for the proper enforcement of such rules and regulations.

Mr. President, it seems that Congress deemed it wise to provide that the same authority that established the anchorage grounds in the harbor of New York should also be the authority for establishing the rules and regulations with reference to their use. For some reason—I do not know what—Congress is now asked to change that; and, instead of allowing the authority that fixes the anchorage ground to establish these rules and regulations, it provides for a political board to do it, and places it all under the authority of the shipping board, that started out with the idea of having nothing to do with anything except vessels owned and operated by the United States through the proposed corporation. But they must change that. In this great district, in this great hive of industry, they must put all the shipping, big and little, great and powerful, under the shipping board.

One of the rules that they have provided here is:

The following-described anchorage grounds for vessels in the bay and harbor of New York and in the Hudson and East Rivers, respectively, are hereby defined and established, and the following revised rules and regulations governing the same are published for the government of the owner, master, pilot, or other persons having charge of a steam vessel towing or otherwise conducting a vessel to an anchorage in the port of New York, pursuant to the act of Congress approved May 16, 1888.

These rules and regulations and anchorage grounds have been fixed since 1888, and those who have had charge of them have improved the regulations and the rules as the result of these many years of experience. Now we are going to wipe it all out and we are going to leave it to a political board. Here is one of the rules:

(a) Vessels shall anchor only within the following specified limits, and a vessel anchoring within any of the below-described boundaries must anchor entirely within said boundaries, so that no portion of the hull shall extend beyond said boundary veering chain or when riding to a tideway.

(e) Permits may be granted by the supervisor of anchorages to wrecking plants to anchor in the channel for the purpose of recovering sunken property, subject to his supervision. Such wrecking plants must comply with all the navigation laws in regard to lights, fog signals, etc., and in granting such permit the Government assumes no responsibility.

Who will this board provide shall grant permits to wrecking plants to anchor in the channel for recovering sunken property? Will they provide that the supervisor of anchorages shall do this, or will there be some hungry, rapacious, political henchman in the city of New York—where there is no politics, where everybody is patriotic—will they provide that some of these people shall handle this proposition and put them in a position where they can not only discriminate in favor of one man as against another, but also receive bonuses or something of that sort? I have heard of such things in New York. I hope that the great shipping business of that port will not get under such influences. I know they will not if my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] can have his say about it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. We shall guard against those people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. JONES. Well, I am glad to have the suggestion made by the Senator. I know that we can count on him in trying to get these matters corrected, and I hope he will use his influence to have this provision stricken out. I think he can see the uselessness of it, as well as the great danger that there is in it; and if he can not do it on the floor of the Senate then his caucus or his committee ought to strike it out. It can not hurt this bill to strike that out. It will not affect any of the vital parts of the bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am fearful, Mr. President, that the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. JONES. For a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator accords to me entirely too much influence. I am an exceedingly modest member of my party.

Mr. JONES. Yes; I know; but the Senator is a very earnest member of his party.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES. I do not believe I can, Mr. President, just now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask a question.

Mr. JONES. I have before uniformly refused to permit interruptions or questions, though I am very sorry to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator for any other purpose?

Mr. JONES. I have really refused interruptions except when somebody, just like the Senator from New Jersey, volunteered some information. I dislike to yield to my dear friend from Nebraska. I feel that I should maintain as nearly a neutral attitude as possible.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I hope the Senator will let me ask him a question. I want to know how it could possibly be——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to know how it could possibly be that the Senator from New Jersey has no influence on that side. It seems to me he is supreme over there now. I do not see any other Democrat in the Chamber.

Mr. JONES. That is a question, of course, that I can not answer. I know what the result would be now if we could have a vote without anybody else coming in. I know that that item would go out of this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Will not the Senator yield for me to make a motion to adjourn?

Mr. JONES. No, Mr. President; I can not yield to the Senator now.

Here are some more rules. These are pilot rules for the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters. They are for a special place now; for the Great Lakes; they are special rules and regulations with reference to the pilots on the Great Lakes, and they have been established for a long time.

A pilot is a very desirable man in connection with a boat traversing dangerous waters. He is a very desirable man, even in safe waters, and the regulations and rules which have been framed and have grown up with reference to his calling ought not to be disturbed lightly, and they ought not to be put under any political influence. These rules were adopted under an act section 3 of which provides:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Commerce of the United States shall have authority to establish all necessary regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, required to carry the same into effect.

Now, listen:

The board of supervising inspectors of the United States shall have authority to establish such regulations to be observed by all steam vessels in passing each other, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as they shall from time to time deem necessary; and all regulations adopted by the said board of supervising inspectors under the authority of this act, when approved by the Secretary of Commerce, shall have the force of law. Two printed copies of any such regulations for passing, signed by them, shall be furnished to each steam vessel, and shall at all times be kept posted up in conspicuous places on board.

Now, Mr. President, who are the board of supervisors? I want to read the statute with reference to the Steamboat-Inspection Service; and this law relating to the rules for pilots empowers this board of supervising inspectors to make rules and regulations. Here is the law, section 4402 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 4402. There shall be a supervising inspector general, who shall be appointed from time to time by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall be selected with reference to his fitness and ability to systematize and carry into effect all the provisions of law relating to the Steamboat-Inspection Service, and who shall be entitled to a salary of $3,500 a year and his reasonable traveling expenses, or mileage at the rate of 10 cents a mile, incurred in the performance of his duty.

This supervising inspector is to systematize and carry into effect all the provisions of the law relating to the Steamboat-Inspection Service. That includes the rules and regulations made pursuant to law. This board of supervisors is given great power in the adoption of rules and regulations, and we are going to take that power away from them and give it to this political board. The Supervising Inspector General, after he is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, is independent of political influence.

SEC. 4403. The Supervising Inspector General shall, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, superintend the administration of the steamboat-inspection laws, preside at the meetings of the board of supervising inspectors, receive all reports of inspectors, receive and examine all accounts of inspectors, report fully at stated periods to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor upon all matters pertaining to his official duties, and produce a correct and uniform administration of the inspection laws, rules, and regulations.

Notice that it is made the duty of the Supervising Inspector General to "produce a correct and uniform administration of the inspection laws, rules, and regulations." What control will he have over the rules and regulations adopted by that political board? Absolutely none. Will he have the power after this law passes, if it should pass, to control these rules and regulations? Will he be deprived of the authority which this statute gives to him by the passage of this law? Suppose that the shipping board does not see fit to permit him to control these regulations and these rules and that they say that somebody else shall have charge of them, who will control?

Then section 4404 provides:

SEC. 4404. There shall be 10 supervising inspectors, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each of them shall be selected for his knowledge, skill, and practical experience in the uses of steam for navigation, and shall be a competent judge of the character and qualities of steam vessels and of all parts of the machinery employed in steaming. Each supervising inspector shall be entitled to a salary of $3,000 a year and his actual and reasonable traveling expenses at the rate of 10 cents a mile, incurred in the performance of his duty, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as may be given by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. President, section 4405 tells how this board of supervisors does its business:

SEC. 4405. The supervising inspectors and the Supervising Inspector General shall assemble as a board once in each year, at the city of Washington, D. C., on the third Wednesday in January, and at such other times as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, for joint consultation, and shall assign to each of the supervising inspectors the limits of territory within which he shall perform his duties. The board shall establish all necessary regulations required to carry out in the most effective manner the provisions of this title, and such regulations, when approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the force of law. The supervising inspector for the district embracing the Pacific coast shall not be under obligation to attend the meetings of the board oftener than once in two years; but when he does not attend such meetings he shall make his communications thereto, in the way of a report, in such manner as the board shall prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may at any time call in session, after reasonable public notice, the meeting of an executive committee, to be composed of the Supervising Inspector General and any two supervising inspectors, which committee, with the approval of the said Secretary, shall have the power to alter, amend, add to, or repeal any of the rules and regulations made with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor by the board of supervising inspectors, either by virtue of this section or under any power granted by this title or any amendment thereof. Such alteration, amendment, addition, or repeal, when approved by the said Secretary, shall have the force of law, and to continue in effect until 30 days after the adjournment of the next meeting of the board of supervising inspectors. The foregoing powers of such executive committee, acting with the said Secretary, shall also extend to the approval of the instruments, machines, and equipments referred to in section 4491 of this title.

Mr. President, I have read quite fully the provisions of the law with reference to the board of supervising inspectors. It shows how this board is constituted. It shows that it is made up of one person from each of the different districts of the country; that this board is required to carry out the rules and regulations and make the law relating to steamboat-inspection service effective; that this board meets in the city of Washington every year.

Regarding the pilot rules of the Great Lakes, the law provides that the board of supervising inspectors of the United States shall have authority to establish the regulations to be observed by the pilots.

Does the majority propose by the provision in this bill to take away from the board of supervising inspectors the power and authority to make these rules and regulations? Is it possible that an organization like this is going to be shorn of all of its power, is going to be shorn of the duties that have been specifically placed upon it by law; and is it possible that all of the steamboat service of the United States and all the waters thereof, and the pilots in these various waters, shall be taken out from under the jurisdiction of the board of supervisors and placed under this political body? Why, Mr. President, this is a more monstrous proposition than the one I read a while ago with reference to New York and Chicago; and yet this bill takes all the pilots of the Great Lakes and all the pilots of the Pacific coast and all the pilots of New York City and all the pilots of the rivers of my friend from North Carolina and all the pilots of all the inland waters of the Gulf coast out from under the board of supervising inspectors and places them under rules adopted by a political organization. I can not believe that the learned Senator from North Carolina had any idea of the scope and the extent of this provision in this bill that has been brought here from the Democratic caucus.

In section 8 of this act regarding laws to prevent collisions of vessels:

The Secretary of Commerce shall make such regulations as may be necessary to secure the proper execution of this act by collectors of customs and other officers of the Government.

And the Secretary of the Department of Commerce may, upon application therefor, remit or mitigate any fine, penalty, or forfeiture relating to motor boats except for failure to observe the provisions of section 6 of this act.

Mr. President, do they intend to deprive the Secretary of Commerce of the power to remit or mitigate any fine or penalty for the violation of any rule or regulation that his office may have issued, or do they propose that the Secretary of Commerce shall have control over fines and penalties for the violation of rules made by the shipping board? There is not anything in this proposed legislation that looks to anything of that kind, and it seems to me that the Senate ought to be very careful before it adopts any proposition leading to that result.

The Senators who are interested in the shipping of the Great Lakes, which is probably larger than the shipping of any other particular section of the country, ought to consider this provision very carefully before they let it become a law.

Unless they desire to disturb and overturn practically the entire system that now obtains in the operation and management and control of the great tonnage of those waters, they had better see to it that this legislation does not go into this bill.

Mr. President, we have different rules for pilots in the waters of the different sections of the country. There are not general statutes and general rules applicable to all sections of the country. I have here the pilot rules for rivers whose waters flow into the Gulf of Mexico, and their tributaries, and the Red River of the North. These are special rules also. They are passed under the following provisions of statute—section 4412 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 4412. The board of supervising inspectors—

That is, the board the statute providing for the composition of which I read a while ago—shall establish such regulations to be observed by all steam vessels in passing each other, as they shall from time to time deem necessary for safety; two printed copies of such regulations, signed by them, shall be furnished to each of such vessels, and shall at all times be kept posted up in conspicuous places in such vessels.

Mr. President, if this legislation passes, that provision of statute is absolutely repealed, because that statute specifically provides that the board of supervising inspectors shall make these rules and regulations.

You provide here that all rules and regulations made pursuant to law shall be annulled, and that hereafter this political board shall make them. What are you going to do with this board of supervisors? You are depriving it of practically all of its duties and not transferring it from the Department of Commerce to this shipping board. You are not doing away with the offices. We will have to appropriate their salaries. You are doing away with their duties; you are putting these duties on to a political board without giving it the machinery to carry them out; so you will either have to provide for additional legislation to transfer the board of supervising inspectors to this political board, or else you will have to provide for additional employees for this political board; and that is about what you are going to do. That is what you will have to do. They will recommend to Congress that it is absolutely necessary that they should have certain employees to do the work that you impose upon them by this provision, and you will have to provide the salaries for these positions; and the Senator from North Carolina and his colleague will find that the revenues coming from their tariff law, diminishing as they are, will be getting further away from the appropriations as they increase; and you will have to increase them. You can not provide for new organizations, you can not provide for new bodies, you can not provide for new boards, without providing additional money—additional compensation. These people are not going to work for nothing. They are not going to investigate these different resorts and these different waterway communications except at some expense to the Government, and they are going to require that Congress shall furnish them the help that is necessary to take care of the Columbia River and the Willamette River. I am glad that some of my friends are getting in here, so that they will probably see what they are getting in this bill, and from time to time as we get enough of them in to see how these rules and regulations will affect their different localities, possibly we can get enough sentiment developed in this secret caucus to overturn what has been done by some secret influence within the caucus.

Then, section 4413:

SEC. 4413. Every pilot, engineer, mate, or master of any steam vessel who neglects or willfully refuses to observe the regulations established in pursuance of the preceding section, shall be liable to a penalty of $50, and for all damages sustained by any passenger, in his person or baggage, by such neglect or refusal.

The question will come up there whether or not you can punish a man for a violation of regulations made by this shipping board, and assess against him a penalty provided for the violation of a rule made by an entirely different body from the board of supervising inspectors. While that may not be entirely free from doubt, it certainly leaves a complicated situation that is unnecessary to bring about. Then we have some other pilot rules here for certain inland waters of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and of the coast of the Gulf of Mexico. These rules and regulations were adopted pursuant to an act of June 7, 1897, amended by an act, the date of which I do not find here, requiring rules for lights, for dredges, and so forth, and it provides this:

That the following regulations for preventing collision shall be followed by all vessels navigating all harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States.

It seems that in this act the rules are specifically set out in the act itself, but in section 2 of this act here is this provision:

SEC. 2. That the supervising inspectors of steam vessels and the Supervising Inspector General shall establish such rules to be observed by steam vessels in passing each other and as to the lights to be carried by ferryboats and by barges and canal boats when in tow of steam vessels, and as to the lights and day signals to be carried by vessels, dredges of all types, and vessels working on wrecks or other obstruction to navigation or moored for submarine operations, or made fast to a sunken object which may drift with the tide or be towed, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as they from time to time may deem necessary for safety, which rules when approved by the Secretary of Commerce are hereby declared special rules duly made by local authority, as provided for in article 30 of chapter 802 of the laws of 1890. Two printed copies of such rules shall be furnished to such ferryboats, barges, dredges, canal boats, vessels working on wrecks, and steam vessels, which rules shall be kept posted up in conspicuous places in such vessels, barges, dredges, and boats.

Mr. President, you will note that those are duties imposed upon the supervising inspectors and the inspector general. You repeal that by this act. What are you going to have the supervising inspectors do? There are three or four different sections of the Revised Statutes imposing different duties upon this board of inspectors that are absolutely repealed by the provisions of this bill. You deprive this body of the right and the power to make and adopt these rules and regulations. What are they going to do? You do not do away with those offices. You take their powers and duties and put them onto another body. It seems to me that if you are going to do that you ought to take the body and transport it too, and let it perform these duties, and save that additional expense, because these supervising inspectors are going to draw their salaries just the same. You do not repeal that provision. This shipping board is going to have its salaries and its help and that help is going to get fixed salaries, so that you have one body doing work and getting pay and you have another body that has heretofore done the same work doing nothing and getting the same pay that it had gotten before.

Section 3 of this act provides for penalties against pilots, engineers, mates, or masters for the violation of any of the rules adopted by this board. Mr. President, I am not going to read these different rules. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to do that. I have already consumed more time than I anticipated, but there are several other matters to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. I want to see if I can show the Senators what they are doing by that provision. I want to show them as much as I can as to the rules and regulations prepared that are to be done away with. I want to ask them whether they think they are doing the same thing by uprooting and overturning, absolutely wiping out all the rules and regulations we have adopted for all the commerce of this great country of ours. I wish that my friends in the Amen Corners throughout the country would just try to find out some reason why this committee is doing this thing. I do not believe they know. I do not believe the committee knows why it is doing it.

I do not believe they know what they are doing when they are doing it. I do not believe they knew that this great pile of regulations here was being done away with. I want to give the Amen Corners some idea as to the pages of these rules that they are doing away with. I would just simply guess that there are at least a thousand or fifteen hundred pages of closely typewritten matter containing the laws, rules, and regulations affecting the water-borne commerce of the United States which our Democratic friends propose to wipe out and put under this political organization.

Here are rules and regulations relating to the navigable waters of the United States, with the exception of those for the northern and northwestern lakes, their connecting and tributary waters, which are printed in the United States Lake Survey bulletin. There are 154 pages in this document, aside from the index, and our friends are doing away with all these rules and regulations.

Here are rules and regulations with reference to the navigable waters on the coast of Maine and New Hampshire, including the rivers and bays thereof, and so forth. That is all to be done away with. It is all to be nullified. There are several pages here. Here are rules and regulations with reference to Portland Harbor, Me. Here are rules and regulations with reference to York River, Me.; Merrimac River; Boston Harbor, Mass.; the navigable waters tributary thereto. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] was here a moment ago, but he has been called out, so I will not refer to these different rules. Here is Taunton River, Mass., and the Sakonnet and Pawtucket Rivers, R. I.; the Mystic River, Conn.

Here are all the bridges of the country. You are going to put them under this board. Did you know that? You are going to put all the bridges over navigable streams in this country under this political board created by this act. You did not know that. If you had, you would never have done it.

Here are some rules and regulations in reference to the railroad rates of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. From all we hear about the work of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., it will be a nice thing for somebody to bring some influence down here to get some favors for these railroad bridges across these navigable streams. Somebody will hold up the railroad on the threat that they have power to secure the adoption of certain rules and regulations. I do not say it will be done, but here you make the opening for it.

Connecticut River, East Haddam, Conn., highway bridge operated by the East Haddam Bridge Commission for the State of Connecticut. The regulations were prescribed April 25, 1913. Why are you going to do away with those regulations? They were just adopted a little over a year ago. Why are you going to get rid of all those? What is your purpose? What do you want to do? Why is it that you want to put all these things under this political board?

There is the bridge across the Connecticut River at East Haddam. Then there is New Haven Harbor, Quinnipiac and Mill Rivers bridge regulations prescribed March 7, 1900. You are going to do away with all those. Notice the language of this act:

> All rules and regulations relating to or which affect shipping, navigation, or water-borne commerce of the United States.

You could not use broader language than that. You can not avoid the conclusion that these regulations for the Pequonnock River, Conn., are all done away with. Here is the Saugatuck River, Conn. What have you got against the Saugatuck River that you want to do away with all those regulations and put them under the shipping board?

Mr. President, you have more political dynamite in these lines from line 5 to line 25 than you can find in any other 20 lines that have ever been enacted by the United States. There is more political dynamite, there are more opportunities for corruption, more openings for political influence than can be found in any other 20 lines in any statute of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Washington suspend a moment until the Chair can lay before the Senate the latest returns from the Sergeant at Arms under the order compelling the attendance of absent Senators? The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SERGEANT AT ARMS,

To the PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE SENATE.

SIR: Pursuant to the order directing me to compel the absent Senators' attendance, I herewith report as follows:

CHARLES P. HIGGINS,
Sergeant at Arms.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington will proceed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, these are very interesting bulletins, coming at this early hour in the morning to this august body, and convey some very valuable information.

Then we have the waters of eastern Long Island, including Great and Little Peconick Bays, Gardiners Bay, Block Island Sound, and their tributary waters, Long Island Sound, and the Atlantic Ocean, Long Island.

New York Harbor again. Here are the regulations for Harlem River and the Hudson River, Raritan, Thoroughfare, near Atlantic City, N. J. Atlantic coast between Toms River and Sandy River. Did you know that you were doing away with every one of these regulations? What a burden you are going to place on this board to reinstate these rules between now and the close of the year. I shall not take the further time of the Senate to read any more of the one hundred and fifty and odd pages of rules that you are going to do away with. I may find something interesting there after a while that I may feel I ought to read to you, but I shall not do it now.

Mr. President, I have here another bulletin—laws of the United States and the international radiotelegraphic communication, regulations governing radio apparatus on ships and on land. Those regulations relate to radio apparatus and their operation on ships. That affects commerce. It relates to water-borne commerce. They are repealed. This says here under the statute:

> These regulations shall be enforced by the Secretary of Commerce through the collectors of customs and other officers of the Government as other regulations herein provided for.
> The Secretary of Commerce may, in his discretion, waive the provisions of any or all of these regulations when no interference of the character above mentioned can ensue.
> The Secretary of Commerce may grant special temporary licenses to stations actually engaged in conducting experiments for the development of the science of radiocommunication, or the apparatus pertaining thereto, to carry on special tests, using any amount of power or any wave lengths, at such hours and under such conditions as will insure the least interference with the sending or receipt of commercial or Government radiograms, of distress signals and radiograms, or with the work of other stations.

Mr. President, we repeal these regulations and the regulations made pursuant thereto.

On page 49 there are regulations running through to page 70. There are a great many other regulations, all of which affect shipping, which relate to commerce and the water-borne commerce of the United States.

Then here is another regulation with reference to motor boats. Motor boats relate to water-borne commerce of the United States. You are going to take all the motor boats of the country and put them under the shipping board. What are you going to do that for? What is the necessity for taking them out from the regulations they have been placed under and putting them under the shipping board? We have a statute here which provides:

> That the Secretary of Commerce shall make such regulations as may be necessary to secure the proper execution of this act by collectors of customs and other officers of the Government. And the Secretary of the Department of Commerce may, upon application therefor, remit or mitigate any fine, penalty, or forfeiture relating to motor boats except for failure to observe the provisions of section 6 of this act.

Does that authorize the Secretary of Commerce to remit fines and penalties for violations of the rules adopted by the shipping board? I leave that to be determined later.

Then, Mr. President, here are regulations with reference to the registration of foreign-built vessels. Probably that will not come under this provision, as the provision relates to water-borne commerce of the United States. I suppose foreign commerce would not be considered as that.

I have here the quarantine laws and regulations of the United States. You will find on page 7 and on page 9 provisions with reference to quarantine that affect commerce, that affect the operation of ships and water-borne commerce; and under this language, which is as broad as words can make it, you want to do away with all these regulations regarding quarantine.

Mr. President, why should you interfere with the laws and rules and regulations with reference to the protection of health between the States and on the waters of the United States? Is it possible that nothing is sacred at the hands of the secret caucus? Is it possible that no line of commercial endeavor is free from the secret tentacles that reach out from this caucus machine of the Democratic Party? Did you know that you were repealing the regulation relating to quarantine by this provision in this act? You are.

Then, here are regulations for the United States Lighthouse Service. Does that affect commerce? On page 27 of these rules and regulations I find section 3 of the act providing for regulations:

SEC. 3. That after the 1st day of January, 1907, it shall be unlawful for any person, company, corporation, or municipality not under the control of the Commissioner of Lighthouses, to establish, erect, or maintain in the navigable waters of the United States any light as an aid to navigation, or any other aid to navigation similar to any of those maintained by the United States under the control and direction of the Commissioner of Lighthouses, without first obtaining permission so to do from the Commissioner of Lighthouses, in accordance with rules and regulations to be established by the Secretary of Commerce; and any person violating the provisions of this section or any of the rules and regulations established by the Secretary of Commerce in accordance herewith shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be subject to a fine not exceeding the sum of $100 for each offense, and each day during which such violation shall continue shall be considered as a new offense.

Mr. President, the present Secretary of Commerce can establish rules with reference to lighthouses, and this is called an aid to navigation. These rules and regulations affect commerce. There are 171 pages of these aside from the index. You put all the lighthouses of the country under this board. You are going to give them power to make rules and regulations governing the lighthouses of the country. Are you going to transfer the employees of the lighthouses to the jurisdiction of this political body? Are you going to put all these employees outside of the civil service? Are you going to make them all political jobs? It seems to me, Mr. President, that these provisions are put in here for the sole purpose of securing through the administration, no matter whether this administration or some other, the power to place in positions of the greatest importance of trust political henchmen. It ought not to be done; there is not any excuse for it.

Then, Mr. President, I have here a volume called the General Rules and Regulations prescribed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, as amended at the board meeting of January, 1914. This relates very largely to vessels and water-borne commerce. It has 332 pages in it exclusive of the index. I may have to read it all before we get through; I do not want to take the time to-day, however, to do it, but what are you repealing all that for? You did not know you were doing it; I am satisfied of that.

I read a while ago—and I will not take the time to again read it for the benefit of those who have since come in—the statutes creating this board of supervisors. Then I read the rules that they were authorized to make. Then I read the sections of the statutes authorizing them to make certain rules, and certain provisions of the statutes giving them sole authority to make certain rules. You take all that power away from them; you take all those duties away from them, and you put that power and those duties upon the shipping board.

What are these supervisors going to do? I find the honorable Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], my friend, always for economy. No, Senator; that means more extravagance than you can find in 20 lines of all the statutes that have been passed except laws making large appropriations. You are going to take away all the duties of these inspectors who are receiving $3,000 or $4,000 a year, and who come back here to the city of Washington every year to make new rules and to revise the old ones. You are going to put that power in the hands of this board; but you are not taking away the salaries of these supervising inspectors; you leave them in office; they are going to draw their salaries; but you will not give them anything to do. What are you going to do with this board? You are going to have to provide help for it; it can not get all of the rules relating to these different localities and relating to all the water-borne commerce of the country.

Mr. President, I want to appeal to the Senator from Colorado, because I know that he is with me in favor of economy, and I want him to help us out.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, as the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES. As I practically asked the Senator from Colorado a question, I ask permission to yield to him to answer it without yielding the floor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, as the Senator from Washington is on the Appropriations Committee, we could very easily settle that question by refusing to appropriate for the various offices to which he has referred. I have no doubt he would join me in refusing to appropriate for them.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but I find that the Senator's vote and mine do not go very far in the matter of economy. It only amounts to two votes; that is all that it amounts to; that is about all there is done, and the last time there was only one vote. As the Senator from Wyoming suggests to me sotto voce, there are so many deserving Democrats that it is impossible to get enough votes in the Appropriations Committee to cut off any of these offices. I found it impracticable myself, not only under this administration—I am not confining it to my Democratic friends—but it is almost impossible when a man gets on the rolls to cut him off.

You can not do it. I have been trying to keep one from being put on; but I found mine was the only vote in the Appropriations Committee for that. I am going to have many hard fights here in the Senate if you ever let the appropriation bills come up—I do not know whether you are going to do it or not, but it would probably be a pretty good way to keep from paying these salaries by not passing the appropriation bill at all. I expect when the matter comes up here in the Senate, mine will be about the only vote that will be cast in favor of preventing an absolutely useless office from being created. Somebody put it in at a handsome salary.

Mr. President, I am not going to take the time to read these rules at this time. They will come in very well later on. I have here the rules and the instructions for the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey. Did you think that the Coast and Geodetic Survey was affected by this innocent provision in this bill? Well, I found some provisions in it relating to the commerce of the United States. I thought I had them marked, but I do not seem to have done so. I know, however, that I found some regulations of the Coast and Geodetic Survey that affect shipping; and you will notice that the language of your bill is broad enough to cover anything relating to or affecting shipping.

I have here the book of instructions for the medical inspection of aliens, relating to the Bureau of Public Health and the Marine-Hospital Service. You will find rules and regulations in that book that affect ships in the handling of aliens. It may be that those will all be in foreign ships coming in, and this may not affect the water-borne commerce of the United States, although I suppose that it would, as the Senator suggests, when the ships get out from the slips or the docks in the harbors. Well, you are going to repeal all those and you are going to put these regulations under this political machine.

Then, I have here amendments to the navigation laws in 1911. I repeat, I thought I had all this marked, but I do not seem to have done so. I find, however, quite a number of rules and regulations in this supplement, issued by E. T. Chamberlain, the commissioner of navigation, that affect the navigation of the waters of the United States, and they are all repealed. Then I find the same thing in further amendments to the navigation laws in 1911, the second supplement. Then here is another supplement of December 1, 1914. I will not take the time to go through these.

I have here, Mr. President, the Regulations of the United States Public Health Service for 1915, and on page 143 you will find the provisions of the statute under which rules and regulations may be made that affect the commerce of the United States with reference to the dealings with the public health and the protection of the public health in the navigation of ships.

Then here are the Regulations for the Revenue-Cutter Service. Of course those affect the shipping of the United States. Here is a volume of nearly 300 pages, and a great many of them contain the rules and regulations relating to the navigation laws of the country with reference to the navigation of the different harbors and coast waters of this country.

Mr. President, there are a great many other matters to which I should like to call the attention of the Senate, but I want briefly, to a certain extent, to summarize somewhat what I have said to-night, and especially with reference to the present legislative situation as we find it here.

The present legislative situation demonstrates the utter incapacity of the Democratic Party to conduct the legislative affairs of the Government. Utter demoralization exists in the legislative branch. The right of petition is denied. Representation is a farce, and the Constitution is as if it never was. This is the short session of Congress. It must terminate March 4, unless the President and his team devise some way to override the plain provision of the Constitution. Appropriation bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, must be passed this session or an extra session be called, or a resolution passed continuing the appropriations of the current year. The majority knew this when the session began. The session is now almost two-thirds gone and not a single regular appropriation bill has been passed. A small urgent deficiency bill has gone to the President. The District of Columbia bill has gone to conference and not another appropriation bill has even been considered in the Senate.

Legislative chaos exists. No bill can be passed. You can not even introduce a measure, nor can committees submit reports. Petitions from the people can not be presented by their duly elected representatives. We are no longer representatives. The minority is deprived of its rights by the majority and the majority has surrendered wholly to the Executive, and the Executive is commanding the impossible. We are at a legislative standstill. Never before in the history of the Government has such a condition existed in the Senate of the United States. What is the matter? Why are the people's interests so jeopardized and their rights so denied? The only answer would seem to be Democratic incapacity, but a better answer would be Democratic ossification through subserviency to inexperienced Executive domination. This does not mean that as individuals Democratic Senators are not able, experienced, energetic, learned, and patriotic men. The members of the majority are able and patriotic. Many of them have had long legislative experience. They know what can be done and what can not be done. They know what is necessary and what is not necessary in the passage of important legislation and they knew when this session opened that but little could be done, except to pass the necessary appropriation bills with the legislation that usually accompanies or is included in them.

It now takes over a billion dollars a year to run this Government. This must be provided for in the appropriation bills. It comes from the pockets of the people, and ought not to be taken from them without careful investigation and consideration. The Democratic Party denounced most vigorously the Republican Party for extravagant and wasteful expenditure of the people's money and appealed to the people to intrust it with power, with the assurance that extravagance and waste would be stopped and expenditures curtailed. They did not make a very enviable record in this respect for the present fiscal year. They increased appropriations over those made by the Republicans by over a hundred million dollars. They provided unusual and fictitious forms of tax and then passed a special measure to raise a hundred millions of dollars to take care of an evident deficiency in the revenues. In the face of this condition of things it would seem that ample time would have been desired for careful consideration of these great fiscal measures, in the hope of reducing them without impairing the efficiency of the service and at the same time relieve the people of some of the burdens they are less able to bear than formerly. Reasonable discussion can not be had without being accused of filibustering.

There were men on that side who knew that a proper consideration of these bills would take all of the time of the short session. If they did not know it, the wise, sagacious, sturdy, experienced legislator and patriotic Speaker of the House of Representatives knew it. His advice and counsel were available, and no one knew better the situation than he. He was quoted in the public press as saying that but little could be done this session except to pass the appropriation bills. Others of experience said the same thing. The Democratic majority, however, acts now not as legislators; they have ceased to be representatives of the people and of the States from which they come; they do not follow their own judgment; they are not guided by their own experience. They are the members of a team; this team has a captain. It is not theirs to reason why, but it is theirs to do as they are told; they have a captain who is not to be kept awake nights wondering what they are going to do; they must do what they are told, as all members of a team should do; the captain thinks for them, acts for them, rewards them if they are docile and punishes them if they are obstinate. The people no doubt thought they were electing men to represent them here, to speak for them here, to act for them here, and to enact legislation which they, as their representatives, believe for the people's best interest. They were mistaken. They elected men who were to carry out the will of the captain, regardless of their own views or the needs of their constituents; they elected many who are the servants of the Executive instead of the representatives of the people.

If the captain were an experienced legislator there would not be so much trouble, but when an experienced team is put under an inexperienced captain, nothing but disaster can follow. When this session opened, instead of being guided by experience, the captain told the team that he had a program and that it must be put through. The team knew that it could not be done, but, like all good teams fearful of punishment for disobediency, they could not or did not dare to argue with the captain. They did not or could not show him the impossibility and impracticability of getting such a program through. They got their orders. They started to work. They were not buoyant, confident, or hopeful. They were listless, discouraged, hopeless; outwardly cheerful, inwardly despondent. On the floor of the Senate daring and assertive; in the cloakroom mad and rebellious. What a team! What a situation! It is enough to make angels weep. Sorry for them? Yes. Pity for them? Yes. Respect for them as a team? Hardly. Unwelcome work is hard at best, but to work without hope, to labor without accomplishment, to struggle without success is torture. What were they told to do? Pass the appropriation bills, and what else? Well, they must pass a shipping bill, two conservation measures, and the Philippine bill. This was a program which any man of any legislative experience knew would require such consideration as would take at least a year to pass in proper shape. Of course, if the captain could have his own way these measures could be disposed of in a very few hours. In fact, having been prepared by the captain, he could not see any reason for hesitation on the part of the team to pass them without thought or consideration. Not only did he expect the members of his team to accept these measures without question or delay, but he seemed to expect those who still believed that they were sent here to represent the people and their own matured judgment and who were not willing to prove unfaithful to their trust to do the same and let these measures pass without consideration. His team in a halting, hesitating way has tried to obey his orders. The others had not and will not act without care and deliberation. With the captain of the team, because of inexperience or for some other reason, ordering the team to do the impossible and with the team knowing that what they have been ordered to do is impossible, striving blindly and recklessly to obey orders, has come about the legislative chaos now confronting us.

The situation is such that more important issues are arising than the proposed legislation itself. The bill now before the Senate is the shipping bill. No such proposition was ever before proposed by or to a legislative body. It involves questions of the most far-reaching importance upon which there are most radical differences of opinion, and at a time such as never before confronted the civilized world, and more important than all else, it is a measure which, if passed now, will soon involve us in the great conflict now raging among civilized nations of the world. I believe this with a deep conviction, and for this reason alone I deem the defeat of this measure imperative, at least, until this war is closed. This bill was introduced December 9, 1914. Who prepared it and where, I do not know. Who suggested it and what interests are to be benefited by it, I do not know. I have my ideas and I will express them later. It is a measure that has never been considered or discussed to any great extent in the country. I understand that the committee who considered it arbitrarily refused to give any hearing upon it. They needed no information. They wanted none. The captain had presented the measure and had given his orders. The team could see nothing wrong with it, even if they did not believe in the fundamental principles of it. They needed no information about it, they needed no discussion of its terms and provisions. It had the stamp of the captain upon it, and on December 16 they reported it favorably with only three or four immaterial and unimportant amendments. Very promptly a motion was made to make the bill the unfinished business. This carried. The effect was to bring it up automatically at 2 o'clock each day and continue it as the unfinished business from adjournment to adjournment, unless some other measures were taken up by motion. Upon adjournment to 12 o'clock the next day it would come up automatically at 2 o'clock, thus giving two hours for the introducing of bills, the presentation of petitions, the filing of committee reports, and consideration of other measures and bills on the calendar.

After some discussion in the Senate the team began to think that the bill was not exactly right. They reported to the captain. He gave his consent for its further consideration by the committee, and the committee, or the majority of it, determined to report an amendment by way of a substitute. Why, I do not know, but probably in the hope of securing some technical advantage, which they thought it might give them, and on January 16 this substitute was reported and presented to the Senate. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] pointed out most forcibly and ably some very serious objections to the bill as now framed. Members of the team began to get nervous. They did not believe in the fundamental principles of the bill, but they had not noticed the serious defects in it. They were willing to vote for it because they had been told to do so; but the defects were so glaring that they became uneasy. The captain saw signs of rebellion, and I suppose—of course I have no direct knowledge, but when a team gathers together we have a right to assume that it has done so at the direction of the captain—he suggested that they call a caucus, so that they might secretly consider the bill and bring the recalcitrants into line. This was done. The bill was not withdrawn, however. They refused to adjourn. We recessed from day to day. No other business could be considered. I suppose they hoped to have the objections to the measure pointed out in the Senate during the day and they would be able to consider them in the secret caucus at night. The Senate was forced to meet at 11 o'clock and kept in session continuously until 6 and sometimes later. On Friday, January 15, the majority forced a recess, and no adjournment was had thereafter, the legislative day of Friday, the 15th, continuing, until on the 26th, I believe, we ended this legislative day, and then started in and recessed and adjourned for a few days and recessed in order to let our Democratic friends caucus. We have now been in the legislative day, I think, since February 5.

The Senator from Ohio resumed his speech, which was interrupted by the discussion of the District of Columbia bill. He spoke for two or three days, and the Democrats said that he was filibustering. We have come to a strange situation. If we discuss a measure we are filibustering. He was not, but they were. Why did he speak for two or three days? Simply because they forced him to do it by their unusual, autocratic, and unjustifiable attitude. They gave notice that no man should speak more than twice on the bill on the same legislative day, and then declared they would keep us in one legislative day until the end of the session. The Senator from Ohio discussed the bill and the questions involved in it. All the time he wasted not a minute. His strong and valid objections he had to present, and the only way he could present them was to hold the floor. This discussion disclosed to the members of the team some glaring defects in the bill which they had accepted as infallibly drawn. The captain was advised. Something must be done. They dared not discuss the bill in the open Senate; as a matter of fact, but few of the gentlemen believed in the bill. They could not argue it in the open, where their positions and their statements would be a matter of public record. So they resorted again to the secret caucus, where no newspaper men could be present, where no record would be made, where all would be hidden from the public, where no information would be given to the people, and where individual opinion and judgment would be expected to bow to the force of numbers. They could not and can not discuss or defend this measure in debate on this floor, so they discuss and decide in secret, and will come to the Senate by and by and try to put it through not by arguing, not on its merits, but by force of numbers and without discussing what they dare not leave to the honest, fair, and untrammeled judgment of the people's representatives. They would not withdraw the bill, which they know must be changed and amended. They would not allow other matters to be considered while they thrash this out in caucus. They would not adjourn, but kept the bill which they would not discuss and which they expected to change before the Senate. They would not talk on the floor of the Senate because they did not have to, but they flock to the secret caucus night after night and talk. On Friday they decided they would meet Saturday to continue their secret caucus. Did they adjourn until Monday? That would have ended the legislative day and given an opportunity for further discussion of the bill. That would have given an opportunity to have a morning hour in which bills could be presented, the people's petitions heard, reports of the committees submitted, and other bills now on the calendar taken up. They did not want to do this, so they continued the legislative day of Friday the 15th over until Monday.

They are bringing out another substitute. They have learned something from the arguments of those whom their captain has deemed fit to call "ignorant Republicans." Why do not they present it to the Senate? They have not done it. Maybe they are waiting to learn some more. All this time they have been charging us with filibustering, when, as a matter of fact, they are the real filibusters. They have not had their measure in shape to submit it, and yet they have absolutely prevented anything else from being considered. Now, when they get their bill shaved down just as far as the captain will permit, they expect us to accept it without discussion and without questioning. If we do discuss it they will sound their tom-toms and cry "filibuster." Deliberation within the sealed walls of the secret caucus is statesmanship and protection of the people's interests; debating on the open floor of the Senate is filibustering and a sacrifice of the people's rights. We want the bill they propose to enact considered in the usual parliamentary way. The secret caucus will be arbitrarily forced through by any possible method, through the power and under the leadership of a man who has spoken most earnestly and eloquently, and I have no doubt sincerely, in behalf of publicity in public affairs and in legislation. The Democratic Party under that leader has followed more secret methods than any party has ever dared to follow in the history of the Republic. A few years ago the country rang with denunciation of Republican caucus or ring rule, and yet there have been more secret caucuses held by the majority of this body during the last two years than were held the entire period from 1896 to 1912.

I have been reading a book which I have heard quoted on this floor many times and, strange to say, it is never by the majority. It is a book they would do well to read. They can learn much from it. It might give them some courage, some backbone, some stamina. It might furnish them a justification for standing by their convictions, for insisting upon fair and open discussion, and for acting as representatives of a great people, rather than as docile, unthinking members of a team. I want to read from this book. It is entitled "The New Freedom," by Woodrow Wilson.

It is a very interesting book, and I have enjoyed reading it exceedingly much, and I think it is very apropos with reference to the measure which we now have under consideration. At page 57 I find this language:

> Suppose you go to Washington and try to get at your Government. You will always find that while you are politely listened to, the men really consulted are the men who have the biggest stake—the big bankers, the big manufacturers, the big masters of commerce, the heads of railroad corporations and steamship corporations.

Mr. President, that was never truer than during the last two years. We have had these railroad men coming down here seeking the influence of persons in high authority to influence the Interstate Commerce Commission in its decision with reference to railroad rates. We have had all sorts of interests represented. Now, I do not condemn that. I think it is proper that the President of the United States should consult with men great and prominent in the various lines of industry throughout the country; but the President seemed to think that when people come down here the ordinary people could not get at the Government, that only the big men and the big interests could do it. That was never more true than it has been during the last two years.

Then he says:

> You know just as well as I do—it is not an indictment against anybody; it is a mere statement of the facts—that the people have stood outside and looked on at their own Government, and that all they have had to determine in past years has been which crowd they would look on at, whether they would look on at this little group or that little group who had managed to get the control of affairs in its hands. Have you ever heard, for example, of any hearing before any great committee of the Congress in which the people of the country as a whole were represented, except it may be by the Congressmen themselves?

Why, Mr. President, who is better able to represent the people than the representatives whom they have selected—whom they have sent here? There have been some self-constituted guardians of the people's rights and interests who have appeared before some of the committees, but they never have seemed to accomplish very much; but I submit that Senators and Representatives who have been selected by the people are really the best representatives they have. They are men of experience. They are men who are pretty thoroughly acquainted with the methods of those who come to Washington City to influence either committees or departments. They know better, to use a common expression, how to checkmate these influences than anybody else can know. Again, he says:

> The men who appear at those meetings in order to argue for or against a schedule in the tariff, for this measure or against that measure, are men who represent special interests. They may represent them very honestly, they may intend no wrong to their fellow citizens, but they are speaking from the point of view always of a small portion of the population. I have sometimes wondered why men, particularly men of means, men who didn't have to work for their living, shouldn't constitute themselves attorneys for the people, and every time a hearing is held before a committee of Congress should not go and ask, "Gentlemen, in considering these things, suppose you consider the whole country. Suppose you consider the citizens of the United States."

Mr. President, I think that is a very serious indictment against the Members of Congress, and one that is not justified, because my experience and observation has been that Senators and Representatives do try to represent the interests of their people and not special interests; and nobody is better able to weigh the arguments that are presented to the committee by the representatives of the special interests than Members of the House and the Senate. It is true that these special interests are often represented before committees by able men—railroad interests, for example. They send the brightest and the strongest attorneys in the country to these committees to present their case, and so all the great interests of the country do this; and there rests the real test of the efficiency of any Representative, that on the committee before whom these bright and brilliant men are appearing he is able to weigh the facts that are presented and determine what is for the best interests of the people and what is against their best interests.

He says:

I don't want a smug lot of experts to sit down behind closed doors in Washington and play Providence to me. There is a Providence to which I am perfectly willing to submit. But as for other men setting up as Providence over myself, I seriously object. I have never met a political savior in the flesh, and I never expect to meet one.

That is true. That is a correct statement. I approve every word of that. What I have been objecting to with reference to this legislation and with reference to a great deal of the legislation our Democratic friends have proposed is not so much the legislation, but it is the manner and the method by which they have been trying to put it through. They have seemed to think that they have a political savior that must save the people and save Congress and save the people from Congress.

Then he says:

That is the way I feel about this saving of my fellow countrymen. I'd rather see a savior of the United States than set up to be one, because I have found out—I have actually found out—that men I consult with know more than I do, especially if I consult with enough of them. I never came out of a committee meeting or a conference without seeing more of the question that was under discussion than I had seen when I went in. And that to my mind is an image of government.

Oh, Mr. President, that we would follow that suggestion! That the Senate of the United States would follow that suggestion! That instead of going behind closed doors we would do as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] wanted to do, bring these bills in here, have the amendments offered on the open floor of the Senate, consider them in free, deliberate, and open debate, pass upon them on their merits, and frame up the legislation in the proper sort of a way. That, Mr. President, is in harmony with the suggestions of the President in his book on the New Freedom; but the trouble is that it does not seem to be carried out in practice.

I am one of those who absolutely reject the trustee theory, the guardianship theory. I have never found a man who knew how to take care of me, and, reasoning from that point out, I conjecture that there isn't any man who knows how to take care of all the people of the United States. I suspect that the people of the United States understand their own interests better than any group of men in the confines of the country understand them.

Why, I agree with that. I think that is so, and that is another reason why I object to these methods here. The trouble is that the captain and the team seem to assume that they know all about the proposed legislation; they know all about how to do it, and they can not get any information from this side; that discussion with us does not help them any. Yet, as I have pointed out in this discussion and have shown by the different bills that have been reported, the different substitutes that have been brought in here, they have not only learned something from us, but they have really profited from it, and I am glad of it.

Then, on page 90 of this valuable work, I find language like this:

Congress, in accordance with the genius of the land, which asks for action and is impatient of words—Congress has become an institution which does its work in the privacy of committee rooms and not on the floor of the Chamber; a body that makes laws—a legislature—not a body that debates; not a parliament.

Mr. President, this ought to be changed. It ought to be changed to read that Congress has become an institution which does its work in the privacy of a caucus—the privacy of a secret chamber with locked doors—with the press excluded, with nobody but the members of the team present to hear and discuss; a body that makes laws through a caucus, through the rule of the majority; not a body that debates.

Mr. President, this body was never before so nearly a body that does not debate as it has been for some time.

I conceive it to be one of the needs of the hour to restore the processes of common counsel and to substitute them for the processes of private arrangement which now determine the policies of cities, States, and Nation. We must learn, we freemen, to meet as our fathers did, somehow, somewhere, for consultation. There must be discussion and debate, in which all freely participate.

Mr. President, I heartily indorse that. That expresses my sentiments far better than I could express them, but it expresses a situation that has practically ceased to exist now under the leadership of the learned gentleman who wrote this language. Again, he says:

Good will it be for the country if the interest in public concerns manifested so widely and so sincerely be not suffered to expire with the election. Why should political debate go on only when somebody is to be elected? Why should it be confined to campaign time?

That is good advice, too. It is profitable for us to carry on political debate on this floor and to hold political discussions among the Members of opposite parties. It brings about good legislation, correct ideas, and proper action. And then I find this:

The burden that is upon the heart of every conscientious public man is the burden of the thought that perhaps he does not sufficiently comprehend the national life. For, as a matter of fact, no single man does comprehend it. The whole purpose of democracy is that we may hold counsel with one another, so as not to depend upon the understanding of one man, but to depend upon the counsel of all.

I do not understand that the President used the word "democracy" there in a partisan sense. I understand that he used it in the broad governmental sense, and in that I agree heartily with him.

For only as men are brought into counsel and state their own needs and interests can the general interests of a great people be compounded into a policy that will be suitable to all.

How applicable that language is to the bill that is now pending before this body—a bill that affects more great fundamental questions of government than almost any bill that has been presented here for a great many years. How important it is for the interests of the people of the country that such a great measure shall be considered in the open; that we shall take counsel together; that debate shall clarify doubt and uncertainty and bring about that which is for the best interests of the people of the country, and, as he so well says, that will be suitable to all. He says, again:

There are very few of us who have had any real access to the Government. It ought to be a matter of common counsel.

And so say I.

A matter of united counsel; a matter of mutual comprehension. So—

Listen—

So keep the air clear with constant discussion.

"Keep the air clear with constant discussion." Surely that is what we are trying to do on this side of the Chamber. They are not helping us much on the other side. Listen to this:

Make every public servant feel that he is acting in the open and under scrutiny.

What about this acting in caucus behind closed doors? Is that acting in the open? Is that acting under constant scrutiny? Not at all.

And, above all things else, take these great fundamental questions of your lives with which political platforms concern themselves and search them through and through by every process of debate.

Those that are his friends on the other side should take his advice. Search these questions through and through by the processes of debate. Listen, and this comes under a title "Let there be light":

What are the right methods of politics? Why, the right methods are those of public discussion.

I wish I could get our Democratic friends to read this book. It is certainly a very interesting book. It certainly does contain a great deal of very valuable information as to legislative bodies and legislative circles, and it was never more apropos than right now.

The methods of leadership open and aboveboard, not closeted with "boards of guardians" or anybody else, but brought out under the sky, where honest eyes can look upon them and honest eyes can judge them.

Mr. President, that sounds so good I must read it again. This is from President Wilson in his "New Freedom." As I understand it, these were speeches made after he was elected to the Presidency but before he was inaugurated. He kept up the political discussion, as he suggests it ought to be done. Listen:

What are the right methods of politics? Why, the right methods are those of public discussion; the methods of leadership open and aboveboard, not closeted with "boards or guardians" or anybody else, but brought out under the sky, where honest eyes can look upon them and honest eyes can judge of them.

Oh, will you take this to heart?

If there is nothing to conceal, then why conceal it?—

That is a very pertinent question and a very proper one at this time—

If it is a public game, why play it in private? If it is a public game, then why not come out into the open and play it in public?

I ask my friends on the other side, Why not play it in the open? Call it a game, if you please. I do not think that is a very appropriate term for a great legislative body like this. I do not think we are a team here. I think we are independent, and ought to be independent, representatives of great States and great constituencies, acting as our judgment dictates and our conscience approves for the best interests and the welfare of the people of the country. Yet if you want to call it a game, why play it in private? If it is a public game, then why not come out in the open and play it in public? Is this open business here in the Senate? It ought to be. It is the business of the people here. It ought to be done in this Chamber, not in the secret recesses of the private caucus. Yes, Mr. President, let there be light. Listen:

You have got to cure diseased politics as we nowadays cure tuberculosis, by making all the people who suffer from it live out of doors—not only spend their days out of doors and walk around, but sleep out of doors; always remain in the open, where they will be accessible to fresh, nourishing, and revivifying influences.

Would that we had the fifty-odd Members on the other side to listen to this sentence:

I—

Woodrow Wilson, President elect of the United States—

I, for one, have the conviction that government ought to be all outside and no inside.

If that does not mean that there ought to be no government in caucus and that it all ought to be out in the open Senate, I do not know what language does mean.

I, for my part, believe that there ought to be no place where anything can be done that everybody does not know about.

Just think! That comes from the captain of the team which has been playing this game in secret session after session on bill after bill.

I, for my part, believe that there ought to be no place where anything can be done that everybody does not know about. It would be very inconvenient for some gentlemen, probably, if government were all outside, but we have consulted their susceptibilities too long already.

Mr. President, when you examine this bill that you have now before you, it shows that it would have been well if it could have been considered in the open; if it could have been considered all on the outside and not at all on the inside. We could have helped our friends on the other side a great deal more than we have done if we could have had them consider this matter in the open.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. JONES. I have uniformly refused to yield, for quite a while, for a question or otherwise, and I want to appeal to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington does not yield for a question.

Mr. JONES. I refuse to yield for a question. I have refused to yield for a question, and I want to treat everybody alike. I want to be neutral in this matter as much as possible.

So, our honest politicians and our honorable corporation heads owe it to their reputations to bring their activities out into the open. At any rate, whether they like it or not, these affairs are going to be dragged into the open. We are more anxious about their reputations than they are themselves. We are too solicitous for their morals—if they are not—to permit them longer to continue subject to the temptations of secrecy. You know there is temptation in loneliness and secrecy—

We all know that—

Haven't you experienced it? I have—

Listen—

Haven't you experienced it? I have. We are never so proper in our conduct as when everybody can look and see exactly what we are doing.

Woodrow Wilson is saying that, now the President of the United States, whose advice is just as good now as it was at the time it was uttered, and it was splendid advice then. Listen:

Publicity is one of the purifying elements of politics. The best thing that you can do with anything that is crooked is to lift it up where people can see that it is crooked, and then it will either straighten itself out or disappear. Nothing checks all the bad practices of politics like public exposure. You can't be crooked in the light. I don't know whether it has ever been tried or not, but I venture to say, purely from observation, that it can't be done.

Now, listen. He tells us what the people of the United States have decided. I think the people of the United States had decided, and they probably thought that they were going to do it, but my judgment is that they think now they have been mistaken and that they have not gotten what they expected or what they desired.

And so the people of the United States have made up their minds to do a healthy thing for both politics and big business. Permit me to mix a few metaphors: They are going to open doors; they are going to let up blinds; they are going to drag sick things into the open air and into the light of the sun.

Mr. President, there has not been very much done along that line recently. This is what he had to say with reference to lawmaking in America:

But, unfortunately, the whole process of lawmaking in America is a very obscure one. There is no highway of legislation, but there are many byways. Parties are not organized in such a way in our legislatures as to make any one group of men avowedly responsible for the course of legislation. The whole process of discussion, if any discussion at all takes place, is private and shut away from public scrutiny and knowledge. There are so many circles within circles, there are so many indirect and private ways of getting at legislative action, that our communities are constantly uneasy during legislative sessions. It is this confusion and obscurity and privacy of our legislative method that gives the political machine its opportunity. There is no publicly responsible man or group of men who are known to formulate legislation and to take charge of it from the time of its introduction until the time of its enactment.

Now, listen to what the President is trying to do. I rather think that if he would work a little more actively in tune with his talk probably he might accomplish more. I wish he would. I approve very heartily of what he says.

I am striving to indicate my belief that our legislative methods may well be reformed in the direction of giving more open publicity to every act, in the direction of setting up some form of responsible leadership on the floor of our legislative halls, so that the people may know who is back of every bill and back of the opposition to it, and so that it may be dealt with in the open chamber rather than in the committee room. The light must be let in on all processes of lawmaking.

Mr. President, it is in the committee rooms where legislation dies. It is largely in caucus.

Legislation, as we nowadays conduct it, is not conducted in the open. It is not thrashed out in open debate upon the floors of our assemblies. It is, on the contrary, framed, digested, and concluded in committee rooms.

Of course, if this were written now it would have to be revised. It is, to the contrary, framed outside in a caucus room.

It is in committee rooms that legislation not desired by the interests dies. It is in committee rooms that legislation desired by the interests is framed and brought forth. There is not enough debate of it in open house, in most cases, to disclose the real meaning of the proposals made. Clauses lie quietly unexplained and unchallenged in our statutes which contain the whole gist and purpose of the act; qualifying phrases which escape the public attention, casual definitions which do not attract attention, classifications so technical as not to be generally understood, and which everyone most intimately concerned is careful not to explain or expound, contain the whole purpose of the law. Only after it has been enacted and has come to adjudication in the courts is its scheme as a whole divulged. The beneficiaries are then safe behind their bulwarks.

This is so interesting that it is real hard to stop. I am very anxious to get through very soon, but this is so interesting. Listen to what he says. This is from President Wilson:

Take any question you like out to the country—let it be thrashed out in public debate—and you will have made these methods impossible.

What methods? These secret methods; these methods not in the open day; these methods behind closed doors. Yes; we would like to discuss them in the open Senate. We would like to discuss them before the people of the country and let them decide. Listen. It gets better as you get along.

There is not any legitimate privacy about matters of government.

My friends, I wish you would listen to that.

There is not any legitimate privacy about matters of government. Government must, if it is to be pure and correct in its processes, be absolutely public in everything that affects it. I can not imagine a public man with a conscience having a secret that he would keep from the people about their own affairs.

He says further:

Well, I am very sorry, but nothing is legitimate that can not be understood.

Then after that he goes on to tell about how brave men have been working for the people, and so forth, and how they have forced bills out of committees by making threats of what they would do, and so forth, if this was not done. Then he says:

Those are processes which stand between the people and the things that are promised them, and I say that until you drive all of those things into the open, you are not connected with your Government; you are not represented—

That is what we have been saying. We have been saying that our friends on the other side have been denying the people representation in their caucus and secret methods; and that is exactly what your President said—

You are not participants in your Government.

* * * * * * *

There is no air so wholesome as the air of utter publicity.

Now, then, listen how he concludes this chapter on "Let there be light":

So I take it to be a necessity of the hour to open up all the processes of politics and of public business—open them wide to public view, to make them accessible to every force that moves, every opinion that prevails in the thought of the people; to give society command of its own economic life again, not by revolutionary measures, but by a steady application of the principle that the people have a right to look into such matters and to control them; to cut all privileges and patronage and private advantage and secret enjoyment out of legislation—

Listen—

Wherever any public business is transacted, wherever plans affecting the public are laid, or enterprises touching the public welfare, comfort, or convenience go forward, wherever political programs are formulated, or candidates agreed on—over that place a voice must speak with the divine prerogative of the people's will, the words "Let there be light!"

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hardly think it possible——

Mr. JONES. I should be glad if I could do so, but I could not yield, as I have tried to be impartial to my friends on both sides of the Chamber.

Mr. President, if you have paid no attention to what I have said, I hope you will heed what I have read. Surely you will not spurn that, surely you will not consider it unworthy of your study. It will do you good to consider it; it will be better for you to follow it. As I said before, you are trying to do the impossible, not because you do not know better, but because you are obeying orders. You are trying to act as a team of irresponsible, unthinking, automatic, rubber stamped, pseudo representatives under the orders of a captain who has never had any experience in the work you are expected to do. There is not one of the team who does not know better than the captain the difficulties in the way and what ought to be done. Knowing that you can not do the things ordered in the usual and courteous way, you are trying to bluff them through and put them through in an unusual and brutal way. You will override the Constitution and nullify rules of this body. The Constitution says "each House shall be the judge," and so forth, "and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business." It is clearly the constitutional right of any Member of the Senate to have a quorum present while business is being done. You nullify this provision by arbitrarily holding that one Senator can not interrupt another in debate to make the point of no quorum.

I am glad to say that to-night we have turned back to the Constitution of our fathers, that we have gone back to the old rule that a Senator has the constitutional right to raise the point of no quorum when the Senate is vacant. I hope the Senate will never again depart from that ruling; and I further hope that that privilege will not be abused. I shall not even abuse it upon this measure, much as I desire to see it defeated. Because you have a majority of the votes to uphold a rule to this effect you deny the Members of this body one of the specific rights given by the Constitution. To raise the point of no quorum is to make the highest point of order that can be made, and in denying the right to do it, you not only override the Constitution, but you arbitrarily set aside one of the positive rules of the Senate. Of course, in view of the ruling of the Chair during the night and the action of the Senate in tabling the appeal from the decision of the Chair, those statements are now really obsolete and out of date.

Rule XX says:

A question of order may be raised at any stage of the proceedings, except when the Senate is dividing.

Nothing can be clearer than that; there is no room for construction. It does not say the point can not be made if a Senator is speaking and refuses to yield. It can be made at any time, "except when the Senate is dividing." It is the right of any Senator, independent of the wishes of any other Senator. A Senator's constitutional right, however, to have a quorum present when business is done is higher than any rule, does not depend upon any rule, and could not be avoided, suspended, or destroyed by any rule. To avoid this plain provision of the Constitution you arbitrarily hold that intelligent, able, legitimate discussion is not business. The presentation of petitions from some humble citizens of Hoosier Creek is business, while able, learned, and wise discussion of profound questions involving the happiness and welfare of millions of people or the stability of the Government itself is not business. The weeks of discussion and consideration of an intricate and far-reaching measure is not business, but the mere casting of the vote recording the conclusions reached from such discussion is business. Such a position is not only unwise but it is absolutely ridiculous and unworthy of a great deliberating body.

You refuse to adjourn. You continue the legislative day for a week or more. Why? Because you have the votes and want to take advantage of quibbles under the rules. By this method you prevent the use of the morning hour for the presentation of petitions, the introduction of bills, the submission of committee reports, and the consideration of bills on the calendar. By this method you would prevent a Senator from speaking more than twice on the same subject in a week or a month, instead of on one day, as the rules provide. You are following methods beside which justice court practices are paragons of fairness. Records are kept to see that a Senator does not speak more than twice during one legislative day, no matter how long it may be, on one subject. Senators are watched with hawk-like vigilance to see if some advantage can not be gained, to see if they can not be tripped up in some way and taken from the floor.

Senators must watch each other, scanning carefully the actions of each other to see that no advantage may be secured. If a speaker is interrupted by another, he must be careful to yield only for a question, for fear that the majority will declare his speech at an end and the floor yielded. Now, when a Senator is interrupted by another, he says, "I will gladly yield if I may without losing the floor," or "I will yield for a question only." What a travesty upon a deliberating body! What a spectacle was presented here the other day! The Senator from Mississippi, learned, eloquent, witty, entertaining, philosophical, wise, and profound, and a member of the majority, dared not yield to the Senator from New Jersey, who confidently believed that he could, and impulsively sought to demolish a statement just made by the junior Senator from Massachusetts. Why not? Because he feared we Republicans would claim the same right. The idea of a deliberating body being forced into such a ridiculous position is humiliating.

I am glad to believe, Mr. President, that we are going to adopt and follow more reasonable rules and methods in this body from now on. I believe that the Senate will rise above such really little things, and act in a broad, wise, and statesmanlike way; that the privileges of this body will not be abused; that the rights of Members will not be denied; and that the Senate will consider questions as a really and truly legislative body.

And right here let me say that the partisan rulings and attempts to which I have referred have not been made by the Vice President. Though a partisan, he recognizes that he is Vice President of all the people and the impartial Presiding Officer of the Senate. He tries to enforce our rules as they are and not as party exigency may demand, and has been uniformly courteous, fair, and impartial. If the rules should be changed, he is not going to do it, but will leave it to the Senate to act in its own way.

Before we knew what your bill would be, before you knew what it would be, you were threatening us with night sessions, with continuous sessions. Though confining our discussion strictly to what you had presented and the propositions involved, you have repeatedly declared our debate unfair, dishonest, and unjustifiable; and on Tuesday, you had just reported your caucus measure, the Senate manager of the team obeying orders of the captain, too.

These are not the methods of legislators. They are the methods of a football team acting under secret instructions to defeat their opponents or kill them.

Legislation that must be conducted in secret caucus and enacted by such methods does not have public sentiment behind it and is legitimately subject to the presumption that it is unfair and unwise legislation, that it is filled with jokers that will not bear discussion, and that it is being enacted for the benefit of some special interest that its sponsors think is not yet known but which they fear will be disclosed by discussion. By the methods which you have adopted interchange of ideas is impossible; fair, illuminating, and instructive discussion is prevented. The deliberate character of the Senate is destroyed and representative government is a farce. Under partisan Democracy that branch of the legislative department of the Government which has heretofore preserved its deliberative character, and in which all of the important legislation of the century has been perfected, has ceased to exist, if your methods prevail, and it has become simply the recorder of the autocratic direction of the captain of a political team of Punch and Judy automatons sent here as the representatives of the people.

So, Mr. President, I am in favor of our asserting our representative character. I believe that we ought to proceed to the consideration of measures which we can pass and which we ought to pass. Measures have been waiting long on the calendar for consideration that will bring relief to many of our deserving citizens and danger to none. These bills ought to be considered—they ought to be passed—and for these reasons I had hoped to move to proceed to the consideration of the bills on the calendar.

We ought to lay aside this bill; it can not be enacted into law at this session of Congress. We ought to take up the measures that are necessary for the conduct of this Government; we ought to pass legislation that the people are vitally interested in and that will greatly benefit them. Then let us go to our constituencies and talk this bill over. Let us go out in the open, as President Wilson suggests, in the clear, open day and in the open sunlight and get the expression of the people upon this great measure. Let them know what it is; let them understand it; let them know what its provisions are, what its principles are, what its effects are likely to be, what dangers are likely to be encountered, and then let the people say whether or not they want this legislation; and if they do, they will get it. It is not enough to say we want to build up a merchant marine. Of course we do. Will this bill do it? That is the question to be considered.

Mr. President, I have considerable more matter here, and I should like very much to proceed for some time longer, but I understand that one of my friends on this side of the Chamber is very anxious to present some matters in connection with this bill.

I hope that our friends on the other side will look very carefully, indeed, into that provision of the bill which repeals all of the rules and regulations affecting the water-borne commerce of the United States. I hope that they will look very carefully into that provision which repeals the rules and regulations affecting all the water-borne commerce and craft of the Great Lakes, the Gulf, the rivers, the sounds, and all the bodies of water of this country.

I ask you why are you doing it? What is the reason for it? Who has suggested it? Why are you going to put all of the commerce of this country under a political body? Why are you going to take it out from under officials who are thoroughly acquainted with the situation and the conditions, who have for years been framing the rules and regulations on which the commerce of the country is acting? At whose suggestion are you repealing this? Who has asked you to take the shipping board, which you started out to put in charge of Government ships, and put it over all of the shipping commerce and water-borne commerce of the United States Government? What are you going to gain by it? What are you going to accomplish by it? Why should you put it in this bill at all? Strike it out and do not run the risk of all the complications and the confusion that is likely to result from this unwise and uncalled for provision of unknown and secret origin.

Mr. President, I am glad to yield the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	James	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Jones	Owen	Smoot
Bristow	Kern	Page	Thomas
Bryan	Lane	Pomerene	Thompson
Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Thornton
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Reed	Walsh
Crawford	Lippitt	Shafroth	Warren
Dillingham	McCumber	Sheppard	White
du Pont	McLean	Simmons	Williams
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.	Works
Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Hollis	Myers	Smith, Md.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily detained from the Chamber on important business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators having answered to the roll call, there is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. PITTMAN answered to his name when called.

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce that the return of the Sergeant at Arms at 5.30 o'clock this morning said that the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] has been called to New York last night on account of illness in his family.

Mr. FALL, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. HUGHES entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, under the direction of the Senate last night the Sergeant at Arms was required to compel the attendance of absent Senators. He has made a number of reports. I ask that they may be read to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the reports of the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is not in order until we develop a quorum.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a part of the procedure to compel a quorum, and is therefore necessarily in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the motion is in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a moment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the matter is not debatable. No business can be transacted in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is just the point I am making. When the order was issued before, there was a quorum developed. Now it develops that there is no quorum, and no business can be attended to until that quorum is developed. An order can be issued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is now present.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to be recorded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. How many Senators have answered to the roll call?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators, including the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, this ship-purchase bill is before us——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota is not in order. The reading of the reports of the Sergeant at Arms has been requested as a matter of order of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not understand that that was requested. I understood it was requested before a quorum was announced. After a quorum was announced I had the floor, and I have not yielded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is not in order when that order is before the Senate, because that is a part of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Absolutely.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not understand that it has been requested since I took the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was requested before the Senator took the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then it was requested before there was a quorum.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is not entitled to the floor until the presence of a quorum is announced, and the Chair never recognized the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will appeal to the record. I am not in the habit of proceeding unless I have recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from North Dakota, but the rules of the Senate require the presence of Senators who have not been excused from the Senate, and it is in order to read the reports of the Sergeant at Arms. The Secretary will read them.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that after a Senator has been recognized immediately after the Chair has announced the presence of a quorum he can not be taken from his feet for intervening business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair, and on the appeal I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota appeals from the decision of the Chair. The Senator from Tennessee moves to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. McCUMBER. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I was temporarily absent from the Chamber when this matter arose, and I confess I do not know what matter is before the Senate. I therefore ask to be excused from voting.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the Chair may inform the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota appealed from the decision of the Chair, the Chair having decided that under the rules of the Senate the reports of the Sergeant at Arms were in order to be read, as a matter of order.

Mr. CLAPP. After a quorum had been developed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. After a quorum had been developed. The Senator from Tennessee moved to lay on the table the appeal of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I know the Chair does not want to make the record different from what I made it.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. Regular order!

Mr. McCUMBER. My point of order was that after——

Mr. CHILTON. Regular order!

Mr. McCUMBER (continuing). After the Chair had announced that a quorum was present, and immediately recognized me, I could not be taken off my feet for the purpose indicated.

Mr. JAMES. Regular order!

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to ask if the Chair had recognized the Senator from North Dakota?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator after that motion had been made.

Mr. CLAPP. Under those circumstances, I think the Chair's ruling was correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to correct that statement of the record again.

Mr. JAMES. I ask for the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. Regular order!

Mr. McCUMBER. I want the Chair to state it all, so that Senators may understand the situation accurately; that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll is being called, and the Chair is not called upon to go into a general discussion of what has transpired in the Senate. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will inform them, then.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and will allow my vote to remain.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I will withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PERKINS. Has the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. PERKINS. I have a general pair with him and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. COLT. I am paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PERKINS. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To make a quorum, the present occupant of the chair will vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 16, as follows:

So the appeal from the decision of the Chair was laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report of the Sergeant at Arms.

The Secretary proceeded to read as follows:

February 9, 1915, 7 a. m.——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think the Secretary ought to start with the earlier report and come on down. This is the last report.

Mr. SMOOT. They have been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have been read in due order.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that they now appear in the record.

Mr SMITH of Georgia. They do not appear in the record. There was one at 3 o'clock and another at half past four and another at 5 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They were read and marked at the time of their reading. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read as follows:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SERGEANT AT ARMS,
February 9, 1915—7 a. m.

To the PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE SENATE.

SIR: Pursuant to the order directing me to compel the absent Senators attendance, I herewith report as follows:

At 5.30 a. m. Shoreham Hotel reported that Senator FALL had not been there all night.

At 6.15 a. m. Senator GOFF, at the Portland, reported that he was not feeling well and would come to the Chamber as soon as possible.

At 6.30 a. m. Senator NORRIS appeared in the Senate Chamber.

At 6.30 still unable to locate Senator HARDWICK.

At 6.45 a. m. Senator NELSON appeared in the Senate Chamber.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES P. HIGGINS,
Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, is it in order now to ask for an order of the Senate to compel the attendance of absent Senators?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, it is in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. I offer this order.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I did not hear my name read in the report of the Sergeant at Arms. I was in the Chamber between half past 6 and a quarter of 7. It was within the time covered by the report. I had not seen any agent of the Senate previous to that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will announce a further report from the Sergeant at Arms, and it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SERGEANT AT ARMS,
February 9, 1915—8.30 a. m.

To the PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE SENATE.

SIR: Pursuant to the order of the Senate instructing me to compel the attendance of absent Senators, I beg to further report as follows:

Senator DILLINGHAM entered the Senate Chamber at 7 a. m.

Senator BRISTOW appeared in the Senate Chamber at 7.15 a. m.

Senator FALL and Senator WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH have both appeared in the Senate Chamber since I made my last report.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES P. HIGGINS,
Sergeant at Arms United States Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that the Senator from Florida has asked that an order be issued?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has.

Mr. SMOOT. For information I would like to ask if the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has been recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has, and he has not lost the recognition on account of the intervening proceedings.

Mr. SMOOT. Under what rule is it possible to have an order issued when a Senator has been recognized and has started to speak?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under a rule of order.

Mr. SMOOT. There is also a rule of order which says:

When a Senator desires to speak he shall rise and address the Presiding Officer, and shall not proceed until he is recognized, and the Presiding Officer shall recognize the Senator who shall first address him. No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent, and to obtain such consent he shall first address the Presiding Officer.

I do not see, with all due respect to the ruling just made, how it is possible to entertain any order, with the exceptions that the rules state. The rule is plain that a conference report is always in order, and also a message from the President of the United States or from the House of Representatives, but no other business.

All I care for is the rules of the body. I do not care anything about this order at all; only I think we ought to comply with the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, Rule V requires Senators to be present in the Chamber unless they are excused by the Senate. It therefore is a matter of order that they shall discharge their functions in this body and be in their seats. The Senate having given an order to the Sergeant at Arms requiring them to be present and to compel their attendance, it is in order to take further steps necessary to enforce that rule.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so that the record may be clear, the rule provides that—

No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri rises to a point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been recognized for a point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. The point of order I rose to submit is that that is no point of order and is out of order.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state my point of order. The point of order is that Rule V states that no Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave, and then it also says "in the absence of a quorum," and so forth. We have a quorum here.

Mr. REED I make the point of order that the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. I have the right to make the point of order. I have the floor to make the point of order.

Mr. REED. I wish to state a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that the Senator from Utah should be permitted to state his point of order. Then the Chair will recognize the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not desire to debate it.

No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave.

Then—

If at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum.

My point of order is that there is a quorum present and a Senator has been recognized and began his speech and there is not anything on the face of the record to show that there is not a quorum here. There is not anything on the face of the record to show that a majority of the Senators are not in the service of the Senate at this very moment. I make the point of order that the motion or order asked for by the Senator from Florida is not in order under Rule V or any other rule of this body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling of the Chair was in the light of a quorum being present. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to take up the time of the Senate.

Mr. REED. The Presiding Officer having permitted the Senator from Utah to make an argument instead of a point of order over my protest I have nothing further to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask for the adoption of the order which I have submitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Whereas under the rules of the Senate a call of the Senate was ordered; and

Whereas the following-named Senators are absent without leave of the Senate, to wit: Messrs. BANKHEAD, BORAH, BURTON, CAMDEN, CATRON, GOFF, HARDWICK, HITCHCOCK, LODGE, OLIVER, O'GORMAN, ROOT, STERLING, SUTHERLAND, VARDAMAN, and WEEKS; and

Whereas it is necessary to compel the attendance of absent Senators: Therefore it is Ordered, That the Sergeant at Arms be, and hereby is, directed to compel the attendance on the Senate of said named absent Senators; and it is further ordered that warrants for the arrest of said Senators be issued under the signature of the Presiding Officer, attested by the Secretary, and that the Sergeant at Arms be, and hereby is, directed to execute such warrants forthwith by arresting each of said named Senators and bringing him before the bar of the Senate, and that he make due return to the Senate of the execution of said warrants, and that this order shall be continuing until fully executed unless otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the name of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] be stricken from the list because he has appeared.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I notice that my name also appears.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, of course, I make the same request as to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The names of these two Senators will be stricken from the list.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that the record may be kept clear, I wish to say that I do not yield for this purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER and others. Question!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Florida. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it.

Mr. REED. I offer the following order supplemental to the order just entered and for the same purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Until otherwise ordered by the Senate, the following shall be a standing order of the Senate:

All Senators are required to appear forthwith in the Senate Chamber and to remain in the Chamber until excused by the Senate. Any Senator disobeying this order shall be in contempt of the Senate and shall be brought to the bar of the Senate and dealt with as the Senate may order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that certainly is a most extraordinary order. I do not apprehend that any Senator during the last 24 hours has absented himself because he desired to be in contempt of the Senate or to do anything that was not right. I was rather tired last evening, after an eight-hour session, and went to my home and was summoned at 3 o'clock back to the Senate, and I came, and felt it my duty to come. I have tried to be here constantly day in and day out.

Now, Mr. President, to establish an order of that kind, I believe, is without parallel. It may have had a parallel at some tumultuous period of our national history which I do not recall; but, however that may be, it is extremely offensive and we ought not to submit to it, and I do not believe the Senate will submit to it.

Mr. President, I should like to have the order read once more. I did not hear it very distinctly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary again read the order proposed by Mr. REED.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, our rules provide that the Senate shall convene at 12 o'clock. That has been varied from time to time to suit temporary emergencies when we required a little more time than was given by convening at that hour. But to establish an order by a vote of this body that Senators shall remain here every hour of every day, not being permitted to leave the Senate for any purpose, until the majority sees fit to excuse them, is abhorrent, and I for one will not submit to it until I am compelled to submit to it. I trust that the independence of the individual Senators will lead them to the same conclusions. It is not necessary. There was a quorum, I understand, here last night when some of us were pulled out of our beds to suit the purposes of a majority that was present at that time. I do not question the power of the majority to do this, but to add to that what is proposed in this order ought not to be, and I do not believe it will be, submitted to.

Having said this much, Mr. President, the Senate will do as it pleases about this matter, but I do not believe any good results will come from so extraordinary and revolutionary a procedure as is contemplated, which, among other things, proposes to change the rules of the Senate in an irregular and arbitrary way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is debatable.

Mr. LIPPITT. May I have the resolution read once more?

Mr. REED. It has been read three times.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed order.

The Secretary again read Mr. REED's order.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I move to strike out the words "and dealt with as the Senate may order." There is no occasion for any such language as that in the resolution. If the Senate wishes to pass a resolution instructing the Sergeant at Arms to bring Senators before the Senate, it undoubtedly has the right to do so; but as to what the Senate may do with them after it has got them, it is not the function of a resolution to set forth. It is for the Senate to proceed to act at the time the Senators are here. I think it is an insinuation of some drastic proceeding which may or may not be carried out, but it seems to me it is entirely out of order on a resolution. Mr. President, I make the motion I have stated.

Mr. REED. I move to lay the amendment to the motion on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island has moved to amend the motion of the Senator from Missouri by striking out the words "and dealt with as the Senate may order." The Senator from Missouri moves to lay the proposed amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I withhold by vote.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I will ask if he has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has not voted.

Mr. DU PONT. Then I will withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on the last call and vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], which I understood was transferred last night to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. The Senator from Florida not having voted, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DU PONT. As I have stated, I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. HOLLIS. Announcing the same pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (after having voted in the affirmative). I wish to inquire whether or not the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. CHILTON. I announce a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask if the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—37.

Ashurst	Lane	Reed	Thomas
Bankhead	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	Thompson
Bryan	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Thornton
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Vardaman

Fall	Lodge	Shields

So the motion to lay Mr. LIPPITT's amendment on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the order submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

Mr. REED. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the order that was issued and not signed by the Vice President or by the President pro tempore of the Senate, under the rules of this body, is of no force or effect whatever.

I want Senators to listen while I read the order; then I wish to direct the attention of the Chair to the officer who signed the order; and then I shall refer to the standing rules of the body and also to the precedents that have been established in the past.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has a right to raise a point of order.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that the pending question is not debatable.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, well——

Mr. GALLINGER. It is debatable.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about that.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, that can hardly be settled by the mere assertion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to let the Presiding Officer decide that question without any further discussion.

Mr. REED. I call attention, if the Chair please——

Mr. SMOOT. Last evening——

Mr. REED. To Rule V, and the order that is now sought to be made is in pursuance of Rule V. That rule provides:

RULE V.

QUORUM—ABSENT SENATORS MAY BE SENT FOR.

1. No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave.

2. If, at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Presiding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result, and these proceedings shall be without debate.

Mr. SMOOT. That has all been done without debate.

Mr. REED. The rule continues:

3. Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant at Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel, the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate.

Mr. SMOOT. Such an order has already been adopted.

Mr. REED (continuing reading)— and pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no debate nor motion, except to adjourn, shall be in order.

The order now before the Senate is a part of this procedure.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a quorum has been developed, and the proposed order is open to debate, the same as any other motion that may be made in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the point of order made by the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not making a point of order; I am claiming that the motion made by the Senator from Missouri is debatable, and the Senator from Missouri has raised the point of order that it is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules upon that question that it is not debatable, except for the advice of the Chair——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It being a rule of order——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have the order here, Mr. President, if the Chair will listen to me a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply desire to say that the order purports upon its face to be an order of the Senate, a standing order of the Senate, which is equivalent to a rule of the Senate, and to say that the Senate shall adopt a new rule without being allowed to discuss it or to say a word about it is, in my opinion, preposterous.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a motion to enforce a rule that is now one of the standing rules of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; it is a standing order, and any order that has been proposed has been debatable.

Mr. SMOOT. Every order that has been proposed in this way, when any Senator desired to debate it, has been debatable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I desire again to call the attention of the Presiding Officer to Rule V:

2. If, at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Presiding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result, and these proceedings shall be without debate.

That has already been done; a quorum has been developed; but this is proposed as a standing order of the Senate——

Mr. GALLINGER. A rule.

Mr. SMOOT. This is virtually making a new rule for this body. And is it possible that the Chair is going to hold that a rule can be made here without discussion or without debate?

Mr. LIPPITT. An amendment to a rule.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not an amendment; it is a rule; it is a standing order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate has complied with Rule V; and so far as the order which was adopted not 15 minutes ago to compel the arrest of Senators, offered by the Senator from Florida, it was debatable; but I had no objection to it, because that was in conformity with the regular procedure of the Senate, similar action having been taken time and time again. But this is a different matter; this is making a new rule for the Senate; and, Mr. President, I do not believe that there is any Senator who, when presiding over this body, would take the position that such action can be taken without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This body has the right to rule itself, in the opinion of the Chair; and Rule V, paragraph 1, requires Senators to be in their seats.

Mr. SMOOT. No; to be in the service of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To be in the service of the Senate; but the Senate has a right, in the opinion of the Chair, to determine what that service shall consist of.

Mr. SMOOT. The rules provide for that; we have followed the rule; and I have no objection to that, Mr. President, at all; but the action sought to be taken is in effect saying that hereafter there shall be a new standing rule of this body. And is it possible that we are going to say that that is nondebatable?

There is another question involved in this that I want to discuss, if the Chair will permit me, as to the whole proceeding. I myself believe that when the attention of the Senate and the attention of the Presiding Officer are called to it, he and the Senate will agree to the position I take in the matter. I do not want any filibuster in regard to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is a proper proceeding for the Senate to hear objections to the rule proposed to enforce the first paragraph of Rule V; but when the Senate has been in the throes of a prolonged filibuster under the color of debate, and under the color of debate the time of the Senate is used up without limit, it is obvious that the Senate ought to have the right in self-defense to pass a rule to require those who absent themselves to be present in the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Chair think it is in the competency of the Chair to talk about the procedure of the Senate, as to its nature?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is competent for the Chair to give the reasons why the Chair should make a certain ruling.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was not a ruling.

Mr. SMOOT. As a point of order, I want to call the attention of the Chair to the rules of the body as to the issuing of orders that have already been made and not signed, as I believe by the person authorized to sign them under our rules.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make the point of order——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, allow me to make a suggestion.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Chair please allow me to call attention to this matter as a point of order?

Mr. REED. I desire to make a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state his point of order.

Mr. REED. The pending question is the order that is now offered, which the Chair has said is not debatable, except as the Chair may desire to hear from Senators for the advisement of the Chair. The Senator from Utah is now not even discussing that order, but is proposing to go back and discuss some other action of the Senate. I therefore make the point of order that the Senator is out of order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not understand that the Chair had ruled that this question is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ruled that, except for the advice of the Chair, it was not debatable.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will state his point of order.

Mr. WORKS. I make the point of order, Mr. President, that this is a modification or a change in the rules; and that, under the rules, it must go over for one day, and notice must be given. In support of the point of order I call attention to Rule XL:

> No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof.

Mr. President, whatever it may be called—an order or what not—this is a modification of the rules of the Senate, and unquestionably it falls within this rule. No question of emergency, such as has been stated by the Chair, can change this rule. The exigencies of the case do not affect the question as to whether or not notice must be given or the amendment or modification of the rule lie over for a day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the Senator from California.

Mr. SMOOT. From that, Mr. President, I appeal, and upon the appeal I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah appeals from the ruling of the Chair. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. The roll is being called, and the Chair has not stated the question that is before the Senate. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To lay upon the table the appeal that has been moved.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not understand that there was a motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. THOMAS. Let the roll call proceed, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the question before the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is the duty of the Chair to state the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has instructed the Secretary to make that statement.

The SECRETARY. The Chair overruled the point of order of the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] appealed from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been demanded. The question is upon sustaining the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Should not the Chair state that the question before the Senate is as to whether the ruling of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question before the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to have it stated from the Chair, not from the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the calling of the roll.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], I withhold my vote.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and will withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. O'GORMAN's name was called). I renew the announcement about the junior Senator from New York and ask that it may stand for the day.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I transfer the pair I have with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). With the same announcement that was made upon the last roll call I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I see he is not present and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND entered the Chamber and voted "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 26, as follows:

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Now that we have changed the rules, I should like to be clear about the present rule, of which I hold the original in my hand:

All Senators are required to appear forthwith in the Senate Chamber, and to remain in the Chamber until excused by the Senate. His salary * * *. Any Senator disobeying this order shall be in contempt of the Senate, and shall be brought to the bar of the Senate and dealt with as the Senate may order.

I am a little in doubt as to the provision as to "his salary," which is suddenly inserted there. I am reading it exactly as it stands, and I inquire of the Chair just what it means.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator only needs to use his glasses to see that the line he is commenting on has been stricken out.

Mr. LODGE. The words "his salary" have not been stricken out. I am reading the thing exactly as it stands. Those words are not stricken out.

Mr. REED. The Senator is not reading it as it was read to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That may be.

Mr. LODGE. That may well be. I am reading it as it is. Now, of course, I know we are going to change the rules on an order. I understand that, but I do not want to go too far, and I think we might know what the rule is. If the words "his salary" are to come out, I should like to know it.

Mr. REED. The Senator is laboring under the impression that this order has been entered upon that particular piece of paper. To begin with, the order has not yet been entered. It is still before the Senate, and the order as read to the Senate does not contain the words the Senator is commenting upon.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let it be read as proposed, then.

Mr. LODGE. Let it be read as proposed.

Mr. REED. Certainly. That was so plainly stricken out that I am surprised the Senator did not recognize the fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Until otherwise ordered by the Senate, the following shall be a standing order of the Senate: All Senators are required to appear forthwith in the Senate Chamber and to remain in the Chamber until excused by the Senate. Any Senator disobeying this order shall be in contempt of the Senate and shall be brought to the bar of the Senate and dealt with as the Senate may order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the order proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Is that matter debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair it is not.

Mr. LODGE. An order to change the rules is not debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair it is not a change of the rules, but an enforcement of the rules by an order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If they want to go to a vote on that matter without debate, let them go.

Mr. LODGE. Very well, Mr. President. As we are making the rules as we go along, of course there is nothing more to be said.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is within the discretion of the Chair to hear reasonable debate, because the objection is in the nature of a point of order. I think this matter is so fundamental that it would not be justice to the dignity and decorum with which the proceedings of the Senate are usually conducted to prevent a reasonable amount of comment on that order. It is absolutely revolutionary so far as the precedents and powers of the Senate are concerned, as the powers of the Senate have heretofore been understood. It is directly in the teeth of the Constitution. It has no support in any recognized parliamentary ruling that has ever been concreted into the parliamentary law of any civilized country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the question is not debatable and that the Senate has already so determined by vote.

Mr. LODGE. No; it has not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not at all.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Chair has discretion to hear debate before he makes a ruling, even where it is denied. That is also a precedent of the Senate. There is no occasion to depart from it now, and if the Chair will indulge some few observations the Chair will judge of the extent of debate that will be permitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has already ruled that he will listen to any suggestions that may be made with regard to the matter, but that debate was not in order upon the proposal of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I quite agree with the Chair, but I think the Chair has a discretion. That is necessary to supplement our rules and make them tolerable. The Senator from Massachusetts has been recognized. If he desires to be heard, and the Chair is willing to hear him, I shall be very glad to have a minute or two if the Chair wishes to hear me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be pleased to hear the Senator from Arkansas when the Senator from Massachusetts has concluded his suggestions.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am not quite clear as to the situation. The Chair, as I understand, ruled that the matter was not debatable, and, therefore, that I was out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair only stated that the Chair had ruled that the question was not debatable.

Mr. LODGE. And that question has been appealed from.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been appealed from.

Mr. LODGE. I take an appeal, then, from the ruling.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the Chair has indicated a purpose to hear further debate upon the matter, reasonably. There is no occasion for an appeal, and the Chair has so indicated.

Mr. LODGE. Very well, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair makes a distinction between debate and suggestions made to the Chair with regard to the rules of the Senate and the order of procedure of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to take any considerable time on the subject. I think this is a change in the rules of a very vital kind. To say it is a mere method of carrying out the rules does not alter its character in the least. It is making a new rule for the Senate, and it is making it contrary to the method established for changing the rules. Of course if the rules are to be cast to the winds and violated, there is nothing more to be said, while there is a majority willing to do it; but I venture to think that breaking the rules of the Senate at will, no matter under what pressure, is something that will return to plague the inventors. It is a very dangerous thing in any parliamentary body to cast the rules aside in a moment of excitement or feeling on any subject. Of course, if we are to make rules as we go along, the position of the Senate is that of being under mob law.

I do not think it is necessary for me to go further in protest. Probably no protest I or any other Senator may make on behalf of the orderly transaction of business and the observance of the rules as they stand will be of any avail at this moment. Under this rule which we are to have put through at this moment Senators are to be imprisoned in the Senate Chamber. They are to have no right to leave the Senate Chamber for any purpose without being excused by the body.

I need hardly to point out to the Chair—that is, as he has shown himself an astute parliamentarian—that under that arrangement every Senator can ask to be excused endlessly, and take the yeas and nays on the excuses, and there will be no business done at all. Under the rule that you have invented and put down here now you are providing an opportunity for endless waste of time in the most futile of all ways. That merely indicates the difficulty which besets making rules on the floor, as the exigency or the irritation of the moment seems to require.

I venture to enter my protest against a change of the rules in this way, because I think it is a very serious thing for the Senate, much more serious than the question whether this particular bill shall be forced through or not, but with that protest all I have to say ends, because there is no use to attempt to resist changes made in this way by the majority, and there is no desire on this side to attempt revolutionary methods. We are desirous to maintain the rules of the Senate, and if they are to be changed they should be changed in the proper way, after due notice and debate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the difficulty I see in the matter is that the Senate has no power to make any such rule. The Constitution has defined the authority that may be delegated to the respective Houses of Congress acting separately for the purpose of securing a working attendance in the Senate.

Theoretically the Senate consists of all its Members; practically it consists of a quorum. The right to compel attendance is therefore limited to that number of Senators who may conduct the business.

The whole United States Government is one of delegated power. It has no inherent power of legislation, and there are no inherent powers for governing legislative bodies. The Senate uniformly has held in its early precedents that the Senate had no inherent power in itself to compel the attendance of even a quorum, and that resulted from the text of the constitutional provision on the subject, which is:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members in such manner and under such penalties as the House may direct.

Having thus specifically limited the power to enforce attendance of absentees, less than a majority of Senators, and having provided that it shall be conferred and actually exercised in practice, and having required an actual previous authorization by rule before it can be exercised by such minority of Senators it is perfectly evident that it was never intended to furnish authority for compelling the attendance when a potential quorum is present. The House of Commons in England constitutes 40 a working quorum, and makes no inquiry about the other 400 or 500 of its members. The House of Lords constitutes 6 a quorum and makes no further inquiry about the attendance of its members. During the recent memorable contest over the establishment of home rule in Ireland, when it became necessary to have a fuller attendance in the House of Lords, it was said that at least a hundred of the members turned up who had never been seen there before, and many of them had to be introduced to the doorkeepers, for it was the first time they ever set foot in the chamber of which they were members.

The whole theory of this Government is that a majority can transact its business. That has been concreted into a positive provision of the Constitution in connection with this particular matter under such terms as to exclude the idea that the Senate would take any further notice of the attendance of its membership except to see that it had a required number to transact the public business. All must take notice of the fact that Senators have many duties to perform that take them outside of the Chamber; that there are many occasions when they should be absent, and it would be very improper whenever one of those casual absences became necessary to secure permission from the Senate to be absent. It would be a degree of censorship rarely exercised by persons supposed to be even less independent than Senators. The power in the Constitution was conferred on less than a majority of Senators when the absence of a quorum was disclosed by our Rule V. The first clause of Rule V is that—

No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave.

That is a mere admonition. There is no sanction for its enforcement. There is no penalty provided for disregarding it, nor is anyone authorized to create a penalty and impose it after the offense has been committed. That matter is left with the particular Senator, and his constituents will attend to it, if his absences are of such a character as to impair his usefulness as a Member of this body. It is a mere direction; a mere expression of opinion on the part of the Senate. It does not purport to deal with absences that do not obstruct the progress of business here.

The second clause provides the means by which the absence of a quorum is authoritatively determined—the creation of a condition that has suspended business, and therefore brought into existence the necessity for exercising the power conferred by the Constitution. The Senate in this rule has not been willing to leave it to any less reliable method than a roll call to determine whether or not a quorum of the Senate is present, when it is intended to be followed up by punitive regulations to compel attendance. Therefore it is provided that—

If, at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the presiding officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result, and these proceedings shall be without debate.

Then the first step has been taken. The foundation has been laid for such proceedings by way of enforcing the attendance of a quorum as the Senate may have previously been authorized under the terms of the Constitution of the United States.

Then section 3 of the rule provides the penalizing provision, and invests less than a quorum of Senators with the power to compel the attendance of absent Senators. The power has not been conferred on the majority, because the Constitution of the United States only authorizes it to be conferred upon a smaller number than a majority. It is a power that is conferred on a smaller number, because its exercise is necessary to secure the attendance of enough Senators to carry on the business of this body. With a majority present, no such power is necessary to carry on business

Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant at Arms to request—

This precludes the idea that any such order may be made when more than a quorum is present, because the exercise of it is limited to the occasion when there is less than a quorum present. The whole thing is a delegated power. You can not go beyond the text to ascertain its limits.

Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present—

Then what?—

a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant at Arms to request and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate.

Pending its execution all proceedings in the Senate are stopped; the entire proceedings of the Senate are stopped; because it adds—

And pending its execution and until a quorum shall be present no debate or motion, except a motion to adjourn, will be in order.

All this may not afford a satisfactory remedy for senatorial absenteeism; it may not fulfill the modern idea of censorship over the conduct, the habits, and the whereabouts of Senators in every instance from the time they are sworn in until the time they go out. To make it conform to what seems to be required in this behalf the Constitution of the United States must be amended.

You can not invoke that provision of the Constitution for power to authorize the majority to compel the attendance of anybody. It is not an inherent power in this body, because there are no inherent powers in any branch of the United States Government. They are all delegated, either expressly or by fair implication, or become necessary to make effective powers about the delegation, of which there is no doubt.

This occasion will pass away and other occasions like it will pass away. As far as I am concerned, I am now ready to pass upon every proposition involved in the pending bill, up to its final passage. This is the first hour in the history of the Senate when an apparent majority of the Senate seemed to be in favor of a rule like this. As far as I am concerned, I do not intend to throw any obstacles in the way of a prompt disposition of the matter. Others may take a different view of the question and may adopt another course. I do not want to sacrifice our entire code of rules simply because we differ about the shipping bill. I do not want a condition created that will inevitably come back to plague us, because all these things have a way of repeating themselves under the stress of an occasion. The presentation of this proposed rule is not complimentary to the Senate, but is beneath the dignity and poise of the membership of this body that for 125 years never recognized any arbitrary and oppressive regulation into rules governing the conduct of the business of the Senate. I trust that no occasion will arise for ever adopting any such course. The rules of the Senate ought to be right, and the rulings on them ought to bring about a condition where there can be a clear test of strength as between the supporters and opponents of any public measure. Any other rule is bound to work inconvenience. In time "chickens will come home to roost." The history of this Republic shows that no one party and the advocates of no one belief always remain in power. There will always be a minority as well as a majority, but these will not always be composed of members of the same political party.

I shall not vote to make any such radical departure from the precedents of the Senate, nor shall I be carried away by the stress of any occasion to the extent of doing something that I do not believe harmonizes with the character of this body. I believe that any question can be submitted to the Senate. I never have feared the exercise of arbitrary power by the presiding officer. I have no complaint to make about the Chair submitting this matter to the Senate, but I believe the Senate ought to take a little more common sense and a conservative view of the present situation than to undertake to do something now that may not be in the end the best thing to do.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I rose to demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if the Chair will indulge me, I should like to be heard just a moment or two upon this matter?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will listen to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not believe the Senate of the United States has the constitutional power to pass any such rule as is proposed. What is it proposed to do? First, that all Senators are required to appear forthwith in the Senate Chamber—that is a power which the Senate has—and to remain in the Chamber until excused by the Senate. That is a power which the Senate has not the right to exercise.

The provision of the Constitution that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law controls this body as well as it does any other body—as well as it does a court of justice. The provisions of the Constitution, and there are only two of them that can possibly have any reference to this subject, are as follows:

SEC. 5. Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance—to compel the attendance of absent Members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide.

Less than a quorum of the Senate has the power to compel the attendance of absent Members. There is no provision of the Constitution which will authorize this body to imprison one of its Members in the Senate Chamber. When a Member is absent he may be compelled to come here. When he is in the Senate Chamber he ceases to be an absent Member.

The only other provision is:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member.

Of course it is not pretended that the proposed order comes within that provision of the Constitution, and so the proposition is that a Senator who comes into this body must remain in his seat in the Senate Chamber no matter what the demands upon him may be until he has appealed to the majority and been excused.

I undertake to say, Mr. President, that such restraint upon the liberty of a Senator after he has appeared in the Chamber is wholly without constitutional warrant.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I made the point of order that this proposed order would be a change and modification of the rule of the Senate. The point of order was ruled against me, an appeal was taken, and the ruling of the Chair was sustained.

I am not intending now to controvert the ruling of the Chair on that subject or the action of the Senate with respect to it; but the fact remains that this is a change of the rules of the Senate. It is a matter upon which the Senate should act with due deliberation. The rules of the Senate now prescribe what shall be done in respect of the presence or absence of Senators. In Rule V it is provided:

No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave.

I call the attention of the Senate to the word "service." The rule as it now stands forbids any Senator from absenting himself from the service of the Senate. The service of the Senate may be the work that is necessary to be done in committee. That is a part of the senatorial work, and a Senator may be called from the Chamber by his duties as a member of a committee.

This proposed order changes that rule absolutely so as to compel the actual attendance of Senators in the Chamber. In effect it makes them prisoners. They can not leave the Chamber even for a moment without first obtaining the leave of the Senate. One can very readily see what may be the consequences of such an order with the feeling that exists now in the Senate, unfortunately. It is almost certain that there will be favoritism in extending these leaves of absence, and without them a Senator is compelled to remain here continuously in the Senate.

There is another addition made to this rule by the proposed order, and that is if a Senator is absent he is by the mere fact of his absence guilty of a contempt of the Senate and subject to punishment therefor. There is no such rule of the Senate now.

There is no authority on the part of the Senate to punish a Senator for mere absence from the Senate Chamber. Therefore there is another quite material change in the rule vesting a greater power in the hands of a majority to deal with the question of attendance of Senators in the Senate Chamber.

I still feel that the point of order I made was a proper point, that this is a proposed amendment to the Senate rules, and that notice should have been given as the rules require and the hearings postponed for one day.

But independently of that, Mr. President, we are proposing to pass an order here that is in effect a change of the rules, and it should be done in the deliberate way that is provided by the rules as they now stand.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is the pending motion debatable? Is the adoption of the pending order in the nature of a rule, a debatable question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is a question the Chair is very frank to say the Chair does not know.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I am under the impression that just a few moments ago the Senate decided on an appeal from the Chair that it was not debatable.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is incorrect about that. The Senate sustained the Chair in ruling the point of order raised by the Senator from California to be not well taken. There has been no ruling upon this question. It was suggested to the previous occupant of the chair, and that occupant of the chair expressed the opinion that the question was not debatable, but, as I recall it, he did not rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not debatable, except for his information.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And he was hearing Senators, as he said, in his discretion for his information. Inasmuch as the debate is proceeding under another occupant of the chair, I should like to know whether or not Senators are in order when they presume to debate the question?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, for the information of the Chair, I will state that what occurred was this: Senators started to debate the question; a point of order was raised that the question was not debatable; the Chair ruled that the question was not debatable; thereupon Senators implored the Chair to let them submit to the Chair their observations with reference to whether debate on this particular question was or was not in order. The Chair permitted that, stating at the time that he made a distinction between debating a question and merely offering suggestions to the Chair. So, as the matter now stands, the Senate by a vote has determined that the point of order made by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] is not well taken; and the Chair has by a ruling, from which no appeal was taken, a ruling which occurred half an hour or more ago, determined that this question was not debatable; but the occupant of the chair stated that he would permit Senators to submit to him their suggestions, not as a matter of debate, but as a matter of suggestion.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri omitted one matter, if I may say so. When the Chair ruled that this was not debatable I then said I would enter an appeal. I was asked to withdraw that appeal because the Chair said he was willing to hear debate.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Massachusetts did withdraw it.

Mr. LODGE. I withdrew the appeal, but I did not withdraw it permanently. I can renew it at any moment.

Mr. REED. I do not think an appeal can be made more than half or three-quarters of an hour after a matter has passed away.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The point I desire to suggest—and I think I suggested it fairly to the Chair—was that the previous occupant of the chair had expressed his opinion that this question was not debatable. I did not know whether the Vice President, the permanent presiding officer of the Senate of the United States, wanted to be bound by that ruling, which seemed to me to be utterly erroneous.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair will say that the Chair does not know whether or not this question is debatable; but if the former occupant of the chair has ruled that it is not debatable the ruling will not be reversed, but it may be appealed from to the Senate.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I appeal from that ruling; and that subject is debatable, as I understand it, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on laying the appeal on the table, as the Chair understands.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I demand the yeas and nays on that, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and for the time being will withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the statement made upon the last roll call, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DU PONT (after having voted in the negative). I will withdraw the notice I gave of the transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]; and, as the senior Senator from Texas has returned to the Chamber, I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CLAPP. I would inquire whether or not the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I withhold my vote on account of my general pair with that Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] and will allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 38, as follows:

So the Senate refused to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, it seems to me that the question we are now facing is one of legal rights. I want to be frank about this bill. I have not been in entire sympathy with the long speeches made on the bill, although I have been here a good part of the time. I have not participated in them, and I had hoped that the bill would finally get into such form and shape that I might vote for it.

If we could keep out of the war zone and establish a fleet between the United States and South American ports, if we could take advantage of the situation that is abroad in the world and rivet the trade of those people to the United States through these instrumentalities, I would be glad to see it done; and the question of socialism and Government ownership would have no terrors for me if such a development could grow out of legislation of that character.

But, Mr. President, the question now is whether, the presence of a quorum having been secured for the transaction of business, my freedom is to be taken from me to such an extent that I can not go down to the restaurant without leave of the Senate or unless I go there accompanied by the Sergeant at Arms? The question now is, with a quorum present able to transact public business and enact legislation, am I to be deprived of my liberty, so that I can not even leave this Chamber to retire for an hour's sleep—1 hour out of the 24?

Mr. GALLINGER. Or for luncheon.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Or to go outside of the Chamber for any purpose. If we have come to that strait, if we are, with a quorum present able to do business, to be imprisoned in this Chamber without hearing, without offense, I think it is time the issue should be made.

A legal right is involved, and if you want to have a few applications for writs of habeas corpus, let us have it tested. You might just as well test that question now. It is more serious than a ship-purchase bill. That question is perhaps just as serious as any that can confront a legislature or that can affect the people of the United States, and we have approached it now; we are facing it.

As I have said, it is a question of legal right; and if we are to come to that, let us test it; let us make the issue clear and specific under Rule V and under the Constitution of the United States—as to whether or not, with a quorum present, Senators are to be imprisoned in this Chamber and deprived of the freedom of motion, deprived of the right to go through these doors even for half an hour out of twenty-four, without the leave of the Senate or in the custody of an officer. You are testing the question of a legal right, and the issue is proceeding in that direction very fast now, and I think that we had better meet it. I will say frankly that, with a quorum having responded to the roll call and a sufficient number being present to transact business, I shall protest against the Sergeant at Arms preventing me from going around, from going down the front steps to my office or going to the restaurant to get something to eat. I shall insist that an inherent right which I possess is being interfered with; and we might as well make an issue of it and see whether a right can be invoked in a situation like that. I think this is something we had better think twice about.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota what becomes of a Senator who is a member of a conference committee attempting to get an agreement between the two Houses on the last day of the session?

Mr. CRAWFORD. He can go there in the custody of the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He is under arrest while he is performing that duty, even if he is in the House of Representatives.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly. I am just stating the issue here. I say we are approaching it rapidly and quickly and clearly, and let us define the issue, involving, as it does, a legal right, a constitutional right, the freedom of locomotion. Let us make the test.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have just received this notice:

> Senator SMITH has arranged for the District of Columbia appropriation bill conference at 2 p. m. to-day.

If this order became operative, I would have to ask consent to leave the Chamber to perform my duty as a conferee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me, if he were present in that conference he would be under arrest.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator's right to proceed on the business of the Senate is to be interfered with.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, has the Senator from South Dakota concluded?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have. I was simply making an observation to show the situation in which we have been placed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this is not a change of the rules of the Senate; it is not so intended; and no amount of fulmination or frothing at the mouth or mock heroics will deceive the country in regard to the issue which is now presented.

We have witnessed now for weeks not an attempt to do business, but an attempt to prevent the doing of business; not a purpose to come to a vote, but a deliberate conspiracy to prevent a vote. Senators have been arranged in relays, a part of them to retire to their downy couches of ease and to the embracing arms of sweet slumber, while one or two able-bodied and lung-experienced aerial athletes continue to pour forth a ceaseless flow of eloquence, which invariably would be characterized outside of this Chamber by language which is not here parliamentary, and therefore may not be employed. If an outsider were to comment upon the act of another outsider where senatorial courtesy and senatorial dignity did not prevail, it might be said that in the attempt to defeat this remedial legislation gentlemen were willing to obstruct the very machinery created by the law for the enactment of legislation for the expression of the will of the people of the United States; but as I have listened to some of these eloquent addresses, which might elsewhere be characterized by a less parliamentary term, my mind has been forced to revert to the old lines which some one wrote descriptive of Lord Northcote:

> Behold the pump, a slender thing of wood,
> That up and down its awkward arm doth sway,
> And spouts and spouts and coolly spouts away
> In one weak, wishy-washy endless flood.

Mr. President, a few evenings ago we listened to a speech here that lasted all night, delivered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. The Republican side of this Chamber appeared to be well-nigh exhausted. It looked as though tired nature was to bring a surcease to our woes of waiting, when some Democrats entered into an arrangement with the Republican side of the Chamber whereby dilatory motions were to be offered to this bill and a combination effected between a small portion of the Democrats and nearly all of the Republicans; and then, having finally secured the attendance of Senators who have been brought here thousands of miles, who were absent for good and sufficient cause, we now witness the performance of last night, when, by a concerted action, nearly every Republican in this body went to his home, to his bed, with the understanding that the verbal stalwart who was then occupying the floor would hold it until a certain hour, when these gentlemen might rise from their couches, put forward another individual capable of talking several hours, a physical logician, an athletic orator, who could stand the exertion of remaining upon his feet and employing his vocal cords, the proposition being that again they would come here in relays, all of this to defeat the purpose of the law, to nullify and destroy the Senate of the United States, to deny the people whom this body represents any opportunity to have their will as so represented crystallized into law.

Now, what do we propose? It is proposed simply that this body shall exercise, first, those powers conferred upon it by the Constitution; and, second, those powers which would have been inherent even if the Constitution had never conferred an express authority touching the subject matter. It is not proposed to put an outrage upon any man, or to arrest any man. It is proposed that this body shall exercise its inherent and its constitutional authority to compel the attendance of its members, and to say that attendance upon this body does not consist in rising from a bed, answering a roll call, and going back to bed, but in remaining here in this Chamber for the purpose of transacting the people's business. The order simply proposes to say that this body shall continue to be a legislative body and that its powers shall not be nullified by a persistent defiance of the spirit of its rules and the very purpose of its creation.

Mr. President, I assert, first, that the Senate or any other legislative body has the inherent power to compel every one of its Members to be in his seat within given hours and under such regulations as it may adopt. I lay that down broadly, regardless of any question of the Constitution, and I call attention to Gilfry's Precedents, page 499. In the Fifty-second Congress—

> The President pro tempore (Mr. Manderson) decided that it was competent for the Senate under its rules to order the attendance of absent Senators when a quorum is present, it being a right inherent in every legislative body to compel the attendance of absent Members who are not present for duty and who have not been excused.

Why, Mr. President, in what sort of shape would this body be if it did not possess that power? All that would be necessary to absolutely deadlock business would be for a sufficient number of the Senators to walk out of the room at any moment. Then we might go through the form of having the Sergeant at Arms request them to attend, and they might refuse to attend. Then we might even order the Sergeant at Arms to bring them in; and now, having brought them in and even having brought them to the bar of the Senate and subjected them to discipline, if the ruling contended for by gentlemen upon the other side is correct, as soon as they had answered at the bar they could immediately walk out of the Chamber again and leave the body without a quorum. That simply puts it in the power of Senators to prevent what is in fact a meeting of the Senate at any time that they see fit; and although the Senate may be called in session, and although a minority may remain present and continue to issue order after order, yet the majority may, by walking out, at any time break a quorum and prevent the consideration of any question.

I have read you one decision, but I call attention to the fact that practically every legislative body we have in this country, including the House of Representatives, has now a rule by which they bring in Members and by which they close the doors and keep in the Members until the vote is had or the business transacted.

Mr. President, we have heard a good deal of talk here to the effect that we might as well have this matter now determined, and Senators have practically offered themselves as willing victims of the arrest and the frightful outrage that is going to be perpetrated by compelling them to come here and remain in the Chamber unless excused by the Senate. I presume that the Senators who have advised in these mock heroics, and who have held up their hands and grown pale in their faces and talked about outrage and arrest and the Constitution of the United States, find some consolation in the fact that the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church, and therefore covet that honorable position. But let me say to a Senator who is here drawing the people's money, who is here under a sworn duty, who is here charged with a high responsibility, that he will get very little sympathy in this country because he has been compelled to come here and perform the duty the Constitution and his office imposes upon him—very little sympathy. And now, if any of them desire to test it, as far as I am concerned if this order is made I shall be very glad to see it tested.

These men are not under arrest when they are required to be here, but if they leave without permission of the Senate they can be brought to the bar of the Senate and punished as the Senate shall determine; and if any man thinks that the writ of habeas corpus will bring him any great satisfaction under those circumstances, my advice to him is to examine the law before he puts much confidence in it.

Mr. President, it has been urged that we have no constitutional authority. The argument seems to be that as the Government of the United States is a Government of delegated powers, therefore unless you can find it expressly written in the Constitution of the United States that the Senate has the power to compel its Members to attend there is no such power. It is true that the Government of the United States is a Government of delegated powers, but it is also true that when the Constitution of the United States delegates to a branch of the Federal Government the right to exist and the right to transact business that carries with it every power incident and necessary to the transaction of business, and under the common law and under the common rules of practice that power is possessed by every legislative body. But if we were obliged to find an express power in the Constitution of the United States, it is here. Section 5 of Article I reads:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide.

Mr. President, why is that clause in the Constitution that a smaller number may compel the attendance of Members? Because a smaller number than a quorum ordinarily can not act. It was not necessary to say, and therefore it was not said, that a larger number could do that which a smaller number is expressly authorized to do. In my judgment it is absurd to say that a smaller number of a legislative body shall have an authority which is not possessed by a larger number; that a part is greater than the whole. But, Mr. President, I read on:

> Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member.

Now, all we are determining here by this resolution is a matter of procedure. We are determining a rule of procedure to do with the method of compelling the Members of the body to appear and attend to the business of the body, so that each House, not a majority, but each House, which means, of course, a quorum of either House, may determine the rules of its proceedings and punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and that is exactly what is proposed in this order.

Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who has been opposed to this bill and who has taken what many of us regard as very extreme action in that behalf, has risen in his seat this morning and said that in view of the fact there is a majority of this body here and that the opinions of that majority are known he has no desire to obstruct a vote, and I hope that if the Senators upon the other side persist in this unconscionable and endless filibuster the Senator from Arkansas and some of his friends who do not agree with the most of us will see fit to help us end this filibuster.

Mr. President, I might as well say, as far as I am concerned, and I only speak for myself, and I have only the voice of one man, I am going to endeavor to enforce the attendance of a quorum of this body at every hour when the Senate is in session.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the course now proposed to be taken is a most extreme one. It merely illustrates the truth of the old proposition that extremes beget extremes. When the pendulum swings too far in one direction it is inevitable that it will also swing quite as far in the other. It is the outgrowth of a proceeding which is designed not for the purpose of promoting but of preventing legislative action by this body.

I am supporting the motion, as I shall support any motion that will serve to focus public attention upon the obstructive methods of procedure in this body until public sentiment can be sufficiently aroused to compel a change in them, so that public business can be expedited instead of being hindered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does not the Senator think if the public opinion which he is now invoking as the ultimate controlling power over the Government really desired the legislation which is being pressed with such unusual earnestness that it would be impossible to maintain obstructive methods against the legislation? The Senator is aware that this question has not been presented to the public, and, so far as I know, there is no pressure of public opinion for the passage of this legislation.

The Senator says he will support a rule, which evidently he thinks is extreme, governing the parliamentary procedure here in order to attract public attention to our methods of doing business. This so-called filibuster, which is very acrobatic, for apparently it has made a handspring backward and forward across the aisle every day or two, will serve, at least, to give the public an opportunity to know something about the terms of this bill and to bring to bear upon this body its opinion, whatever its verdict may be, as to the merits of it. Up to this time there is no pressure of public opinion to that effect.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator is directing his question to one topic and I am endeavoring to present another. My attitude does not spring from the character of the bill which is now the subject of obstruction. I do not propose to assume to be an oracle upon this floor and determine or even assert what public opinion may or may not demand with regard to the shipping bill. They may be in favor of it; they may not be in favor of it. Time alone can answer that question. But I believe that exhibitions of the sort to which we are now subjected will so inform public opinion with regard to the application of the Senate rules to the transaction of business as to require the same change which some years ago was brought about in the House of Representatives, to the end that we may get somewhere and do something, instead of standing still or retrograding for fully half the time when the Senate is in session.

Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. GALLINGER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield, and to whom?

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield to the Senator from New Hampshire in a moment. I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The suggestion that I made——

Mr. THOMAS. I understood the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. With reference to the bill pending, was only to illustrate the subject which the Senator was discussing, as to the obstructive methods used in this body.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood the Senator, and I will answer before I get through, or try to do so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I believe that a general and intelligent public opinion which has sufficient means of being informed about legislation that is pending here, can be depended upon to regulate obstructive tactics in this body.

Mr. THOMAS. I now yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to ask the courteous Senator from Colorado if my memory is at fault when I recall the fact that the Senator from Colorado only a few days ago announced that he was engaged in a filibuster, and said he would frankly admit it.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's question is perfectly pertinent. Yes, Mr. President; I admitted the fact that I was engaged during this discussion in a filibuster. On the other hand, some Senators, under the pretense of instructing the public, have been vocalizing in this room by night and by day, in a contest of physical endurance and pressing upon a rivalry which would indicate that some sort of a reward will be given the victor who talks the longest and says the least.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I did take part in prolonging time for the consideration of this bill, because of the sudden surprise which was sprung upon the majority by some of its Members, to the end that three Senators who were absent from the city without pairs might reach here in time to vote. But because I applied a rule of which I do not approve, it does not require me to defend it. If it persists, and another insistent occasion arises to invoke it, I shall probably again participate in a filibuster. So, let us abandon the practice before I sin again.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. My objection goes to a system that will permit this to be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator a few minutes ago said he objected to the Senate marking time and accomplishing nothing.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I want to apologize. We do not always mark time, but, like a crab, we often go backward.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to ask the Senator if, in his opinion, the so-called filibuster, if he chooses to call it that——

Mr. THOMAS. I do not put an adjective before it. I call it a filibuster.

Mr. LIPPITT. A plain filibuster?

Mr. THOMAS. A plain filibuster, without any qualifying adjective.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator chooses to call it that, even, the Republican Members of the Senate were absolutely justified up to the present moment. Is it not a fact that the very bill which was brought in here and which was going to be compelled to be put through this body because you had the votes has already been changed five times? Is it not true that the course of the discussion and consideration of this bill has already changed a very considerable number of votes, and that whereas we started off on this discussion with a bill that has been modified and remodified and re-remodified, starting off in a conspicuous minority, it is a question to-day which side will have the majority if a vote is taken upon the bill? I ask, Does not that justify the postponement that has been taken?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator rose to ask me a question, and he has asked me half a dozen.

Mr. LIPPITT. I wanted to be liberal, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not complaining. Mr. President, during the process of this filibuster there have been some changes in this bill. Whether they are beneficial or not, I shall not pretend to say. I do not indorse many of them. But a filibuster which can produce good is also used to force very bad changes in a bill. A filibuster which results beneficially in the opinion of one Senator may result perniciously in the opinion of another Senator.

The fact is, Mr. President, that we now legislate in this body in part for 100,000,000 people. There have been upward of 30,000 bills introduced in the two Houses during the present Congress. It would require a man perhaps twice two years of time to read them, and, of course, it is physically impossible to consider 1 per cent of them and consider them properly. The very fact that this enormous aggregation of business confronts the Congress of the United States at every session is the best of reasons for doing away with an antiquated, fossilized, and altogether unreasonable method of obstructing business under the pretense of necessary discussion.

Now, the Constitution, Mr. President, provides that the Senate may make rules of procedure for the transaction of its business. Rules of procedure necessarily mean rules of progress; rules under the operation of which we can advance; rules which will prevent us from standing still; rules that will expedite. Under the rule which permits filibustering here, if rule it may be called, three Senators possessed of good physical health and a vocabulary somewhat equal to the English lexicon may hold up the business of the people of the United States until their terms are complied with, and can do it indefinitely, because of the inability of this body to overcome and break down their filibuster except by contest of physical endurance, in which they have every advantage.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] asked me whether, in my judgment, the discussion of this bill would not serve to enlighten public opinion and give the people a more intelligent conception of the character and the objects and the probable results of this measure if it was enacted into law. I do not think, Mr. President, that what is called discussion here will enlighten anybody.

I said the other day that three speeches have been made upon the other side which were directed to an intelligent and commonsense discussion of this bill, and if the public have read those speeches, the longest of which was less than two hours, they certainly obtained a great deal of important information upon the subject. Generally speaking, I think a man who can not express himself fully upon any subject in two hours and a half either knows too much or too little about it.

I do not believe that public opinion has been edified or enlightened by speeches that have been made upon this floor running from 10 to 12 hours in duration. They have a stupefying effect upon anyone who wastes his time in the effort to follow the winding mazes of speeches requiring many hours to deliver, and which are made deliberately to kill time, to wear out the Senate, and not for the purpose of informing the public, not to discuss the bill, but to exhaust opposition and prevent a final vote upon the measure.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Suppose in this move to transact public business and prevent a filibuster this rule should be adopted, does the Senator think that public business would be transacted any more rapidly if every time a Senator wanted to go out and get a glass of water, or to the restaurant, he should submit a request to the Senate and have a roll call upon it to see whether a majority were willing for him to go or not?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I do not.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Are we not taking a lid from Pandora's box here that will simply create a situation infinitely worse than the one that is here now, by such a procedure as this in the Senate?

Mr. THOMAS. No; Mr. President, the filibusters removed Pandora's lid. The order could not make things any worse than they are now. That is impossible; superlatives can be exhausted without adequately describing the unhappy legislative condition which we occupy. I do not believe the motion, if adopted, will have the effect of promoting business, but it will have some effect, I hope, upon public opinion which must force a change in the rules of this body if we can ever transact business.

That is the reason why I am going to vote for it. If we are going to continue to make a spectacle of ourselves, if a body the Members of which have been sent here for the purpose of expediting the needed legislation of the country shall continue to do nothing at all, then let us go to the other extreme for a while and by compelling the attendance of Senators upon their own filibuster let the people then judge of the situation. My impression is——

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment. Mr. President, my impression is that this order if it is carried and enforced may have some good effect as a counter irritant, because I am inclined to think that if all the 96 Senators of this body are required to sit here and listen to these 10 or 12 hour speeches for a while they may in self-defense unite with us in bringing this matter to a vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, does the Senator maintain that the transaction of business and the attendance upon the sessions of the Senate by its Members mean reasonably that they shall attend all the 24 hours; that their food shall be delivered to them in the Chamber, and that in order to transact the business of this great country they must be held in imprisonment within the Chamber all the time without reference even to their meat and drink?

Mr. THOMAS. That requirement would be quite as reasonable as the rule which unfortunately enables Senators to inflict their interminable discourses upon this body. We ought to place some limit upon this exercise, which we may accomplish if we can compel Senators to remain here and listen to each other from the commencement to the close of their disputations.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. These speeches now have the effect of dispersing this body, for no sensible man, unless he is in the chair or is an employee of the Senate, will remain here and listen to a 10 or 12 hour speech, especially when made between the setting and the rising of the sun.

I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Preliminary to the question I am about to ask I will merely suggest what the Senator just said clearly establishes the unconstitutionality of the proposal in that it would subject Senators to unusual and cruel and inhuman punishment.

Mr. THOMAS. That is equally true of the present rule, except that the punishment is not unusual.

Mr. CUMMINS. The question that I really rose to propound—and in all seriousness—is this: Does the Senator from Colorado believe that our constitutional power goes to the length of chaining Senators to their desks, so that they can not remove themselves? I should like to hear the Senator upon that subject.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think I have so stated. I said at the outset that this proposal goes to an extreme, and that my reason for supporting it was that the Senate had many times proceeded and was now proceeding to extremes in the other direction. When extremes meet sometimes there is a resulting benefit.

Mr. CUMMINS. I asked the question because it would seem to me that necessarily follows from the position taken by the Senator from Colorado. If the Senate has the constitutional power to say that I shall not leave my desk without the consent of the Senate, it necessarily has the power to chain me to that desk in order that its rule may not be disobeyed and to secure my presence.

Mr. THOMAS. Why, Mr. President, I think we have just as much constitutional power to require that we should be chained to our desks as we have to blow a Senator or all of the Senators through the doors of this Chamber by a cyclone of an empty vocabulary. It is about as broad as it is long. But, Mr. President——

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island for a question.

Mr. COLT. I was going to ask the Senator from Colorado whether he believes that this proposed rule could be enforced? I understand it is a rule of construction that if there is a statute or even a constitutional provision which can not be enforced it is either absolutely void or else it should be interpreted or amended in some way by construction. Now, this proposed——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. COLT. I was going to ask the Senator—according to this proposed rule—

> All Senators are required to appear forthwith in the Senate Chamber and to remain in the Chamber—

Suppose I was ill in Rhode Island and it was impossible for me to come here?

> All Senators are required to appear forthwith in the Senate Chamber and to remain in the Chamber until excused by the Senate.

Otherwise they are in contempt. That proposed rule is absolutely nonenforceable upon its face.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I can not yield any further to the Senator. He has asked me a question and has answered it himself. I only yielded for a question. I shall myself be accused of filibustering pretty soon [laughter], and I do not wish to occupy the Senate's time too long.

Mr. COLT. The Senator is very good at answering questions and is certainly very courteous. May I ask him one other question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. COLT. My question is whether our constitutional provisions, statute laws, and Senate rules are not governed in their construction by the primary consideration of whether or not they are reasonable, and that any construction that does not appeal to our sense of reason or to what is reasonable should never be adopted? Therefore, when the Constitution says that Members of the Senate may be compelled to attend, and a rule is passed in accordance therewith, the fundamental consideration in the construction of that constitutional provision is whether or not such rule is reasonable.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island is again making a speech. I can not yield further. The Senator from Rhode Island is making a very good argument in favor of my proposition.

I insist that the method of procedure which I am criticizing is unreasonable, quite as unreasonable as anything that is being offered as an antidote.

Mr. BRISTOW rose.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Colorado if he can mention or refer to a single filibuster in the history of this body that has succeeded that was not justified as to its result?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, there have been so many filibusters in this body—some long and some short—that I could not answer that question categorically; but I do not think so. During my short legislative experience there have been some big filibusters and some little ones. Most of them occurred before then. Some of them have resulted favorably to the country, the others have not; but I am discussing this matter as it strikes me fundamentally and without reference to the effects or consequences of the method of procedure as applied to given situations. Whether the result of filibustering has been beneficial or injurious is wholly aside from the question whether they ought to be permitted at all. Certainly we can not be dependent upon the filibuster, and upon it alone, for good results in this Chamber. They can be secured by orderly processes more generally and more certainly than by filibustering.

Mr. BRISTOW. I asked the question which I did of the Senator from Colorado because, in my opinion, he can not point to a single instance in the history of the United States when prolonged discussion in this body has not resulted in ultimate legislation that was beneficial to and approved by the American people.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the filibuster in 1893 was not successful; if it had succeeded, it would undoubtedly have resulted beneficially. I did not approve of it, but I think its failure, resulting in the demonetization of silver, was one of the greatest disasters that ever visited this country.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado further yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I did not ask the Senator whether, if the filibusters that had failed had succeeded, the country would have been benefited; but I was simply inquiring as to the filibusters that had succeeded. The Senator, in answering my question, referred to one filibuster which he thinks the country would have benefited by had it succeeded.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am not concerned, as I stated before, with the results of a filibuster. There is no question but that some of them have resulted in better conditions. That is true of every bad situation; but I believe such results would have sooner or later followed without them.

But what is the spectacle confronting us during the last three weeks? The effort to secure a vote upon this important measure has been defeated by the process of continual obstruction carried on, and to be carried on indefinitely and indeterminately, by Senators obtaining the floor to speak against time in long and loud vocal competition.

Mr. President, the vice of the situation is that where the filibuster is permissible you can place no limit upon its use. It can be resorted to for one thing as well as another, for the purpose of preventing the confirmation of an unimportant postmaster as well as the enactment of legislation involving great constitutional and national consequences and demanded by the public needs. The system can be invoked at any time, for any purpose, whether public or private. I do not believe that a fair construction of the rules justifies it—a system which can be invoked without reference to the importance or the nonimportance of the subject matter against which it is directed.

Mr. President, since I have been a Member of this body I have heard two or three arguments from its opponents against a proposed constitutional amendment granting suffrage to women. They advanced the theory that women were incapable of discharging public affairs; that they are not competent for public administration; that they were unequal to the burdens of government, and therefore they should be denied the right of participation in the choice of rulers. And, Mr. President, if a convention of women anywhere in the country should meet and attempt to conduct their business in the manner in which it has been conducted in the Senate of the United States during the last fortnight, they would be justly the subject of derision and contempt. The opponents of women suffrage would point to the spectacle as the conclusive proof of their incapacity for self-government or for an intelligent participation in the transaction of public affairs.

I hope, Mr. President, that this order will be adopted, to the end that the public may judge of the two extremes and compel this body, by the irresistible force of its own mandate, to adopt some method of procedure in the near future whereby we can do business and get somewhere in our efforts at legislation.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. As I understand, the Senator's position is that he does not favor this as a permanent rule of the Senate, but only as a means to a present end.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, I am quite willing to let it stay in force as long as the rule of filibuster stays in force.

Mr. FALL. I did not so understand the Senator. I understood him to say that he objected to the filibuster under the present rules, and it seemed to me, Mr. President, that his whole argument was merely the repetition of the same excuse that has always been used for mob or lynch law or the interference of a vigilance committee, to wit, a means to an end; that because of the law's delays Judge Lynch should be upon the scene and his aid invoked.

I only wanted to understand whether I had erroneously construed what the Senator said.

Mr. THOMAS. No, Mr. President; the same line of statement and argument was used for a number of years against the new rules of the other House, what I may call the Reed rules of the House. The Speaker of the House was accused not only of violating the Constitution but of overthrowing established customs, undermining the foundation of the Government; and it was also charged that he was doing virtually that thing, establishing the principle of legislative lynch law against the essential necessity of full discussion before any measure was acted upon. But the new rules lived in the House; they still live; no one there thinks of questioning their usefulness any more; and the bitterest opponents of the great Speaker of 1891 were among the first to perceive the necessity of the new method of procedure and to make it permanent in the operation of that great body.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am not friendly to the filibuster, as a rule. I regard it as an evil, as an obstruction to legislation. I have taken up none of the time of the Senate in the discussion of the pending bill. I regard the question now presented to the Senate as of vastly greater importance than the question of the passage or defeat of the shipping bill.

The Senate is now confronting three great evils, all of which tend to obstruct and interfere with the performance of the duties of the Senate and its independence as a legislative body. namely, Executive interference with the business of the Senate and domination over its Members; the secret caucus; and the filibuster. The caucus is another kindred evil with the filibuster. One of these naturally provokes the other.

I believe, Mr. President, that if it had not been for the interference of the executive department of the Government it would have been impossible to pass this shipping bill. I do not believe it meets with the approval of a majority of the Members of the Senate, and if its passage is to be brought about by that kind of interference and domination on the part of the executive department, strengthened by the secret caucus, then a filibuster to prevent action of that kind is entirely justified.

The course of this bill shows the evils of the several things that I have mentioned. The President calls upon the Senate for the passage of a bill. He has a perfect right under the Constitution to suggest its passage, to call to the attention of the Senate the necessity for such legislation; that is strictly within his power and his duty as President of the United States; but the moment he says to the Senate or to any Senator, "This bill should or must be passed," he exceeds his authority and is attempting to exercise an unwarranted and unlawful power over the legislation of this body. That course has been taken in this instance, and this has become for that reason what is called an administration measure.

The next step in order to bind individual Senators is the secret caucus, by which it is intended to bind the conscience and judgment of every Member of the majority of the Senate, thus making it a party measure also. Fortunately, in this instance it has not entirely succeeded; but the effort has been made, and I have no doubt that there are Members of this body who, if it had not been for the dictation of the caucus, would have stood here to-day opposed to the passage of this bill, but who are now willing to support it simply for that reason. I am not criticizing Senators for taking that course. They must exercise their own judgment as to whether they owe greater fealty to the Democratic Party than to their country.

The effect of the attempt to force action on the part of Senators by the decree of the caucus has resulted in a spectacle in the Senate that should bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every American citizen. The moment it was made known that some members of the Democratic Party representing their States in this body were independent and courageous enough to withstand the decree of the caucus and oppose this bill, there was heaped upon them ridicule, vilification, and abuse; they were charged with treason to the party, with abandoning their associates on the other side of the Chamber, with being disloyal to the Democratic caucus. What a spectacle it was! It resulted naturally in abuse and retaliation from the other side in justifying the position they have taken, and we had here for days the time of the Senate taken up with abuse by one Senator of another, brought about by just that condition of things. These conditions bring about excesses, efforts by extraordinary and revolutionary means to meet the evils I have mentioned; and we are now asked to go to the utmost extreme in order to meet the filibuster that has been brought about by the means I have already mentioned, of confining Senators in this Chamber virtually as prisoners.

I submit that the Senate of the United States should think very seriously before it goes to such an extreme. I have no doubt myself that it is in violation of the constitutional rights of individual Members of the Senate. It is provided by this order, in the first instance, that every Member of this body shall forthwith present himself in the Senate Chamber. What right, under the Constitution or laws of the country, has the Senate to make that order, absolute in its terms, giving no right of excuse, no right to advance any reasons why it is impossible for a Senator to be here, but to declare absolutely that he shall appear in the Senate Chamber, and that if he fails to do so he shall be guilty of contempt?

That is going a long way, but it does not stop there. It provides that after he does make his appearance in the Senate Chamber, he shall not leave it without the consent of the Senate.

The Senator from Colorado justifies this course as being necessary to meet the conditions that now exist in the Senate. Mr. President, one wrong can not be justified by the assertion that another exists.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator from California know where the Senator from Colorado is? I do not see him in the Senate Chamber. He has not been excused. He has made no application to be excused. He is not living up to the spirit of the rule that he is advocating. In fact, there are only 13 Democratic Senators in the Chamber, although they compose a majority of this body.

Mr. WORKS. I suppose the Senator from Colorado is exercising his liberty as long as he can, as this order has not yet gone into effect.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to say to the Senator from Washington that no rule has been established up to the present time, and the Senator from Colorado has a perfect right to absent himself from the Senate Chamber until this rule becomes the order of the Senate. He is exercising that right now, and is not guilty of any discourtesy to the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am aware of that, Mr. President. I was speaking of the equities of the case rather than of the strict legal rules. I admit that the Senator, strictly speaking, has the right to leave; but I do think that if he is advocating so strenuously the adoption of a rule of this kind, he ought to set the Senate the example of living up to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have no doubt that he will obey the proposed rule when it becomes the rule.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I do not agree with either the Senator from Washington or the Senator from Colorado. It is the duty of the Senator from Colorado to be here upon the floor of the Senate while its proceedings are being conducted, without reference to any order that may be made in the future.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WORKS. The only difference is that as conditions are now he is not subject to a penalty. He will be after this order takes effect, if it ever does.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. If it is the duty of a Senator to be present, and that is the statement of the Senator from California——

Mr. WORKS. Does not the Senator from Missouri agree with me?

Mr. REED. I do—what ground is there for the Senator's objection that the Senate shall require a Senator to perform his senatorial duty?

Mr. WORKS. The objection to it is that the Senate has no constitutional authority to compel the attendance of a Senator in any such way as is here proposed. It is a violation of a constitutional right. The duty rests upon him, but it is left to him to perform that duty as he sees fit.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Constitution itself provides that less than a quorum can compel the attendance of absent Members. That implies, if necessary, their arrest; and it implies, if necessary, the right to lock the doors of the Chamber and to compel them to remain within its walls. How, then, can the Senator say that that is unconstitutional which the Constitution by express terms confers, not upon the Senate alone, but upon less than one-half of the Senate?

Mr. WORKS. The constitutional right conferred upon the Senate is to compel the attendance of a quorum, and when that is accomplished the Constitution gives no right of action on the part of the Senate to compel the attendance of absent Members.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me further?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to the rules of the House of Representatives, this particular rule—Rule XV—having been unchallenged for many years. Paragraph 2 contains this language:

> In the absence of a quorum 15 Members, including the Speaker, if there is one, may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members, and in all calls of the House the doors shall be closed, the names of the Members shall be called by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested, wherever they may be found, by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant at Arms for that purpose, and their attendance secured and retained; and the House shall determine upon what condition they shall be discharged.

The note to this rule states that the essential portions of this rule were adopted in 1789 and 1795. It does not seem to be a very startling thing over in the House of Representatives to say to a man elected to perform a duty: "You shall come, and you shall remain, and you shall continue to remain until permitted to absent yourself by the body of which you have voluntarily made yourself a Member, and the duty of which you have voluntarily assumed."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WORKS. In just a moment. I have no doubt at all of the power of the Senate or of the House to compel the attendance of Members for the purpose of constituting a quorum that can do business. Nobody controverts that proposition. That is its only object, however, and when that purpose is served no further action is taken. The doors of the House are opened again. The same condition exists in the Senate. There is but one object and purpose of compelling attendance here, and that is to secure a quorum in order that the House or the Senate may proceed to do business.

I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I simply wish to call the attention of the Senator from California to the fact that the comparison made by the Senator from Missouri is not at all applicable in this case. On the first page of yesterday's RECORD is the ordinary proceeding which takes place in the House when the question of a quorum is raised. Mr. FITZGERALD made the point of order that no quorum was present, and the Speaker stated:

> Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

All the doors of the House are not closed, however. One door is invariably left open, and as soon as Members have answered to their names they go and come as they like, and they do so before they have answered to their names. There is no restraint placed on Members, but as soon as a quorum is determined as being present then the order is made to open the doors, which means the doors which have been closed on two sides of the Chamber. There is no comparison between the two conditions which the Senator from Missouri attempts to point out.

Mr. WORKS. In view of what has been said by the Senator from Missouri, I think we may profitably look a little more carefully at the language of the order which he asks the Senate to adopt. It provides:

> Until otherwise ordered by the Senate, the following shall be a standing order of the Senate—

That, as I have said before, is, in effect, to amend the rules of the Senate—

All Senators are required to appear forthwith in the Senate Chamber and to remain in the Chamber until excused by the Senate. Any Senator disobeying this order shall be in contempt of the Senate, and shall be brought to the bar of the Senate and dealt with as the Senate may order.

Now, mind you, so far as the first clause of this order is concerned, it is self-executing. The moment a Senator is not in the Chamber after this order passes he is in contempt of the Senate, without any further action being taken. The mere adoption of the order puts a Senator in contempt if he is not here at the time. He is given no opportunity to make excuses until he is actually arrested and brought to the bar of the Senate. Until that time he is regarded as in contempt of the Senate, and can in no way be excused from it until he is actually brought here under arrest to make response to the order itself. That is clearly shown by the provision that "any Senator disobeying this order shall be in contempt." The order is that the Senator shall be in the Chamber—and a violation of that order, as I have said, puts him in contempt—and that he shall remain here from that time on; and if he shall go out of the Senate, no matter for what purpose, without first obtaining the consent of the majority, he is again in contempt.

Aside from the question as to the constitutionality or the legality of an order of this kind, is it a practicable thing? It can not be justified, even by the evil condition that Senators say exists in the Senate. Just think what confusion would be brought about by it. The Senate will be unable to do business as long as this order is in existence if there are any Senators here who are inclined to filibuster at this time, because it gives the greatest possible opportunity for taking up the time of the Senate. Any Member of this body under this order can ask to be excused from attendance in the Chamber, and the yeas and nays may be called and the Senate compelled to vote on each single one of these requests. Why, we can take up days and weeks with that sort of thing, wasting the entire time of the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the Senator if that very request can not be proffered, and the very proceeding he has outlined be indulged in at this moment, under the present rule?

Mr. WORKS. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. REED. Very well. Then a repetition of a present condition does not create any cause or reason for filibustering. The repetition of the filbuster upon that line which has been suggested by the Senator, might be cause for the enactment of a new rule; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that he has already admitted that the very thing which he and his confrères have insisted will be the "horrible result" of this rule is just as possible under the present rule as it would be under the proposed new order. Therefore their argument falls to the ground. It simply illustrates the fact that in the storm of filibustering that now is engrossing the genius and brain on the other side, no matter what rule is devised a new means to take advantage of it immediately springs into the brain of the patriotic gentlemen who want to obstruct the public business. That is all. Therefore, I call attention to the fact that the Senator admits that, so far as roll calls are concerned upon excuses, every evil which might arise under this rule can arise under the present rule of the Senate.

Mr. WORKS. No, Mr. President; the Senator is quite mistaken. No such construction of the existing rule has ever been given as that which is now suggested by the Senator from Missouri. There has never been a time, under any of the rules of the Senate, when a Senator was required to ask to be excused in order simply to step out of the Senate Chamber. No such construction has ever been placed upon the present rules, and never will be. In addition to that the rule makes an absolutely new condition, to which the old rule might be applied very unjustly, by compelling the actual attendance of Senators in the Senate Chamber and forbidding them to leave it without the consent of the Senate, which is quite a different thing from the mere right of a Senator, or his duty, let us concede, to ask for leave of absence if he expects to be absent from the Senate.

The Senator from Colorado has very justly said that this is an extreme measure. It is one that, in my judgment, can not be justified, independently of any question of its legality. It would be an encroachment upon the rights of Senators and is entirely unjustifiable. It would lead to complications and the taking up of time that is entirely unnecessary and would be objectionable from all points of view. I submit that this is an order which the Senate of the United States ought never to make.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. The discussion of this matter, except for the remarks made by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], has proceeded rather upon the power of the Senate to issue this order than upon the wisdom or the policy of issuing it. The Senator from California, when he discussed the question of the wisdom or the policy of the order, would have been entirely unanswerable if his discussion of it were to be considered in connection with an ordinary condition of affairs; but the Senator from California ought to have discussed the wisdom of the issuance of this order, conceding the power to exist in view of the conditions which confront us. The Senator from California ought to have presented the subject in view of what has taken place here in the last three weeks.

I do not desire, however, to address the Senate upon that subject. I desire to speak on the subject of the power of the Senate to make this order.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I think the Senator from Montana has not stated my position correctly. I know he would not misstate it purposely. I did state the extraordinary conditions that exist in the Senate as a justification, it may be, even for a filibuster. I presented my views with respect to it upon the conditions as they actually existed in the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. I understood the Senator perfectly well. The Senator advanced the idea, if I caught his meaning aright, that the filibuster which is being conducted upon the other side of this Chamber is justified by reason of Executive interference.

I desire to say to him that the wisdom or policy of this ought well to be discussed in view of the confession that a filibuster is now going on, not as if we were proceeding under usual and ordinary conditions that attach to the consideration of legislation in this body.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield further?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Again, the Senator from Montana does not quite state me correctly. I did not base the justification of the filibuster alone upon the ground of interference, but also upon the secret caucus, which I regard as one of the greatest evils we have to contend with in legislation.

Mr. WALSH. I recognize the Senator did so state. I pass from the consideration of that feature of it. It is asserted there is no power to pass this order, first, because it is without the power of a majority of the Senate to compel the attendance of absent Senators, although that power rests in a minority of the Senate, there being no quorum present; second, conceding the power to exist in even a quorum or less than a quorum, it exhausts itself when the absent Senator is brought to the Senate, and he is thereupon permitted at his will to leave immediately.

I deny the soundness of either of those propositions. I assert in the first place that the power exists in a quorum of the Senate to compel the attendance of absent Members, and, second, I assert that the power exists in the Senate to require him to continue here until he is discharged by the Senate.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the predicament into which the Senator from South Dakota would find himself, who would like to go down to get some lunch, or he would like to go off and get a little sleep. Mr. President, concerning the question of power, the matter has been so authoritatively determined that it is not, in my judgment, any longer open to discussion.

Mr. President, it is not to be presumed that under ordinary conditions, without the observance of obstructive tactics, anybody is going to interfere with the right of a Senator to go down and get a lunch or to take some sleep; but that right is to be considered in connection with the other. You must either give to the Senate the right to keep a Member here indefinitely as its will is, or, on the other hand, you must confront yourself with a situation of the right of a Senator having once been brought in to leave immediately.

I should like to inquire of the Senator from South Dakota, so that I may be proceeding advisedly, whether it is his view that a Senator having been arrested and having been brought here and having answered to his name is at liberty immediately to leave the Chamber and go off and again break a quorum, necessitating the issuance of another warrant for his attendance?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, my view is that, of course, the Senate has the inherent right under the express power given to it by the Constitution to maintain at all times a quorum, and when once having maintained a quorum and being able to transact business an attempt on its part to control the ordinary freedom of action that is incident to the life of a human being, such as walking into the corridor around this Chamber and going over into the restaurant and matters that can not be construed to interfere with the ordinary and necessary transaction of business by the quorum, which does attempt to control the locomotion and the freedom of the Member, is without authority.

Mr. WALSH. With all due deference to the Senator, he has not answered the question I asked him. How shall the Senate know where he has gone, in what avocation he is engaged, what activities are requiring his attention? When he leaves the Chamber must the Senate issue another warrant commanding him to appear?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not understand that it is any of the Senate's business where he goes and what he is doing if the Senate has maintained its ability to transact business and his attendance is an attendance enabling the Senate to perform its functions. The attendance to enable the Senate to perform its functions does not mean that he therefore must be held in the Chamber with a ball and chain, or be fastened down to his chair, or be put in the custody of the Sergeant at Arms; that if he wants to go over into the reception room to meet some person who has called to see him, or on necessary business, or attend a conference, or attend a committee, or go over to the restaurant he must prefer a request to the Senate and have it solemnly call the roll and give him permission to indulge in the ordinary movements of physical life. I challenge the power anywhere of the body to exercise an authority so sweeping and so drastic as that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the first subdivision of Rule V provides that—

> No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave.

In other words, if there are 95 Senators in this Chamber, not even one Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave. Now, is that a meaningless declaration? Does that mean nothing at all, or does it mean that if he does do it the Senate has the right and the power to compel him to attend?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator quotes the language of the rule that no Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate. Does the Senator think that service in the Senate consists wholly of presence in the Senate Chamber, or does the presence of a Senator consist of other necessary matters pertaining to legislation?

Mr. WALSH. I answer the Senator that the Senate has no means of knowing whether he is in the service of the Senate or not unless he is in this Chamber. If he desires to depart from the Chamber it is perfectly well understood that it is necessary for him to get the consent of the Senate, so that committees desiring to sit during the sessions of the Senate are called upon to ask the permission of the Senate to do so. As a matter of fact, they often sit during the sessions of the Senate, but that is upon the implied leave of the Senate. Therefore, if the Senator is gone with the permission of the Senate, the Senate can do nothing whatever in the premises, except to require his attendance by the proper process if he is not in the Chamber.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WALSH. I had some observations to make, but I will be very glad to yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will not detain the Senator except to make this observation. If a Senator is appointed upon a conference committee that happens to be in the performance of that duty at another part of the Capitol, is he absent on business of the Senate?

Mr. WALSH. I should say——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senate take cognizance of this under this proposed new rule, and is he to be apprehended by the Sergeant at Arms and taken away from that meeting?

Then, again, if the Senator will indulge me a word more, suppose an absent Senator is brought in here and rises in his own right under his personal privilege to account for his absence. The day is consumed, and the Member who is specially commissioned upon a conference committee has no power or right to leave this Chamber to attend the conference. I should like to know what becomes of that duty which is so important in harmonizing the disagreement between the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. WALSH. The majority of the Senate may permit the conference committee to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When?

Mr. WALSH. At any time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But he is to be taken over in the custody of the Sergeant at Arms and has to await his turn to be heard. The session of Congress is expiring on the last day and the bill may fail because they were unable to reconcile the differences between the two Houses while he is waiting an opportunity to rid himself from the custody of the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is discussing the question of the wisdom of making this order, not the power to do it. But when we come to the consideration of the question of wisdom I venture to say there will be no difficulty at all to take care of the meetings of conference committees.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to take the Senator away from his argument, but if he will permit me, there is scarcely a committee to-day that is at work that has not the power to absent itself from the Senate Chamber. We have answered that we have been on the conference committee between the two Houses on an important bill, and immediately we leave, in order that we may attend the conference going on in the Committee of Commerce, if the Sergeant at Arms can proceed to the House of Representatives and break up a conference between the two Houses. It seems to me we are not doing anything that is conducive to legislative work.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, that rule of the Senate was enacted in conformity to a very well understood principle of parliamentary law. I read it from section 264 of Cushing's Parliamentary Law, as follows:

> Every legislative assembly, when duly constituted, has power to compel the attendance of its members—

And that whether it is constituted with a majority or a minority of its members—

> Every legislative assembly, when duly constituted, has power to compel the attendance of its members; but until so constituted it has no such power, as it has itself no legal existence; and the right of the members who are present for the purpose of organization to compel the attendance of other members depends wholly, as has been seen, upon the constitution or law to which each assembly is subject. The right of a legislative assembly, after it is regularly constituted, to have the attendance of all its members except those who are absent on leave or in the service of the assembly, and to enforce it, if necessary, is one of its most undoubted and important privileges. It is usually enforced by means of what is denominated a "call" of the assembly, which is effected in the following manner in the House of Commons—

Then follows the procedure of the House of Commons and of the House of Representatives.

But, Mr. President, this matter has been determined by authority of so high a character that we can not possibly ignore it. The power of this body rests upon exactly the same provision as does the power of the House of Representatives to compel the attendance of absent Members. The Constitution provides that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members. Therefore, Mr. President, the precedents of the House of Representatives are equally precedents that ought to govern this body.

Mr. President, in the very first session of the House of Representatives—and it is perfectly well known that many of its Members were members of the Constitutional Convention—a rule was adopted to compel the attendance of absent Members, and it provided for closing the doors so that they could not possibly escape, a circumstance to which I desire to invite the attention of the Senator from South Dakota.

Not only that, Mr. President, but it had been determined over and over again in that body by Speakers, both Democratic and Republican, that the power existed in a majority as well as in a minority of the Members being present to compel the attendance of absent Members.

I read from Hinds' Precedents at page 105, volume 4, as follows:

> In the absence of a quorum 15 Members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members, and in all calls of the House the doors shall be closed, the names of the Members shall be called by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested, wherever they may be found, by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant at Arms for that purpose, and their attendance secured and retained, and the House shall determine upon what condition they shall be discharged. Members who voluntarily appear shall, unless the House otherwise direct, be immediately admitted to the Hall of the House, and they shall report their names to the Clerk to be entered upon the Journal as present.

The author continues:

This rule, which has not been satisfactory when a determined attempt has been made to break a quorum, is now used in cases where the lack of a quorum is developed in other ways than by a vote, and where a quorum fails on a vote on which no quorum is required. The first form of the rule dates from the First Congress. On April 7, 1789, this rule was adopted:

"Any 15 Members (including the Speaker, if there be one) shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members."

On April 13, 1789, this rule was adopted:

"Upon the call of the House, for which at least one day's notice shall be requisite, the names of the Members shall be called over by the Clerk, and the absentees noted, after which the names of the absentees shall be again called over; the doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuses, or insufficient excuses, are made, may, by order of the House, be taken into custody.

So the ordinary procedure, Mr. President, upon the very organization of Congress at its first session was in the case of the House whenever it became desirable to require the attendance of absent Members to close the doors and absolutely prevent any Member from leaving the Chamber until he had leave to do so by the order of the House.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That was only in case a question of the absence of a quorum had been previously raised.

Mr. WALSH. It was not; and I propose to show directly that it was likewise repeatedly determined in the House that it could be done as well when a majority was present.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does not the Senator think there is a very clear distinction and difference between the proceedings which I presume exist in the legislature of nearly every State as well as in Congress of enforcing a call of the Senate or the House for the purpose of compelling the attendance of Members to secure a quorum for the transaction of business and the imprisonment of Members when a quorum is present and the body is engaged in the ordinary public transaction of business, an imprisonment which interferes and absolutely controls the ordinary incidental movements necessary to life and existence and personal freedom of the Members, which they have an inherent right to exercise and which do not interfere with what could be construed as an attendance upon the transaction of the business of the legislative body? For instance, an attendant at one of these schools in the city may be a regular attendant, performing his duties there as teacher or student, appearing there every morning at 9 o'clock and leaving there every afternoon at 4 o'clock or at 3 o'clock; but if the authorities there should take those children, lock them up in a room, and prevent the ordinary freedom of locomotion incident to their lives, would you call it "attendance" or would you call it "imprisonment"? I think, if the Senator will permit me, there is a very wide difference between the controlling of Members during a call of the Senate or of the House in order to secure the attendance of a quorum, and the undertaking to adopt a rule which makes prisoners indefinitely of every Member whether or not his attendance is absolutely necessary in this Chamber to constitute a quorum and transact public business; whether his service may not be even more of a service in the committee room or outside the Senate Chamber than within it. Does not the Senator think that as to the making of such a rule as that, instead of being defined as "attendance" it should be defined as "imprisonment"?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it is obvious that the interruption was for the purpose of an argument and not for the purpose of presenting any question to me. I shall try, however, to myself present the question which obviously was in the mind of the Senator from South Dakota.

The right to imprison—if that is the appropriate term, and I undertake to say it is—the right of the Senate to imprison the Members of the Senate within the Chamber in order to secure the attendance of a majority can not be open to question at all upon the authority to which I have invited the attention of the Senate.

Mr. President, let us concede, then, that Members may be imprisoned for the purpose of securing a quorum; but that is not the end. A majority is useless unless business is to be transacted. Therefore Members may be imprisoned within the walls of the Chamber in order that business may be done; but a quorum having appeared, will it be contended that the power to continue the imprisonment so as to hold a quorum here in order that the business may be done is a different question constitutionally? I undertake to say not.

Mr. President, I now read from the next page of this volume, page 107, as follows:

The constitutional power of the House to compel the attendance of absent Members—

I do not see the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] here. He desired some enlightenment upon this branch of my argument.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the Senator goes to that matter I desire to ask him a question. The precedents of the Senate are very clear, I think, that not only can absent Senators be brought here to make a quorum, but, even if a quorum is present, absent Senators can be brought in; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. WALSH. I understood the Senator from Arkansas to controvert that proposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, the precedents of the Senate cover—at least one important precedent covers—that ground. I will not take time to refer to it; but what I want to ask the Senate is this: Does not clause 1 of Rule V mean that Senators shall not absent themselves from the service of the Senate? Does it not mean to cover a case where a Senator desires to be gone a day or a week or a month?

We had one Senator here who during his entire service never left the city for a day or left the Senate for a day that he did not rise and ask leave to be permitted to absent himself. The House not only compels the attendance of its Members, who are absent usually at their homes, but deducts pay from them under certain circumstances. I have always supposed that clause 1 of Rule V meant that if I wanted to go to Philadelphia or to New York or to Baltimore or to my home I ought not to leave without asking the consent of the Senate. We do not do so, but I have always believed that was the meaning of that clause of that rule.

Mr. WALSH. Inasmuch as the Senator from New Hampshire has discussed the matter very frankly, I will say that I will give my view of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want the Senator to do that.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know the history of subdivision 1 of Rule V, but I undertake to say that it will be found in the very first rules adopted by the Senate upon its organization. It seems altogether reasonable to be expected that a legislative body will establish a rule providing that its members shall not absent themselves without the leave of the body. When it comes to a question of construction of the rule, Mr. President, I am not able to make any distinction between absence that carries one 20 miles away or 40 miles away to Baltimore, or absence that carries one 3 miles away to one's lodging, or absence that calls one 2 blocks away to his office, or absence that calls one 100 feet away to his committee room. I insist, sir, that when this rule was established it contemplated the presence in the Chamber. The service of the Senator was considered as service in the body where the Senate collectively was engaged in the transaction of public business.

Let me state further, however, that I undertake to say, though, that the common practice of going to committee rooms, going to the offices of Senators, and that kind of thing, has been so general that it has been assumed to be with the leave of the Senate, and that it is only when one is going to depart for some considerable period that he must occupy the time of the Senate by asking for leave; but that the rule means presence in the Chamber I have no doubt at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, does the Senator really believe that the framers of that rule meant that at the hour of 1 o'clock, when most Senators want to get a little refreshment in the restaurant, they should solemnly rise and ask permission to go to the restaurant to get luncheon?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I undertake to say that when that rule was framed it was not contemplated that the Senate would sit continuously, without interruption or recess for refreshment.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does so, however.

Mr. WALSH. It does so; and accordingly I say that I have no doubt that a Senator must get leave to go to the restaurant just the same as he must get leave to go to his lodging or leave to go to Baltimore, or such leave is simply assumed. The service of the Senate, in my estimation, means service in this Chamber.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a rule that is "more honored in the breach than the observance."

Mr. WALSH. I do not think it is a breach at all, because I think the leave is assumed.

Mr. President, I pass to the other matter. I read section 2985, as follows——

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator from Montana from what he is reading? I did not catch the name of the authority.

Mr. WALSH. I am reading from volume 4 of Hinds' Precedents, page 107:

2985. The constitutional power of the House to compel the attendance of absent Members is not confined to cases wherein there is a lack of a quorum. On April 28, 1892, on a motion that the House adjourn, there were 17 yeas and 187 nays, a quorum voting. So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. James H. Blount, of Georgia, then submitted the following:

"Whereas there is a large number of Members absent from the House—

Bear in mind, a quorum being present—

Mr. James H. Blount, of Georgia, then submitted the following:

"Whereas there are a large number of Members absent from the House and the public business is delayed, the Sergeant at Arms is directed to bring in all absentees; and the proceedings in connection therewith shall be in accordance with Rule XV in cases where a call of the House is ordered; and all leaves of absence are hereby revoked except for providential cause."

Mr. Christopher A. Bergen, of New Jersey, and Mr. Nelson Dingley, of Maine, respectively, submitted the question of order:

Whether, pursuant to clause 2 of Rule XV, the resolution just submitted by Mr. Blount was in order, the absence of a quorum not having been disclosed; and it is competent for the House to order the arrest of absent Members until there has been a call of the House under the rule, disclosing the names of the absentees.

The Speaker replied that the majority of the House has the right, under the Constitution, to transact business, and it has the right to compel the attendance of absent Members. But inasmuch as the Constitution provides that less than a quorum can not transact business unless there was a special exception in the Constitution permitting less than a majority to send for absentees, less than a majority could not do it. The expression of the idea that less than a majority can send for absent Members does not exclude the idea that a majority can transact business and can require the attendance of all Members of the House in order to do so.

2986. On May 31, 1892, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union found itself without a quorum, and the roll was called under the rule. The committee then rose, and the Chairman reported the names of the absentees.

It appearing that a quorum was present, the Speaker announced that the committee would resume its sitting, which it did.

Immediately, on motion made, the committee rose, and Mr. John A. Buchanan, of Virginia, reported that the committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8224, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. John S. Henderson, of North Carolina, moved that there be a call of the House.

Mr. Julius C. Burrows, of Michigan, submitted the question of order whether, a quorum being present, it is in order to move a call of the House.

The Speaker decided that the motion for a call of the House is in order although a quorum is shown to be present.

2987. On April 25, 1892, the House voted by yeas and nays on a motion made by Mr. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, to lay on the table a resolution relating to alleged unparliamentary language used in a speech printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Mr. Joseph H. Walker, of Massachusetts. A quorum failing to vote, a call of the House was ordered.

A quorum having been secured, Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, offered a resolution that "the Sergeant at Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its Members as are now absent without leave of the House."

Mr. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, submitted the question of order, Whether, under the rules of the House and under constitutional provisions, it is competent for the House to send for and compel the attendance of absent Members except in cases where it is developed that no quorum is present?

The Speaker held that the House had the right to have every Member present; that if but one or two Members were absent, it could send for them if it should desire.

Mr. President, I think that this is an answer both to the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, that a minority can not compel the attendance of absent Members, and likewise to the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota, that, although a minority can compel the attendance of Members, those Members having once appeared inside the doors, they may immediately and forthwith leave if they see fit.

Mr. LODGE. The rulings the Senator has read were rulings of Speaker Crisp, were they not?

Mr. WALSH. There are three rulings sustaining my contention, and apparently there are none to the contrary.

Mr. LODGE. The ruling on the Blount motion and on the other—the two—I find, were both by Speaker Crisp.

Mr. WALSH. They were decided April 28, 1892, May 31, 1892, and April 25, 1892.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; they were all made by Speaker Crisp.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and my recollection is that Speaker Crisp was quite an excellent parliamentarian.

Mr. LODGE. I served in the House with him and knew him very well; he was a very good parliamentarian.

Mr. WALSH. Now, Mr. President, I should like to say a word in answer to the inquiry propounded by the Senator from Iowa, which apparently he thought was exceedingly pertinent, as to whether the Senate would have power to chain a Member to his desk. Mr. President, we must give a reasonable construction to every rule; but I undertake to say that, if the service of the Member in the Senate can not be compelled by closing the doors and imprisoning him within the Chamber, and if it became necessary, in order that the business of the Senate should be transacted, that the Member should be chained to his desk, the Senate would have the power to do that.

Mr. President, what is the difference between imprisoning a Senator and chaining him in prison?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Can the Senator from Montana conceive of any situation that would arise which would justify such a proceeding as that he has just described?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It expresses a mere abstraction which the Senator himself does not believe in?

Mr. WALSH. Wait a moment; I will answer the question. In truth, Mr. President, the question propounded by the Senator from Iowa was entirely irrelevant to the inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator——

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. Is the present proposition pending before the Senate a debatable question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the Senator raising that point of order?

Mr. HUGHES. I raise that point of order, that the proposition now pending before the Senate is not debatable. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senate has decided otherwise.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair when the original question arose, but the Chair has been informed that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], when in the chair, had, in substance, ruled that the proposed order was not debatable; and, without knowing anything upon the subject, the Chair sustained that ruling of the Senator from Oklahoma, not as an original ruling on the part of the present occupant but because the Chair believed it had been made, and he granted an appeal on the demand of the Senator from Massachusetts, as the Chair recalls.

It has been uniformly held that where the original motion was not debatable the appeal is not debatable. The pending question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. GALLINGER. That has been reversed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it has not been reversed. There was a motion to lay it on the table, which failed; but the question has not been put, and the Chair rules that, until the Senate has overruled the decision of the Chair, the motion is not debatable, and that debate is not in order on the pending question, which is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. REED. The yeas and nays have been ordered on that, and I ask that the roll call be proceeded with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have not been ordered on that question.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. I appeal from that decision, and I wish to state——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule provides that when there is an appeal from an intervening order it shall be settled without debate.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to call attention——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts appeals from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for the yeas and nays on that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the request for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to have the question stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair has ruled that the question before the Senate is, Shall the ruling of the Chair, to the effect that the order proposed is not debatable, stand as the judgment of the Senate; and that, as the original decision was that it was not debatable, the question is not debatable unless the Senate shall reverse the ruling of the Chair? From that ruling, as a secondary appeal, the Senator from Massachusetts takes his appeal; which, under Rule XX, is to be decided at once without debate.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will state it.

Mr. ROOT. Is this not the same question which the Senate refused to lay upon the table?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It undoubtedly is.

Mr. ROOT. Is not that a decision of the Senate that there shall be debate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that while that would be the effect of it, and while it is not necessary under parliamentary procedure to put the original question where the motion is not laid upon the table, still the Chair believes the original question must be put.

Mr. ROOT. I do not want to transgress the ruling of the Chair, but is not the action of the Senate or of any parliamentary body upon a motion to lay upon the table a recognized method of deciding the question whether or not debate shall be permitted?

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not going to permit argument on this question. The Chair would be very glad if the Senate of the United States would let the Chair cut through technicalities and decide questions as they ought to be decided, but he can not do that. The Chair has stated the pending question.

Mr. JAMES. I rose, not to interrupt the Chair or to keep the Chair from cutting off technicalities—I should be very glad to see the Chair do that——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Regular order!

Mr. JAMES. But to ask the Senator from New York a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I demand the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the appeal from the intervening ruling of the Chair.

Mr. JAMES. The question, Mr. President——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JAMES. The question I desired to ask the Senator from New York was, if it was true——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Regular order!

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to inquire if I correctly understood the Chair to say that the ruling made by the Chair was in deference to a ruling on the same subject by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] when he occupied the chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. And that the Chair did not exercise his independent judgment as to how this particular matter should be determined?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not a parliamentary inquiry at all. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As I do not see him in the Chamber I will withhold my vote.

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. He arranged with me this morning, however, that if he desired to keep that pair he would call my attention to it before leaving the Chamber. Otherwise I was to be at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I do not see him in the Chamber. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. As he is not in the Chamber I withhold my vote for the present.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and that both are absent. As I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] I can not make that transfer, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. DU PONT. I desire to say that if at liberty to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. PERKINS (after having voted in the negative). Mr. President, I am paired with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. As he is not present I withdraw my vote.

The roll call resulted—yeas 38, nays 46, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the question of the appeal from the present ruling of the Chair the yeas are 38 and the nays are 46.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to find out "where we are at." [Laughter.]

Mr. LODGE. I think the Chair must understand that as well as anybody else, because it is his ruling that has just been voted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair does not understand whether, by this vote of the Senate, the Senate has voted not to sustain the original ruling——

Mr. GALLINGER. The present ruling.

The VICE PRESIDENT (continuing). That the order was not debatable, or not.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate has now twice voted that this proposed order is debatable. Of course, we can continue to vote that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not want to make the Senate vote any oftener than is necessary.

Mr. LODGE. I should not think he would.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to know "where we are at." If it shall be taken by common consent that we are now down to the order, and that it is debatable, it will relieve the mind of the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to make a suggestion, we have just voted that the order is debatable.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. I understand that one effect of the vote of the Senate just taken is that the Members of the Senate have now the right to debate the appeal from the ruling of the Chair taken by the Senator from Massachusetts. That is my understanding, whatever else may be the effect, that the Senate has reversed the ruling that the appeal of the Senator from Massachusetts was not debatable. I appreciate the force of the Chair's suggestion. How far back that may go is another question, but that we can debate that appeal I suppose there can be no doubt now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks there is no doubt but that the appeal can be debated; but the trouble in the mind of the Chair is, in order to get the parliamentary situation clear, has not the effect of these two votes been to overrule the decision of the Chair and to bring us down to the question of debating the order? Is not that the next question to be put?

Mr. ROOT. I should suppose that to be the effect; but at all events the appeal is debatable. I wish to say something upon it before the debate is over, but I observe the Senator from Nebraska has addressed the Chair and is claiming the floor, and I do not wish to interfere with him.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the appeal, but I want to discuss the merits of the motion itself. I have a substitute that I desire to offer when the proper time comes. I have no desire to occupy the floor now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to offer a substitute for the motion made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is going to make another ruling, so that there can be an appeal from it and settle this question and get somewhere. The Chair is going to decide that by virtue of the two votes which the Senate has had on appeals from the rulings of the Chair, the rulings of the Chair that the motion was not debatable have been overruled, and the Senate has decided that it is debatable, and the order is now the question pending before the Senate. If any Senator desires to appeal, he may do so.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, just one word—and that the appeal from the decision of the Chair, which was the pending question, has become obsolete. The effect of the two votes just had is to decide that the present attitude of the Chair will be that the original motion is debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The original motion is debatable, by action of the Senate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. And is now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And that all intervening questions are now out of the way.

Mr. GALLINGER. And a substitute has been offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska offers a substitute, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] offers the following:

All Senators are required to appear forthwith in the Senate Chamber and to remain in the Chamber while the Senate is in session until March 4, 1915. They are prohibited from holding secret party caucuses for the consideration of public business. They are prohibited from communicating with the President or Cabinet officers for the purpose of ascertaining how to vote or what measures to support or oppose. They are required hereby, and under the Constitution, to vote in accordance with their own convictions and judgment, and they shall not subordinate them to the decree of secret party caucuses or other outside influence.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, this is no new position for me to take with my colleagues on this side or on the other side of the Chamber, as my colleagues on this side and on the other side of the Chamber know. I felt, when I was elected, that it was to be a Member of the United States Senate, and not to be a member of any particular caucus. I believe that I was sent here as a Senator from Nebraska to transact the public business in a public manner, and to take part in a small way, openly upon the floor of the Senate, in the public discussion of public affairs, and after that discussion had been finished to vote my convictions and not the convictions of any caucus or the wishes of any public official.

Mr. President, I do not think that we on this side who have our convictions about a party caucus have been treated entirely in a candid manner. We are first invited into a "conference" and told that it is to be a meeting for the purpose of enabling Democrats to discuss their various differences upon the pending bill for the purpose of seeing to what extent a common purpose may be reached, and after we have entered such a conference, believing it to be a conference, it is suddenly transformed into a "caucus," and by a vote we are told that we are bound hand and foot and denied the privilege upon the floor of the Senate of either offering amendments or supporting amendments to the question. We are told we have not the privilege of dotting an "i" or crossing a "t," or in any way of altering what the majority of the aforesaid caucus may have decided.

Mr. President, I want to read now, for the benefit of the Senate, something which I had the honor to write on this subject in the Philadelphia Ledger, at the invitation of that paper, something over a year ago. I think possibly it was two years ago. It related to a condition similar to the one which now prevails in the Senate of the United States. I had the honor of giving expression to my views, which I desire to incorporate here in the RECORD, because they were carefully prepared at that time:

It is difficult to overestimate the importance of thoroughly establishing the independence and individual responsibility of Senators and Representatives charged with the duty of legislation. Only in this way can we have representative government.

If Senators and Representatives coming to Washington allow their hands to be tied by a caucus, or permit the President to instruct them how to vote, representative government fails. Those who elect Senators and Representatives have the right to direct how they shall vote, and no one else.

The struggle now going on in the Senate involves not only the independence of the Senator from all control by a party machine, but also his independence from control by a coordinate branch of the Government.

President Wilson is a man of great intellectual force and high moral character, but no man under our system is great enough or good enough to become the whole Government. Our forefathers were afraid to trust to one-man power. For that reason they provided for a Congress to enact, a President to execute, and a Supreme Court to interpret laws. They made each of those three coordinate branches of government independent of each other. They made one a check on the other. This was done for the protection of the people and was a wise precaution.

Every device to secure cooperation while still maintaining independence was resorted to. The President's power to appoint men to office was subject to the limitation that they must be confirmed by the Senate. His power to make treaties was restrained by the provision that they did not become effective till approved by two-thirds of the Senate. Congress was given power to pass laws, the President was given power to veto them, and, finally, Congress was given the power to override his veto by a two-thirds vote. Thus it is evident that in our form of government the Congress is coequal to and independent of the President.

This independence of Congress, however, can not be maintained if individual Senators and Representatives give way under presidential influence and surrender their legislative consciences and individual judgments into his keeping.

When a large number of Senators and Representatives do this and a few stand out in independence, the next step is the secret caucus of party men to be used as a machine to overcome individual independence. In some respects this is even more obnoxious than the other method of destroying the independence of the individual.

It has the effect of transferring from the public forum of the Senate to the secret chambers of the caucus the settlement of public questions which should be debated and voted on in public. It seeks by the compulsion of the secret caucus to accomplish what could not be accomplished by presidential persuasion, powerful as that is.

Now, Mr. President, I utter no word of criticism of the President of the United States. Any man of conviction in his position will use such power as he has to enforce his opinion. The thing that I criticize is the subservience of a coordinate branch of the Government. The thing that I appeal for is that men in the Senate of the United States shall with equal candor and strength stand by their convictions and maintain their judgments.

How can we maintain the independence of the legislative body if men in the Senate vote against their own convictions and merely register the views of some one else not sitting in this body?

Mr. President, objectionable as the caucus may be, when men go into it determined to vote for the things they believe in and thus possibly to bind and control some of their colleagues, it becomes infinitely worse for Democratic Senators in a caucus to vote against their convictions on matters before the caucus and then seek to bind a dozen or more of their colleagues to suppress their convictions also. That is the case now. Democratic Senators having abandoned their own convictions seek to compel their more independent colleagues also to abandon theirs.

And I say it now upon the floor of this Senate solemnly as my belief that not one-half of the Senators upon the Democratic side of the Chamber believe in this bill as it is now before the Senate. Am I to be bound by their votes when I personally know that many of them have not followed their own convictions?

Mr. President, I could dwell long upon the evil of caucuses. I could dwell upon the fact that the debates are so limited; limited to five-minute speeches. So limited that it is impossible to get into the merits of the question, and yet we are to be bound by the results. I could dwell upon the fact that whereas it is in the public interest that public affairs should be treated of in the open, in a caucus they are treated behind closed doors, and it is deemed a matter of disloyalty for a Member to reveal to the public what goes on behind those closed doors.

But, Mr. President, this situation is even more remarkable and more objectionable than the ordinary caucus. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] here the other day revealed to the Senate and to the public the fact that after the discussion was had in the caucus under the rule of five-minute speeches, as is the general practice, and when it came to the vote only 35 Senators voted to make that conference a binding caucus upon the Members. The Democratic membership is 53, and 35 is not two-thirds of 53. For that reason, in order to make it binding and in order to clamp on the irons, it was necessary for one Senator to change his vote. That situation almost approaches the standard of a comic opera, Mr. President, if it were not so serious. To think that one Senator who had solemnly voted "no" as to whether the bill should be made a party measure reversed his mental processes and voted "yes," and thereby turned the whole Democratic Party over to a new and revolutionary doctrine.

Of what use is it for the Democratic Party to gather in great conventions with a thousand delegates and a thousand alternates if one man in the twinkling of an eye can by changing his mind change the whole doctrine and belief of the Democratic Party? I can imagine—I am not prepared to state who this Senator was; if I knew it I would not probably be permitted to state it—but I can imagine the feelings that surged through the breast of that Senator on that great occasion. I can appreciate his feeling of exaltation over possessing in his hands the power to declare the doctrine of the Democratic Party; to be able to dictate the principles of the Democratic Party; to be able to rewrite the platform of the Democratic Party. Louis XIV said: "The State? I am the State!" and the Senator could say: "The Democratic Party? I am the Democratic Party! and here is the doctrine of the Democratic Party!" Is it expected that we are to accept decisions of that sort as binding in a party measure? The old writer tells us that the three tailors of Tooley Street got solemnly together and resolved that we the people of England decide so and so. That is a very respectable and dignified proceeding compared with this which we are now asked to submit to.

Mr. President, I have risen to my feet this time to make this statement, because I think I ought to enter my protest against the further consideration of this bill under these circumstances. If the filibuster is an evil, and I believe it is; if it is repulsive to me, and it certainly is, it is still more repulsive to me to feel that we are being forced by a minority of the Senate to adopt views that we do not believe in and pass a law that we believe would not be a proper piece of legislation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I ask to have reported the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, and I desire to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator yield to me for one moment to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. REED. No; Mr. President, I desire to make this motion, and I decline to yield. I ask to have the amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. Substitute for Senator REED'S motion:

All Senators are required to appear forthwith in the Senate Chamber and to remain in the Chamber while the Senate is in session until March 4, 1915. They are prohibited from holding secret party caucuses for the consideration of public business. They are prohibited from communicating with the President or Cabinet officers for the purpose of ascertaining how to vote, or what measure to support or oppose. They are required hereby, and under the Constitution, to vote in accordance with their own convictions and judgments, and they shall not subordinate them to the decree of secret party caucuses or other outside influence.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in harmony with the spirit of that proposed amendment, I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

Provided, however, That secret meetings, conferences, and caucuses between disgruntled or bolting Democrats and Republicans or with the proprietors, agents, or employees of any pool, trust, or combination interested in any pending legislation shall not be held to be included within the prohibitions aforesaid.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that that amendment just offered is in violation of the rules of the Senate and the decorum of debate. It imputes motives to Senators, and is clearly out of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it does nothing of the kind. It is a general rule laid down for our guidance in the future. It is proposed here by a rule to prohibit Members from caucuses. It is proposed to prohibit Members from communicating with the executive branch of the Government, as a general rule, and the proposition I make is likewise a general rule, and fits no man whose foot is not exactly adapted to the shoe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will rule on the point of order.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can not receive more than one at a time.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. This goes to the other, if the Chair will hear me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland will state it.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the Chair may rule on the point of order I made.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The rule under which the original order of the Senator from Missouri was presented is the first clause of Rule V, which deals absolutely with the presence or absence of a Senator and his service in the Senate. I make the point of order that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska with the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska are not in order as both deal with matters entirely outside the presence or absence of a Senator in the Chamber or his service in the Senate, and that no amendment is in order to this resolution which undertakes to circumscribe the action of any Senator in communicating with any person he may see fit to communicate with or otherwise conducting himself in a manner which may be consistent with the first section of this rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Where is the rule upon which the Senator from Maryland bases his point of order?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. That no Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair knows that.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. It is rule 5, section 1.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland makes the point of order that the proposition is not germane to the original proposition; that only applies to appropriation bills and nothing else in the Senate of the United States. The point of order of the Senator from Maryland is overruled and the point of order of the Senator from Massachusetts is overruled. The rule is with reference to debate.

Mr. LODGE. I simply wish to make a statement that the point of the Senator from Maryland is not to me a surprise at all. He did not understand the point I made. It is not a question of the Chair's decision. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is obnoxious to section 2 of Rule XIX, that no Senator in debate shall directly or indirectly by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

That was the point of order I made, that it imputes motives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that this is not in debate.

Mr. LODGE. The Chair holds that in offering an amendment a motive can be embodied in an amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. LODGE. The rule says "directly or indirectly in debate."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that it is not in debate.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ROOT. I supposed the Senator from Missouri had yielded the floor.

Mr. REED. I had risen to address the Chair before the Senator from Massachusetts rose.

Mr. ROOT. I will wait until the Senator from Missouri has concluded.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say just a word in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I shall endeavor to speak in as kindly a manner as I can command. This is what occurred: The present bill was brought forward for action in the Senate. Thereafter a conference of Democratic Senators was called. That conference was called in the usual way, and the usual and ordinary notice was given. There attended the conference a large number of Democratic Senators. More than a quorum answered the roll call. The conference held a number of meetings. At each meeting there was more than a quorum of Democratic Senators present. A number of the Senators who are now appearing in revolt, if I may use the term without being offensive, were present at these caucuses or conferences. They took part in the caucus or conference. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] himself offered important amendments. At least one very important amendment offered by him was accepted by the conference.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. May I correct the Senator, so far as I am concerned? I attended the first meeting——

Mr. REED. I spoke of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I beg the Senator's pardon. You said they were all there.

Mr. REED. I said a large number were there. The Senator from Arkansas was there and asked to be excused on account of the condition of his health.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think the Senator misunderstood me. I announced that this was an important question and I did not want to be misunderstood. I was ill and could not attend. I did not ask anyone to excuse me.

Mr. REED. I do not want to get into a disputed fact with the Senator from Arkansas. He has already stated to the Senate what his recollection is, and I simply state what my recollection is, and we will let it stand at that. My recollection is that the Senator from Arkansas distinctly informed the conference that he was about to consult a physician or that he had consulted a physician, and did not, therefore, feel like remaining; but he also stated that he entertained some question about the wisdom of the bill. However, when he left the conference I had the impression and those who sat about me, as far as they expressed themselves, had the impression that the Senator intended to leave with the conference the determination of what should be done with the bill. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] was present at one or two of the meetings of the conference. My recollection is that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]—he is here and can correct me if I am in error—was present at one or two of the conferences.

Mr. HARDWICK. What was the statement of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. I was simply stating that the Senator from Georgia was present at one or two meetings of the conference.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I merely wish to state the circumstances attending my presence. I attended one or two of the preliminary meetings, but when it developed that it was the purpose to make it a binding caucus, and that the bill it might report would probably be one that I could not support, I remained away, sending word to the conference of my fear that I might not be able to support the bill without important amendments.

Mr. REED. First and last, I think every one of the seven Senators who are now out of harmony with the rest of us on this measure was present except the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. I may be in error about that; the record of the caucus will show who was and who was not present.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is in error; and when a Senator finds himself in error as to a statement of fact, although he may have some confidence in his own recollection and insist that he is right, when he is contradicted by several persons, then he ought to suspect the integrity of his own memory.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I had not been contradicted until the Senator from New York rose to his feet; and, of course, well understanding the temper in which he made his criticism and his present spiritual exaltation, I can understand how he just now regards himself as several persons.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri was contradicted by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]; he was then contradicted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and I contradicted him when I said that he was in error in his recollection of what transpired.

As to myself, in response to an invitation to attend a meeting of Democratic Senators, I remained for about 30 minutes at the first meeting. I then withdrew and never returned. I never recognized the right of any man, be he Senator or holding any other public place, to control my intellectual liberty with regard to a public problem which my constituents expect me to solve according to my own lights.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from New York absolutely admits that the statement I made is true, so far as he is concerned. What was my statement? It was a very moderate one, and would not have given the Senator from New York offense if he were in his usual amiable frame of mind. Neither is it a statement that has yet been denied by a single individual. It was that, so far as my recollection went, all of the seven Senators, who are now declining to act with their associates on this side, were present at some meeting of the conference except the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. The Senator from Arkansas verifies that by his statement; the Senator from New York verifies it by his statement; the Senator from Georgia verifies it by his statement. I now desire to correct myself, because my recollection is refreshed, by adding that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN] was not present; at least I did not see him. So that it stands admitted that all the seven Democrats were present except Senators VARDAMAN and CAMDEN.

Mr. CAMDEN. I was not present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what happened at those conferences which were called in the ordinary way and which in usual course adjourned from day to day? We fully and freely discussed the bill. Various amendments were tendered to the bill. Some of the Senators now acting with the Republicans remained a short time and some remained a longer time, but all with the two stated exceptions were there at some time. I think it is true—and I was about to make the statement if the Senator from Georgia had not anticipated me—that word arrived at the caucus—whether it was publicly announced or not I do not know—that the Senator from Georgia was in doubt whether he could go with us to a vote for the bill unless it had certain amendments put on it. I think the Senator from Georgia will bear me out in the statement that he was present and voted upon certain provisions of or amendments to the bill. He was present during the early stages of our deliberations.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think, if the Senator will pardon me, there was one question that was disposed of by unanimous consent in the discussion of which I participated.

Mr. REED. I thought the Senator was there and voted when we increased the number of members of the shipping board.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I was not.

Mr. REED. However that may be the record will show.

I now desire to address myself, just for a moment, to broader phases of the matter under debate.

Everyone will concede that the Executive has no right to coerce the legislative branch of the Government or to coerce or cajole any Member of the legislative branch. So far as I am concerned, I know of no attempt whatsoever to place any coercion of any kind upon any Member of the Senate with reference to this bill or any proceeding connected therewith. Neither do I know of any attempt to influence or control the action of the Democrats in conference assembled. I do not believe anybody else knows of any such effort. If such there be, I invite him now, in my time, to make known the facts on the floor of the Senate.

The President recommended legislation of this character in a message to Congress. I have no doubt that in incidental conversation with Senators he may have mentioned the bill. He may have sought to promote by private conversations that which he had publicly and officially recommended; but I think no man will rise to say that by any improper act or word has he interfered.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. REED. I yield for a question.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if he does not think that the challenge which the President made in his Indianapolis speech to any of the Republicans to oppose him was improper interference?

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, the President of the United States went out to Indianapolis and made a speech——

Mr. LIPPITT (interrupting). Or a break.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Rhode Island says "or a break." Well, possibly, it was a break—a bad break for the standpat element of the Republican Party. It almost broke their hearts; and they have been uttering lamentations ever since.

Mr. GALLINGER. But we still live.

Mr. REED. Yes, you still live; and so does Satan; likewise sin and the elements of evil continue to exist and sometimes appear to prosper.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have no doubt the Senator from Missouri is perfectly familiar with that particular thing, so that he can answer for him.

Mr. REED. I am quite familiar. I have been a close observer and I have learned that Beelzebub and his brood generally wear the smiling countenances of self-contentment and often of self-righteousness.

I now resume the thread of my remarks at the point of interruption. Mr. President, there occurred in the Democratic conference nothing outside the ordinary unless it was that at the final meeting, instead of a radical difference of opinion existing among those who were present, there was an almost absolute unanimity of judgment; only one member voting in the negative. That gentleman, however, stated that while he cast his vote against the bill, he merely did so in order to record his personal preference. But he plainly stated he intended to yield his personal preference to the overwhelming judgment of his brethren in the caucus, recognizing, as every candid man must recognize, that no individual in the Senate can have his way in regard to everything; neither can he expect to have his way in regard to all matters covered by any bill. So that this Senator simply yielded his preference to the judgment of his associates. Therefore, I say there was nothing remarkable or unusual in this conference, except its unanimity of opinion.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. I do for a question.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The suggestion as to the unanimity that prevailed in the caucus prompts me to ask the Senator from Missouri if a motion was not made in that caucus permitting the United States Government to engage in the coastwise trade with the vessels it might purchase, and whether that motion was not voted down, thereby preventing the ships owned by the United States Government under this proposed act from encroaching upon the preserves of the only Shipping Trust in this country?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the interrogatory does not bear any relation to the question of unanimity, but since the Senator has asked it, I reply that a motion was made of that character, and some of those who were most reluctant to give their support to the bill, and I think one or two who are now voting with our Republican brethren on the other side, voted in the caucus against permitting any ships the United States might acquire to engage in the coastwise trade. I shall be glad, with the consent of the chairman of the caucus, to put that vote in the RECORD. I can assure the Senator from New York that, so far as I was concerned, I not only voted to permit the ships, however or wherever acquired, to engage in the coastwise trade, but when that proposition was defeated I offered an amendment to permit those vessels which were built by the United States in American shipyards to engage in the coastwise trade. That amendment was unanimously accepted.

Mr. President, if I am not further interrupted, I shall be able to conclude what I have to say in a very few words.

This has been from the first a Government of political parties. I say without qualification that it is my opinion that when it ceases to be a Government by political parties the liberties of the American people will be well-nigh at an end. There are certain great forces in this world that are always in combination, that are always active, that always move in concert. Whether they are bound by actual agreement or are held together, to adopt a threadbare phrase, by "the cohesive power of public plunder," they are, nevertheless, constantly acting together. They sleep neither day nor night; they are actuated by the motive of profit. I make no bitter assault upon them; I simply state the facts. The only force that can meet and control and, when necessary, overthrow those great interests is a force of men. The only way a body of men can be made effective is to bring them together in some kind of organization. The moment you begin organization of men, you necessarily require the surrender of many individual preferences and the subornation of personal opinions. The question was well stated by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] a few days ago.

I question whether there has ever been a political platform written by a convention where a majority of the delegates were contented with the entire platform. I question whether there has ever been a political platform yet that, if you had submitted it to the individual opinion of the delegates, you would not have found that 95 per cent of them took exception to some part of it or would have added to or subtracted from it. Necessarily, when you go into a political convention, you do so for the purpose of trying to concentrate the minds of the delegates upon a few propositions; and that necessarily means that mutual concessions must be made. Now, we carry that platform to the people of the Nation and ask the support of millions of voters. It is absolutely unthinkable that all the men who vote for a party approve every part of its platform or that it expresses their exact ideas. Accordingly the members of political parties, from the leaders to the rank and the file, must compromise and must yield. And, finally, bearing the commission of a political party, Senators come here and, sir, it is the duty of those who come here bearing the warrant and badge of authority from a constituency to carry out the will of that constituency as it has been expressed. When Senators come here they come as accredited agents of great political parties, and they step at once into an organization which already exists.

Every Democrat who is elected to this Senate becomes, by virtue of his election, a member of the Democratic organization in the Senate. He becomes ipso facto a unit in the party council, namely, the Democratic conference or caucus. By that party conference, or by those whom that party conference selects, he is even assigned his very seat in this body. From it he receives the quarters in which he makes his offices. He owes to that organization his position on every committee on which he serves. If you deny the right of the caucus to exist, you thereby deny the right of party council; you deny the right or opportunity to arrive at a common opinion; you destroy utterly the power of our party to move en mass. When you have destroyed the power of a party in Congress to so move you have also destroyed the power of the sovereign voters of the United States to unite in the accomplishment of their desires. This is so because the people can not be heard as individuals. They can only speak through their representatives in the Congress of the United States, who assemble from all parts of the land in obedience to the votes of men who, believing alike and acting in concert, send their agents here to also act in concert in carrying out their mandate. When you have denied the people that kind of representation you have deprived them of the power of self-government. I repeat that it is only through the two branches of the National Legislature that the people can engrave upon the tablets of the law the principles in which they believe. If, therefore, these representatives, selected by voters who have a common belief, insist each in going his own way, refusing to act with his party associates, the party and its principles go to ruin and the arms of the people are paralyzed.

Now, sir, we had a party conference. It was duly called. It was largely attended. The debate was free. The vote was decisive. If any Senator felt in his heart that the action of the caucus was violative of the Constitution, or that its support involved the breach of pledges made by him to his constituency, or that the caucus mandate put an outrage upon his conscience, I grant to that Senator the right not to be bound by the caucus. But, sir, there is one thing he ought to have done; he should have notified the caucus plainly and unequivocally that he did not intend to be bound by its action. He should have stated his reasons, and should have withdrawn from its deliberations. There is no middle ground; neither should any man too lightly leave his party council.

Mr. President, I did not rise to say anything bitter, and I believe I have not done so. I have not sought to widen the breach that already unfortunately exists within our party. I hope that I have not wounded the sensibilities of any Democratic Senator.

What I have said was called forth by the bitter arraignment of the Democratic conference by the Senator from Nebraska. Especially do I deny his statement that the policy of our party upon this bill was determined by the vote of one man in the caucus. I assert that the policy of the party at the present time in the Senate is being determined by the unanimous vote of the Democrats who attended the party conference at its final meeting. That final meeting was attended by two-thirds of all the Democratic Senators.

Moreover, it is an utter mistake to assert that this bill does not meet with the approval of the great majority of the Democrats on this side of the Chamber. It is, perhaps, true that each individual Senator would, if he had been charged with the sole duty of writing this bill, have prepared it in a form somewhat different from that in which it now appears. But the same assertion could be truthfully made of every bill pending in Congress. But upon the main principles of the pending bill I believe there is as much unanimity of opinion upon this side as I have ever seen.

The protest made by our friends can not be justified upon the ground that the party conference was guilty of any irregularity, that it was guilty of any coercion. It can not be justified upon any other grounds save those the Senator from Georgia undertook to put forward, namely, that he believes that the constitutionality of the bill is doubtful, and that he feels he has made pledges to his people contrary to the provisions of the bill. The reasons advanced by the Senator from Georgia have been put forward by no other Democrat who attended the caucus.

Questions of "conscience," "constitutionality," and "pledges" every man must settle for himself and must answer for to his constituency.

But, Mr. President, I am unwilling that my party shall be arraigned because the Senators here representing it went into a conference. Neither shall I permit to go unchallenged the charge that that conference brought forth an outrageous bill, nor that by outrageous methods the caucus has sought to force a wicked bill down the throat of the party and the country. That is, sir, not the situation.

Those who have seen fit to part company with us on this bill must justify their conduct upon some other ground than improper, unjust, or coercive conduct of the Democratic conference.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I might be charged with extravagance of speech if I said that the performances of this body in the last week are a sad commentary upon the futile and ineffectual efforts that have been made to promulgate and adhere to a program of legislation. If it should be described as a burlesque on representative government, there would be much to justify the use of that language.

The most extraordinary and revolutionary methods are invoked, whereby the views of a supposed majority are to be imposed upon the people of the country. Is the procedure wise? I think not. I know of no demand for this legislation. The question was never discussed by the Democratic Party, and the principle contended for never found utterance in a Democratic platform; and yet from somewhere came the suggestion that this legislation must be passed, and there were a number—a sufficient number, perhaps; certainly a large number—on this side of the Chamber who, irrespective of their own opinions regarding the merits of this legislation, were willing to respond to the wishes or the commands of influences beyond this Chamber; and it is now proposed that, in order that this bill shall be enacted into law, every Senator shall remain in the Chamber during long sessions of perhaps 24 hours each from now until the 4th day of March. As a Democrat, I wish to say to my friends on this side of the Chamber that they are assuming an awful responsibility to the people of the country in attempting to coerce legislation of doubtful value by the employment of these extraordinary and unprecedented methods. Orderly administration of a legislative program in a short session would see to it that the appropriation bills were passed—those necessary, vital pieces of legislation which are essential for the maintenance and support of the Government; and at an early stage of this session the Democrats were almost unanimous in their judgment that that was the course that should be pursued—to pass the appropriation bills—and then if there should be any time left that it should be devoted to the consideration of this ship-purchase bill or any other legislation. I venture to assert that that change in the Democratic program in this session was not made at the suggestion of a single Democratic Senator. The command came from without the walls of the Capitol to pass this ship-purchase iniquity before the appropriation bills should be submitted to the Senate of the United States for its consideration.

I sometimes think, Mr. President, that I am unfortunate, because temperamentally I find it impossible to do what so many other men do—complacently surrender their intellectual liberty. I can not crook the pregnant hinges of the knee that thrift may follow fawning. I, sir, come from a State the people of which commissioned me to represent them in this body, and I deny the right of any man or of any group of men, however high or potential may be their influence in this country, to tell me that I must be recreant to my solemn obligation to 10,000,000 people; that I shall not represent them as I think proper, but that I shall allow my conduct and my vote on public questions to be dictated by others. The Democratic Party for years has been denouncing caucus rule. The secret caucus had become so odious and infamous that during all the time I have been in the Senate, until a few days ago, no Democratic Senator would admit that the Democratic Senators ever held a caucus. When we did meet, it was insisted that we simply held conferences for the mutual exchange of views, with the object of composing differences and bringing about a common understanding. Well, Mr. President, if the party has fallen on evil days and is now willing to resort to those pernicious practices which it has condemned for years, it will not affect my conduct, because while I am in this body I shall be a Senator of the United States, responsible alone to my own State and to my own conscience. What is there in the career or antecedents of the men who would dictate our conduct that would justify or incline me to yield to their views? Are they more familiar with public questions? Are they more devoted to the public weal? Have they a vision of public needs beyond that of the rest of us? I think not. If it is necessary to reassert it, I declare that I shall never, in a matter of principle, allow a caucus or a conference or a group of men to tell me how I must vote. If it is a matter regarding the routine of party policy, not involving vital principle, I shall of course do what the majority of my party colleagues think proper, because in doing that I do not offend my own conscience.

Mr. President, the situation of the Democratic Party at this time may well excite the anxiety of those who love the party and have always supported its candidates and principles. The likelihood of New York State remaining in the Democratic column is doubtful, and if you would remove the last lingering hope of success let it be known to the people of that State that in a secret caucus, behind closed doors, there will be 28 Democratic Senators representing a voting population not greater than the population that I as a single Democrat represent, and that by the operation of caucus rule 35 Democratic Senators can bind the representative of the State of New York hand and foot. How long do you think that the people of that State will support the Democratic Party if it avows its belief in such principles?

Mr. President, 14 States, having 2 Democratic votes each, have a voting population only equal to the voting population of New York. A two-thirds vote in the Democratic caucus is 35. The vote of New York, as I have said, represents a voting population equal to that of 14 other States, which 14 States will have a representation in the caucus of 28 votes.

In 1912 the total vote cast by Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia was 1,486,688, and in the same election the total vote of New York State was 1,471,695. The vote in detail is as follows:

Vote in 1912.

Alabama	117,888
Arizona	23,722
Arkansas	123,859
Florida	51,891
Georgia	121,533
Louisiana	79,372
Maryland	231,978
Mississippi	64,319
Montana	79,826
Nevada	20,115
Oregon	137,040
South Carolina	50,348
Tennessee	247,821
Virginia	136,976
Total	1,486,688
New York, whole vote 1912	1,471,695

Is it fair or is it right that when the State of New York, or any other State, large or small, sends its representative to the United States Senate his judgment of public questions is to be suppressed because there is a majority of Democratic Senators in a secret caucus who decide upon something else? Is this representative government?

When has this become Democratic doctrine, I ask? Is it believed that the Democratic Party of the country will support it? I am confident that when the time comes it will repudiate it and repudiate the self-annointed leaders who declare such a doctrine.

Mr. President, nothing is so distasteful to men of principle and of decency as to find men in public life imputing, without the slightest foundation, some personal influence or motive to those with whom they disagree. Among gentlemen outside of the Senate it would be regarded as a cowardly thing, because no brave man will impute to another a base motive unless he has reason to believe it. I pay the Senate no great compliment when I suggest that the standards of conduct which are observed among gentlemen in the world, that are found among men in the world, should, at least, be respected within the four walls of the United States Senate.

Every now and again during the discussion the past week some Senators—fortunately I do not think the number exceeds three—have been tempted to throw out a subtle hint as to the possible activities of the so-called Shipping Trust. I shall not retort in kind. I despise personalities, and I refrained from making some remarks a few days ago lest under the provocation I might offend the rule, which should be respected by every Member of this body.

So far as I am personally concerned, however, I feel at liberty to call the attention of the Senate to a few things that have transpired in this body within the last two or three years. In August, I think, 1913, in the two or three months about that time we were engaged in the discussion of a bill to repeal the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act. My attitude on that question was well known to my colleagues and to the country. But what are the facts, so far as they are pertinent to this discussion? During the last Congress of Mr. Taft's term an act had been passed for the control and government of the Panama Canal. It provided that vessels engaged in coastwise shipping might go through the canal free of tolls, but, then, it excluded from the use of the canal all the trust-controlled vessels employed in the coastwise trade. In an investigation made in the House of Representatives it was shown, as I have stated more than once, although the accuracy of my statement with respect to the percentage has been questioned, it was shown, according to my recollection, that 92 per cent of the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade in the United States were owned or controlled by the railroads of the country or by large shipping combinations operated in disregard of the Sherman antitrust law.

Therefore, the benefits of the free-toll exemption could apply only to the 8 per cent which represented those who were engaged as independent operators in the shipping trade. While the entire number of craft engaged in the American coastwise trade was 26,000, by this process of exclusion and elimination it was estimated by the Commissioner of Navigation that there would be but 33 ships in the American coastwise marine available for use through the canal. Largely, it was said, through the insistence of the great railroads of the country and of the shipping combinations, which were denied the benefit of the free-toll exemption, an agitation was begun to deprive the independent shipowners of the toll exemptions. They succeeded in this body, and at least two of the three Senators who have been shrieking Ship Trust here the last week or so voted to prevent the independent shippers owning the 33 ships from enjoying that advantage through the Panama Canal. While this was a victory for the Shipping Trust, I do not intend by this reference to disparage the gentlemen who contributed to the result. They were doubtless animated by patriotic motives, but their conduct might well be assailed if other Senators were as careless in the use of uncomplimentary language as they have been.

More recently, in August of last year, a month after the foreign war began, we had a bill for consideration providing for an emergency ship registration. It was well known that we had no ships in the over-seas trade. Our coastwise trade is perhaps the largest and the most profitable in the world, but we had not to exceed 16 ships flying the American flag in the over-seas trade of the Atlantic and of the Pacific.

When the war began it was deemed necessary to enlarge as far as possible our over-seas marine. It was known that ships with a net tonnage of almost 1,000,000 tons, built in foreign shipyards, were owned by American citizens and were flying foreign flags. In order to induce those American citizens to bring their ships into the American marine and to fly the American flag certain exemptions in the navigation laws were made for their benefit, and as a result of that legislation about 50 per cent of the foreign ships owned by American citizens are now flying the American flag.

The bill as it left the Senate differed slightly from the bill as it came over from the House, and in conference it was decided by a majority of the conferees that it would improve the legislation by adding to the bill the provision that foreign-built vessels might also engage in the coastwise trade if registered pursuant to the provisions of the act within two years from its passage.

The act as it passed the Senate and the House provided that these foreign ships owned by American citizens should only engage in the over-seas trade. But, as I have said, only 50 per cent of those ships have come under our flag, and it was thought that they would all come into our service if we offered to them this additional inducement that all those who come in within two years might also be permitted to engage in the coastwise trade. The recommendation to embrace that provision in the bill came back to this body in a report signed by myself as the chairman of the conference and the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. What happened to that provision when it came back? What happened to the conference report? It was said that the Shipping Trust—the Shipping Trust that was condemned by the first Panama Canal act, the Shipping Trust which was helped by the repeal of the free tolls—came down to Washington and after two or three days of its activity the almost unprecedented thing was done, that a conference report coming back to the Senate was rejected by the Senate because of the provision that American citizens owning foreign ships should be permitted to use them in the coastwise trade.

Of course, from the beginning of the Government the coastwise trade has been a monopoly in the sense that only American-built ships have been permitted to engage in it, and this monopoly could be effectually destroyed if foreign-built ships were permitted to engage in it.

As I have stated, it is the result of the examination and investigation made in the House of Representatives that 92 per cent of this monopoly is now controlled either by the railroads or by ship combinations conducted and operated in disregard of the antitrust law.

Where did these two or three Senators who now say that the action of the Senate a few days ago is a great victory for the Shipping Trust stand when the proposition came up? I know where the senior Senator from Missouri stood. He said with one of his profound utterances:

> I think foreign-built ships ought to be permitted to engage in the coastwise trade, but at the same time I shall not vote for that now.

It is fair to say to the junior Senator from Missouri that at that time he voted to allow foreign-built ships to engage in the coastwise trade, and it was not the first time that the junior Senator from Missouri had indicated his attitude on that question.

I took the liberty of asking the junior Senator from Missouri a little while ago, when these revelations were being made, as to what took place in this so-called Democratic caucus, if a proposition was not made in that caucus that the United States Government under this act should be permitted to operate in the coastwise trade the foreign ships that it purchased. Such a proposal was made, and by a very decisive majority it was voted down in this secret caucus which we are commanded to respect.

Senators, do you recognize the importance of that? It means that while under this bill you authorize the United States Government to expend ten or fifty or in time perhaps a hundred million dollars for the purchase of ships, yet under this bill by decree of a Democratic caucus the United States Government itself is prohibited from entering into its own coastwise trade. That surely is a victory for the Shipping Trust. Who is to be benefited by that prohibition? Will the people of the country be benefited? Will the Government be benefited by placing that restriction upon its use of its own ships? Is it not a betrayal of the rights of the American people when you exclude Government ships from our own coastwise trade?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Will not the benefit of this exclusion come to those interests which are believed now to be all powerful in the coastwise trade?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator asked me about the vote in caucus on the proposition to admit to coastwise business all vessels that might be acquired under the act, and I replied to his interrogatory that a proposition of that kind had been defeated and one had been adopted permitting the entrance into the coastwise trade of those vessels acquired under the act which were built in American shipyards. I stopped with my statement at that point. I should have said that there were many in the caucus or conference who gave as their reason for not admitting all the vessels that might be acquired under the act to the coastwise trade that the bill already had concentrated against it a tremendous opposition, and that if it were so framed as to admit all vessels which might be acquired under the act the result would be that the coastwise interests would exert themselves to such an extent as to prevent, or at least make more difficult, the passage of the bill.

Some who advocated and who voted for the limited language adopted did so upon that ground, whereas some others voted for the limited language because they were, in fact, opposed to the Government having the broad right to enter its vessels in the coastwise trade and preferred what they regarded as the lesser of two evils. Of course the Senator knows what my position has been for a long time, namely——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. REED. Namely that I would open the coastwise trade of the country to the ships of all nations so that the trust would be confronted by a real competition.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, a little while since my friend the junior Senator from Missouri seemed to discover some manifestations of irritation on my part and he attempted, I think, to diagnose the cause, but he failed. The fact is I had not fully recovered from the effect produced on my mind by hearing the Senator, when he offered his substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, speak of disgruntled Democrats and convey the suggestion that neither they nor the Republicans should confer with the representatives of any special interest. I have said enough, I think, to let the Senate, surely to let the country, know where the lobby, if there has been one, has been most effective. The American Shipping Trust has nothing to fear from this product of the Democratic caucus.

The statement made by the Senator from Nebraska to the effect that the Executive had unduly interfered with the deliberations of Congress met with some sort of a contradiction or denial from the junior Senator from Missouri. Well, the country knows whether or not there is anything to support the statement made by the Senator from Nebraska. The President of the United States, who is a frank and honest man, does not conceal the fact that in legislation he has resorted to every means which he considered legitimate to impose his will upon the Congress of the United States, notwithstanding the tradition that has come down to us from the fathers that our Government consisted of three independent departments—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial—and that neither was to intrench upon the prerogatives of the other.

I say now that there would be as much propriety in a President of the United States invading the judicial department as there would be in his domination of the legislative department; there would be just as much propriety if the President of the United States were to send for the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and ask him to come to the White House and discuss a pending case as there would be if he were to send to the Senate and command some of the Senators to go down and take their orders as to what they should do in this body. The Senate can not be independent so long as it supinely yields to Executive dictation. Opinions may differ with regard to these views to which I now give expression, but as a Senator I feel no restraint in giving voice to my fixed conviction on this subject.

The Constitution imposes duties upon the President, as it imposes duties upon the Senate; but the Constitution has fixed limitations upon the exercise of the Executive prerogative, which are more honored in the breach than in the observance. While no one will impeach the high purpose and the patriotism of the President of the United States, as was said here a day or two ago, even his most sycophantic follower will not say that he is infallible. I know nothing in his training or experience that should incline the representatives of the sovereign States in this body to surrender to him or any other official their deliberate judgment regarding public policies and public problems.

I do not agree with the majority of my colleagues with respect to certain fundamental phases of the pending legislation, and whenever I am confronted with the necessity of either accepting the judgment of my colleagues or my own, I beg to assure the Senate that my judgment will control. I court no man's favor and fear no man's frown. I know my duty and dare discharge it as I think proper. I recognize no master but my own conscience, and no influence, official or otherwise, is powerful enough to make me recreant to my obligations to my State and to the Nation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the motion that is pending before the Senate is with relation to compelling the attendance of absent Senators. An amendment has been offered to that proposition by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I regret very much indeed that such an amendment has been presented. It can have no tendency except to prevent the Members upon this side of the Chamber from making any future attempt to get together on legislative matters. I regret exceedingly the presentation of the amendment by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, because it can not help but also emphasize the differences between the seven Democrats and the remainder of the Democrats in the Senate. We can not have a cohesive party; we can not pass legislation in this Chamber; we can not enact Democratic legislation unless a better spirit prevails than that which has recently been manifested upon this side of the Chamber. It seems to me that the sooner we realize that the better off we shall be in the way of getting legislation.

I must say, Mr. President, that I have deplored the tendency of Members upon this side of the Chamber to denounce other Democratic Members. It does no good. We must remember that these men are acting according to their consciences, and, consequently, we have no right to substitute our views as a full determination for their line of action. At the same time I deplore exceedingly that those Members should also have cast reflections upon various other Members upon this side of the Chamber. It all tends to disintegration, not to construction; it tends to prevent, and not to construct, legislation.

Mr. President, I have regretted exceedingly the use of the word "trust" as it has been uttered by some of the Members in this body, implying an improper influence as to this legislation, because you can make an accusation of that kind upon any proposition which may arise. I care not which side you take on any legislative question, there are always some men or corporations that are interested in enacting or defeating the legislation. If we are going to have any legislation during this session it becomes necessary for us to agree in some way with the Members upon this side of the Chamber. It seems to me that we ought to try to get together; and I feel that the seven members of the Democratic Party who have departed from the line of action which has been proposed by the majority should present a proposition to the majority of the Democrats as to what amendments they would be willing to accept to this bill. This bill does not involve any fundamental principle.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. The question I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado is, Would it not be appropriate for the remainder of the Senate to retire while this proposition is presented to the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. You usually do that, and why not do it now?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; the Senator from New York knows full well that legislation can not be enacted by a party elected to power unless there is some kind of cooperation among the members of the party. It is impossible to construct legislation in line with any principle unless there is cohesion; and while there ought to be a liberality with regard to those who enter caucuses or who become members of conferences, yet it seems to me it is necessary to have cooperative action.

Mr. President, as to this measure the discussion has been almost entirely upon the assumption that it will involve the governmental ownership of transportation lines. The bill has been discussed as if the theory has been for the Government to own all transportation lines. That is not the case, according to the provisions of the bill. There is nothing in the bill to indicate any such policy upon the part of the Government or upon the part of those who are advocating it. It is one thing to say that you believe in Government ownership of all transportation lines, and an entirely different thing to say that you believe in the governmental ownership of one transportation line to regulate traffic and to regulate the rates that may be charged by other transportation companies. Especially is that true when the effect of a great war is confronting us. War prevails, and it is engaging the great European powers. That conflict affects our commerce for the time being, so that, in addition to all other considerations, this bill becomes an emergency measure. It seems to me that when Senators seriously talk about governmental ownership of all railroads or governmental ownership of all transportation lines of ships, they can not find sanction for such an extreme construction in the provisions of this bill. The idea is simply that the Government, under certain contingencies, may become the owner of one line.

Some say that the amount of charges levied by the shipping companies are exorbitant; some say that the rates are justified by reason of the risk incurred and by reason of the dangers that the ships meet when they go out on the high seas. No matter what the reasons are, the rates are high; no matter whether they are 200 or 1,000 per cent higher than heretofore—and it has been stated here that in some instances they are 1,000 per cent higher—they are abnormally high; and if a line of steamers can be purchased or a line can be built and operated that will have a tendency to bring down the rates, it will unquestionably be to the benefit of the people of the United States to have that done. I apprehend that if the United States owned a line of ships, and it was known that they belonged to the Government, there would not be a foreign nation, belligerent or otherwise, that would ever attempt to interfere with transportation on that line. That being the case, Mr. President, it seems to me that the theory that it would plunge the Nation into the governmental ownership of all railroads and of all shipping lines is not, and can not be, drawn from the provisions of this bill.

But, Mr. President, the question that is before us now is a question even higher than that. The question before us now is a question as to whether this legislative body can proceed to legislate; and that, of course, is more important than any bill. In my mind, there is a solution for the difficulties under which we labor and for the obstacles with which we are surrounded, and that is the adoption of a cloture rule—not such a cloture rule as the House of Representatives has, but a cloture rule that would limit each Senator, say, to two hours of debate upon each bill, including all his remarks upon amendments thereto. That would make this body the greatest debating body on earth; it would elevate the tone of our discussions, and the debates would be listened to with marked interest by all the people. The man who can not in two hours give the strongest reason for the adoption or rejection of a measure is certainly not a cogent reasoner and is simply wasting his time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with what the Senator has just said, and I want to say to the Senator that as soon as these preliminary motions have been disposed of I have a resolution similar to the one he has outlined, which I expect to offer as a substitute or as an amendment, as the parliamentary situation may develop, to the particular rule that is pending. I judge that I will be helped by the Senator to secure its adoption.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that I have always been in favor of a limited cloture rule, and I believe that ultimately it is bound to come.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator read the proposed rule which I gave notice I would offer?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am sorry I have not, because if it is along that line I must say that I will appreciate it.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator, further, if he will permit me, if he does not think that now is a good time to offer as an amendment a rule that will bring about such a procedure?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not see any objection to it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If it will produce that result, it seems to me that it would be good. Ultimately, Mr. President, cloture is bound to be adopted by the United States Senate. We can not proceed in the manner that we have, blocking legislation, without ultimately forcing the adoption of some system of cloture. I introduced, nearly two years ago, a constitutional amendment, which I have endeavored a number of times to get up for consideration in this body. That constitutional amendment would, to a certain extent, solve the question of filibustering.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is perfectly manifest that there is a disposition to discuss this motion at great length to the exclusion of the bill itself. In view of that fact, not because I yield the principle contained in the measure, but because I want the shipping bill to be considered, I withdraw the motion I made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment?

Mr. REED. I withdraw the original motion and my amendment thereto.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I doubt very much whether he can withdraw an original motion after it has been amended.

Mr. REED. It has not been amended.

Mr. SMOOT. It has been amended by the Senator from Nebraska, and there has also been an amendment offered to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. It can only be withdrawn, as I understand, by unanimous consent, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the motion has not been amended. There has been an amendment offered, but no amendment has been adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I intended to say, of course.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, Rule XXI covers the matter. It provides that—

> Any motion or resolution may be withdrawn or modified by the mover at any time before a decision, amendment, or ordering of the yeas and nays, except a motion to reconsider, which shall not be withdrawn without leave.

The mere offering of an amendment is not an amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment has been offered, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Missouri, and he has not yielded yet to anyone. The Senator from Missouri has the floor. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is always an understood thing in the Senate that no one is required to yield to the Senator from Utah; everybody gets out of his way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. REED. I simply was about to read the rule which has been presented by the Senator from Florida, and I insist that it covers the case.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say that I have the floor; but if the Senator from Missouri is going to withdraw the amendment or the resolution which he has introduced I care no further to occupy the time of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator from Colorado yielded to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yielded simply for the purpose of letting the Senator from Missouri make a motion; that was all. He asked me to yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado now yield the floor?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield, with the purpose of taking it again if the amendment still remains for discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I now be recognized?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will be recognized for five minutes for the purpose of advising the Chair concerning his views of the construction of the rule.

Mr. SMOOT. In the first place, then, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Chair to the rule at the bottom of page 9 of the Manual:

> It shall not be in order to interrupt a Senator having the floor for the purpose of introducing any memorial, petition, report of a committee, resolution, or bill. It shall be the duty of the Chair to enforce this rule without any point of order hereunder being made by a Senator.

Now, to return to Rule XXI, invoked by the Senator from Florida. It is under the head of "Motions," and paragraph 2 particularly states:

> Any motion or resolution may be withdrawn or modified by the mover at any time before a decision, amendment, or ordering of the yeas and nays, except a motion to reconsider, which shall not be withdrawn without leave.

Mr. President, there is no question but that an amendment has been offered to the motion made by the Senator from Missouri; and Rule XXI, the very rule that is invoked, in paragraph 2, says specifically that that can not be done.

Mr. President, notwithstanding that the Senator from Missouri was out of order, and that it was the duty of the Chair to state that the Senator could not interrupt the other Senator for that purpose, which he did, Rule XXI of the rules of this body is against withdrawing a motion wherever there has been an amendment offered to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Had the yeas and nays been ordered on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is advised that the yeas and nays have been ordered upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then how, under Rule XXI, could he withdraw it? I have no objection to his withdrawing it; but I——

Mr. REED. I did not understand, Mr. President, that the yeas and nays had been ordered upon the motion or upon either of the amendments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood they had, and that is the reason why I asked the question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in order to avoid an interminable discussion I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion.

Mr. SMOOT. To that, Mr. President, I object.

Mr. REED. Very well. Now, Mr. President, I move that I be permitted——

Mr. GALLINGER. No; you can not do that.

Mr. REED (continuing). To withdraw the motion.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the rule that motion is entirely out of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Absolutely.

Mr. REED. I move to lay the motion and all amendments on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I say just a word on that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President. A motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to lay the motion and all amendments on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Everybody who is personally acquainted with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is fond of him in a personal way. He is genial and congenial. He has been a judge of a great court in a great State, and yet this morning he has undertaken to say that the President of the United States was not a part of the legislative body of the United States. If that opinion had come from somebody who had never studied law at all or, having studied it, knew no law, it would not surprise anybody.

Mr. President, the President of the United States is a part of the legislative power of the United States. He is made so by the Constitution itself. In the first place, there is conferred upon him the power to veto a legislative act. He is thus two-thirds of the legislative as a final arbiter in final analysis. No legislative act can become a law without his cooperation; therefore a President of the United States who was opposed to a bill pending in Congress to the extent that if passed he would veto it would be merely wasting the time of the Congress and of the people of the United States not to permit that fact to be known.

The Constitution further provides that he shall—> from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

In addition to the fact that the President of the United States is, by our Federal Constitution, made a part of the legislative power of the United States, it is also true that he is a citizen of the United States and has the same right to talk to any other citizen of the United States about public measures that I have or the Senator from Colorado has.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a minute. When the Senator from New York arraigns the Chief Magistrate of this Nation at this time for talking privately to Senators and Members of Congress about pending measures, he arraigns George Washington to some extent; he arraigns Thomas Jefferson for nearly every measure that passed during Jefferson's administration; he arraigns Andrew Jackson, the Democrat militant, who hardly spent a day without talking to the members of his party in one or both bodies of Congress about what party policies should be; he arraigns Lincoln, the father of the Republican Party, who, perhaps, next to Jefferson, held more heart-to-heart talks with Members of the House and the Senate than any other President of the United States; he arraigns Grover Cleveland, who pursued the same policy; he arraigns McKinley, who managed the program and the policy of the Republican Party while he was President of the United States, almost entirely from the White House, by private conference with Senators and with Representatives. Every great President of the United States, regarding himself as a part of the legislative power of the United States and as the selected leader of his party, has considered himself at liberty to talk to the other integers constituting the legislative power about what should be the policy of the Nation.

Moreover, as I have said once before upon this floor, this country never suffered by leadership. This country has suffered by bossism. Leadership is the legitimate use by elected persons—the choice of the people—of human intelligence to persuade other human intelligence to pursue in harmony a common purpose. That sort of leadership Jefferson had; that sort of leadership Madison had; that sort of leadership Jackson had; and Lincoln had it; and Woodrow Wilson, thank God, has it also. When a man talks to me about the President of the United States "dictating" to me because he holds a conversation with me that the Senator from Montana might hold or that a farmer or a mechanic might hold, and because he attempts to persuade me that something is well for the American people or that something is bad for the American people, that man undertakes to make out of the President of the United States the only citizen of the United States who is not at liberty to talk to a Senator or a Representative, placing himself and me as Senators and placing the Members of the House of Representatives upon such a high plane, or else placing the President upon such a low plane, that the only citizen of the United States who can not talk to him or me—with our permission, of course, as is the case with all others—is the President of the United States, the Chief Magistrate of the Nation and the selected leader of his party. A boss is a leader—not elected, but self-chosen—a chief of the invisible empire.

Mr. President, the leader of a party in the mother country of free institutions is the chief of a chosen committee of the House of Commons, chosen by the majority party, and I have frequently regretted that it was not so here; but owing to the manner in which our Government is formed it is not, because over there the King is no longer a part of the legislative power, because he can no longer veto an act of Parliament.

Mr. President, the sole respect in which this Federal Government of ours has supreme and unlimited authority, except in so far as it is limited and bound by the express prohibitions or inhibitions of the Constituiton, is with regard to the regulation of foreign commerce, and it is no new thing for a Democrat to take that position. As far back as Mr. Jefferson's administration the Democratic Party took the position that the power of Congress over foreign commerce was so great that they could positively prohibit it altogether, and Congress passed an embargo act and a nonintercourse act, and both acts were upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States.

With regard to interstate commerce, there is some limitation, to wit, where the power of Congress over interstate commerce comes in conflict with the police powers of the States within the States; but with regard to foreign commerce there is absolutely no limitation of the powers of the Federal Government, except the bill of rights in the Constitution, which is the express inhibition and prohibition on all government in behalf of human liberties.

Senators stand here and talk that sort of nonsense in which they themselves do not believe; and Democrats talk it when the Democratic Party, under the very father of the Democracy, went to the extreme limit of saying that the power to regulate foreign commerce carried with it the power to destroy it, to prohibit it, and the Supreme Court agreed with the President and with the Democratic Congress of that time.

Senators say that the power to "regulate" commerce does not carry with it the power to "engage in" commerce. It does, providing only that engaging in commerce is the only, or is even in the judgment of Congress the best, way of regulating that commerce.

Another thing I have heard in this debate that I have gotten tired of is this: At the St. Louis convention the Democratic Party passed a resolution that it was in favor of building up an American merchant marine, but without bounty or subsidy and without burdens upon the people. The man who drew that resolution thought he understood English. I happen to have been the man that drew it. Since that time various Democratic conventions have adopted the same central idea, with some little modification.

Senators stand here and talk about this bill being a bounty, being a subsidy. In God's name, is not an average Member of the Senate equal in information about the meaning of words to a tolerably good pupil in a high school, or competent, at least, to be one? Turn to your International Dictionary, turn to Webster, turn to Worcester, turn to the Century—and I have turned to all of them here lately, because I thought I understood the meaning of the English words "bounty" and "subsidy," those two at any rate—and I find a bounty is "a free gift," a benefaction. Where is there any free gift in this bill to anybody whomsoever, anywhere? I find that a subsidy is an aid from the government or public treasury to private enterprise. Where is there in this bill any aid from the Government Treasury to private enterprise? In fact, you are making your attack upon the bill because you charge it is not private enterprise, but is governmental enterprise.

Why, Mr. President, every year I buy mules for cotton cultivation from Missourians and from Kentuckians who sell mules down in Mississippi, and I have for the first time to learn that when I buy a mule from a Kentucky or a Missouri mule drover I am guilty of either giving him a bounty or of subsidizing him. This bill contemplates the purchase and the building of ships, but neither the purchase of a ship nor the purchase of a mule nor the building of a ship nor the building of a cabin can possibly be either a bounty or a subsidy to the seller or the builder; and nobody with sense enough to stand an examination, as a 14-year-old boy in a common school—nobody that ever looked intelligently into a dictionary to see what either one of the two words meant would say so. In fact, your opposition to this bill is upon the ground that it is not a bounty and it is not a subsidy. The minute we consented to put an amendment in this bill to provide that instead of having the Government own and in certain contingencies operate these ships it shall leave their ownership and their operation to private enterprise, and shall aid this private enterprise and ownership and operation with the public moneys, we would not hear a word of objection to the bill on that side.

It is a curious thing that every man who hitherto has ever supported a ship subsidy—men who have died in the trenches, almost, for ship subsidy—are every one of them opposed to this bill. Why? Because it is not a subsidy nor a bounty to the interests engaged. What foolish words you carry in your mouths when you turn around and argue against the bill on the ground that it is a subsidy, on the alleged ground that it is just what it is not and what you would like it to be—a subsidy! What a remarkable thing it is that Democrats on this side of the Chamber should join in the nonsensical cry! Nor is this bill a "burden on the people." It will remove the burden of exploitive freight rates from the people's commerce.

Mr. President, I did not rise to make a speech. I rose for the purpose of giving notice of a motion.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said about the rules of the Senate. I want to say just one word about them, and then I will offer this motion, and then I shall take my seat.

My friends, the situation here to-day rises above party flags. It rises above partisan emulation. Deliberate obstruction of the right of the Senate to take a vote—filibustering, as we call it—is at times a great and precious privilege when it is invoked for a great and precious purpose. When the South saved its civilization by it the Nation approved; but the only reason why the filibuster won then was that before it was half-way fought through you learned on that side of the Chamber that the Nation was not with you; that the public sentiment in the North even was not with you; that you had been flaunting the bloody shirt too late; that the hands on the clock of time had passed beyond that; that you had not noticed it, or that your private Republican clock was slow and not in unison with the hands on the clock of time and evolution and progress. But when you resort to this sort of method, not in behalf of conscience, because conscience is a thing that concerns morals, and there are no morals involved in this; not in behalf of the preservation of a great civilization or of the integrity of a great race; not in behalf of some great and noble and precious purpose, but merely on a question whether or not the Federal Government shall in a period of great, unexpected, and unpreventable emergency buy a few ships, and whether, because it proposes to buy them and to a certain extent operate them, you can as partisans hamper and hamstring and embarrass and worry the administration of the opposite party, let me tell you where you have gotten to. If you have not found it out now, you will find it out before very long. You have got to a point where you have made not only yourselves but the Senate of the United States an object of popular contempt.

I sometimes think that old Ben Franklin was right when he said we ought to have only one legislative chamber, anyhow, and that elected by the people. But our forefathers made this Constitution with a compromise in it—one House elected by the people and the other selected by the States as ambassadors from the States. We have got along very well with it upon the whole, because, upon the whole, the Senate has conducted itself wisely. But to stand here day after day, not for the purpose of defeating a bill, not for the purpose of passing legislation, but for the purpose of defeating a vote upon legislation, brings us to the question as to whether it is not better to moderate the rules of the Senate, whether it is not better to amend them in certain respects, so that we may regain a part of the popular confidence which we have lost and may refrain from further incurring at least a part of the popular contempt which we have deserved.

Mr. President, I now offer the following notice of a motion to amend the rules, to go over for 24 hours under the rules.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah object to receiving the amendment at this time?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the notice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Secretary to return it to me. I shall myself read it, thus giving the notice under the rules requiring 24 hours:

Mr. WILLIAMS gives notice of his intention to offer a motion to amend the rules as follows:

Insert after the words "to lay on the table," in Rule XXII, the following:

"Any Senator arising in his place and asserting that in his opinion an attempt is being made on the floor of the Senate to obstruct, hinder, or delay the right of the Senate to proceed to a vote, the Chair shall, without permitting any debate thereon, put the question to the Senate, 'Is it the sense of the Senate that an attempt is being made to obstruct, hinder, or delay a vote?' And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative, then it shall be in order, to the exclusion of the consideration of all other questions, for any Senator to move to fix a time for voting on the pending bill or resolution and all amendments thereto, and the said motion shall be decided without debate: Provided, however, That the time fixed in said motion for taking the vote on the pending bill or resolution and all amendments thereto shall be at least two calendar days after the day on which said moton is made."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I give that notice under the rule.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection, of course, to the Senator reading it, but I object to its being offered at this time. It is after 2 o'clock, and I also call attention to the fact that some six hours ago——

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a question of the highest privilege to offer a motion to amend the rules.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah make a point of order?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I object to the introduction of the notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The notice has been given to the Senate, but the effect of the notice will be for consideration at a future time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not offered a motion. I have given notice that I would offer it, and what the Senator is referring to concerns a motion.

Mr. SMOOT. The rules provide that the motion shall be in writing, and shall go to the desk, and it must be in order before it can be presented. Already we are working on the legislative day of February 5; it is after 2 o'clock and the unfinished business is before the Senate. There can be nothing offered, no bill or conference report or otherwise, unless by unanimous consent, and I object to the offering of this notice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not offered as a motion.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is noted.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the objection sustained, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is nothing to which the objection is directed. The Senator from Mississippi has read the notice for the information of the Senate and that is everything which has thus far transpired.

Mr. SMOOT. And that is all.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, my great respect for the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] leads me to seriously question my own sense of proportion and to ask myself whether I have ascribed to the proceedings in which we have been engaged for many weeks past an altogether fictitious importance. The Senator from Mississippi considers that the minority party in the Senate has been engaged in a trifling and ridiculous attempt to prevent a vote. I consider, sir, that the minority party in the Senate has been engaged in maintaining the fundamental principles of representative government.

A Senator said to me a few days ago, "You can not afford to be engaged in a filibuster." Mr. President, I can not afford to flinch from the duty which upon my oath and my conscience seems to lie before me. We have a bill presented to the Senate involving a most serious epoch-making change in the policy and principles of our Government. To my view that bill can not be supported by the Senator from Mississippi without his denying the convictions of his lifetime.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. ROOT. I will yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator indicate the difference between the Federal Government's connection with this proposed shipping line and its connection with the Panama Line down to the Isthmus?

Mr. ROOT. The connection with the Panama line was an incident to a greater and entirely different enterprise. This is a proposal pure and simple of Government ownership.

Mr. President, I can not better state what I deem to be involved in this bill than in the words of a brief statement contained in a recent number of the Outlook. I suppose it is contained in the published journal. I read from a proof sheet sent to me by the editor of the journal. I read it as stating the fundamental question about which all this controversy has raged and upon which rests the justification or condemnation of what has been done by Senators on both sides of the aisle. This is what the Outlook says:

THE SHIPPING BILL.

There are three ways in which the Government may deal with the industries of a people:

It may leave the industries severely alone and simply protect persons and property. This was the old Democratic policy. It may by legislation promote industries in private hands. This is the Whig and the Republican policy. It may take the industries out of private hands and carry them on itself. This is the policy of state socialism.

The first policy left the United States a purely agricultural country. The second policy made it one of the greatest manufacturing and mining countries of the world. The third policy is still an untried experiment.

The present administration proposes by the shipping bill to take a flying leap from the old democracy to state socialism, from a commerce unprotected and unpromoted to a commerce owned and operated by the Government. The issue before the country is very simple: Shall we promote commerce as we have promoted manufactures, or shall we take commerce out of private hands and make it a Government industry?

It is said that wise men learn by the experience of others, fools learn only by their own. What shall we say of those who refuse to learn even by their own experience?

Mr. President, unless we willfully close our eyes we can not disguise the fact that our Government has, step by step, during recent years been making long strides in the direction of accomplishing two things—one, the complete substitution of the power and agency of the United States Government for the State governments, and the other the substitution of state socialism for that system of individual enterprise which built up our land and made America the freest and the greatest country on earth.

Step by step, I say, we have been moving along toward those two ends. In many respects the movement has been necessary. It has been inevitable, but the facts can not be ignored.

The building up of the great transportation system of the country, crossing State lines without noting the change of jurisdiction, the interdependence of all parts of the country, the fact that the producer looks for his market to cities and communities thousands of miles away, that the consumer looks for the necessities and the comforts of life to farms and mills thousands of miles away, bringing all America into one great social and industrial organization, have made it inevitable that we should take the great stride toward the destruction of the power of our State governments involved in the regulation of railroads. We could not help it. So we have an Interstate Commerce Commission, appointed by the President of the United States, bringing to heel day by day all the railroads in every State, and the State public service commissions dwindle day by day, and upon that vital life-blood circulation of each State the Government of the United States lays its hand and the State is powerless.

The necessities of our financial system have been leading us in the same direction. The tendency of money toward the great centers of trade and the great gateway of the Nation to the trade and finance of Europe reached a point where the people of the country saw, or thought they saw, economic dependence staring them in the face. Unwilling to submit to it, unwilling longer to see the free play of supply and demand, require them to go to New York and Boston and Philadelphia and Chicago and submit to the judgment of bankers in those cities as to whether they should have the means to develop their own localities, the people had recourse to the Federal Government, and so we have passed a law under which we have a Federal Reserve Board sitting in the city of Washington, appointed by the President of the United States, and all the banks of the country are coming to heel, State as well as National, under the domination of that central board, and States are but as naught. Their sovereignty has gone, their power is diminishing and disappearing in the great field of the finances of the country.

I remember well, sir, when Mr. Cleveland reviewed the subject of the enforcement of the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890—I think it was in Mr. Cleveland's second administration; it must have been—speaking old Democratic doctrine, loyal soul that he was, honest soul that he had; he said that the question of combinations in restraint of trade were matters of State cognizance, and must be dealt with by the governments of the States. That was accepted, but lo! the necessities of the country—observe that I am not quarreling with these processes; I say the real necessities of the country—have driven the people all from the State to the Federal Government. At last no one thinks more of the powers of the States or the duties of the States, but it must be the Federal Government that deals with combinations of capital.

So we have created a Trade Commission, the members of which are to be appointed by the President of the United States, with power to make or break, with power to ruin every considerable industry or establishment in the United States; and all the industries will be submissive under the jurisdiction of the Trade Commission, because they will not dare to do otherwise, and the power of the State disappears.

We have changed, sir, the rule of taxation, and the States have voluntarily surrendered that limitation upon the power of direct taxation which prevented an income tax, except according to the rule of apportionment. So the Government of the United States can regulate, distribute, and grade these taxes in such way as to impose the burden wherever they choose. They can draw from your State and mine at will, reducing as they please the reservoir of taxable resources of the State.

Instead of the citizen of a far distant western or southern State going to Pennsylvania or Massachusetts or Illinois or New York to secure the money to build a railroad near his home or to borrow money for his town or his county or his State to build good roads, we have within these last few years vested the National Government with the power to take the money from Massachusetts or New York or Pennsylvania or other States—to take it by the strong arm of the tax gatherer, and to build the roads in Mississippi or in Kansas or in Nebraska. The State is becoming as naught.

Last year there were 461,000 Federal employees on the pay roll. Year by year that army is recruited; year by year they organize to exercise greater and still greater control, all animated by a common purpose, which is the preservation of the power in Washington to hold them in their place—the power of regulation.

I was about to forget the extension of the great power of the Government, which began with the establishment of post offices and post roads and which extended, and rightfully, to the carrying of letters, rightfully to the carrying of parcels. It has been still enlarged to the maintenance of postal savings banks, a measure I was in favor of. I approve of it, but it all tends in this same direction. Under a loose general expression in the law regarding the parcel post we have had the carriage of letters not only developed into the carriage of parcels but into the carriage of freight. The Government of the United States, through its Postal Department, is performing duties in competition with express companies, and performing duties in competition with railroad transportation companies, so that from the mines the output of ores is being carried by the Post Office Department. The express companies are being driven out of existence. I am not finding fault; I am not speaking for the express companies. They had great profits for many years, and perhaps are not specially entitled to sympathy; but these corporations chartered by the States are being driven out, and the Government of the United States is carrying the letters, carrying the express parcels, carrying the freight of the people of the country, growing more and more as the States grow less and less. Through the postal power, through the power to regulate, through the taxing power, through the power of banking and finance, through the power to prevent trusts and combinations, the Government of the United States is overwhelming and stifling the governments of the States.

Sir, we enacted here a short time ago a law by which we authorized the Government to build and own railroads in Alaska. It was stated that that was an exceptional case. Alaska was a Territory and there were exceptional conditions there; and so we put $35,000,000 in the hands of the Executive to build a railroad in Alaska, which the Government is to own. A short time ago we had pressed upon us a bill that is now on our calendar—and I dare say it is as likely to pass as any other—under which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] insisted with great fervor that the Government of the United States must buy and own and operate all the deposits of radium in the country. Now, sir, we have a still longer step. The Government of the United States is to take possession of and transact the foreign commerce of the United States.

Mr. President, we have to have some opportunism in dealing with the practical affairs of life, but we can not absolve ourselves of the duty to consider the tendencies of national development which we are promoting. Leg over leg the dog went to Dover; step by step, law by law, precedent by precedent, weakness by weakness, abuse by abuse, ignoring principle to-day, to-morrow, and again to-morrow—each step seems little by itself, but when you survey the sequence of events you find that you have been going up or down, growing more free or more closely bound. It is our duty not to deal with a separate, isolated case by itself, but with as far a view into the future as our best intelligence permits, with as earnest a desire to read the consequences of our acts upon the future of our country as the sincerity of our natures permits, it is our duty to inquire which way our steps are tending in the legislation that is set for us.

Now, sir, with a statute of such vast consequence, it is plain that not only should we say what occurs to our minds, but the people of the country should have an opportunity to say what occurs to theirs. Oh, I have heard many times my respected and admired friend, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], declare his principles of national conduct upon this floor. I have heard him say that it is best for our people that their goods should be carried by those who will carry them the cheapest; I have heard him say that it is best for our people that if foreign ships will carry their goods cheaper than American ships, the foreign ships should carry them. Sir, I do not dispute his right to change his opinion; I do not dispute his right to accept, if he can convince himself to accept, this measure, although at the cost of the abandonment of the general principles which he has so long maintained; but, sir, the American people have the right to form their opinion before such a reversal of policy is determined upon by their Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator think that I am still pursuing that course by trying to get the cheaper method of carrying the freight of the American people?

Mr. ROOT. No, Mr. President; I think the Senator from Mississippi has completely abandoned his old course.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator a moment ago stated that the Panama steamship line was a mere incident to a great work. Does not the Senator think that buying these steamships and putting them into service in this great emergency is a mere incident to relieving the American people from a great emergent burden of exploitive freight rates?

Mr. ROOT. No, Mr. President; it is not an incident to anything; it is the thing itself. Whatever may be the purpose, it stands by itself. The Government of the United States is to build and operate ships; it is to carry freight; it is to engage in the business of ocean freight transportation, and that is a complete reversal of the principles the Senator from Mississippi has advocated, and it is a complete reversal of the principles which the people of the United States understood the Democratic Party to maintain when that party was put into power. There is no escape from that. You have no right to change the policy of our Government in this vital matter in the dark of the night. You should come out into the open, where all the people of the country who are vitally affected by the question whether our Government is to be a Government of national socialism or not can express their opinions and have their opinions operate upon our minds in our discussions and our actions.

Oh, Mr. President, I have good authority for what I am now saying. I have long known and admired the present President of the United States. I appeal to him, I appeal to his words bearing direct relation to this very subject, to support what I have just said. I will take the liberty of asking the attention of the Senate to some paragraphs from the President's address at the meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States in this city on Wednesday of last week. I commend them to my brother Senators. I believe he meant what he said. I follow him, and I want you to follow me. He said:

That is, the chambers of commerce of the United States—

> Now, seriously, the task of this body is to match all the facts of business throughout the country and see the vast and consistent pattern of them. I think you are to be congratulated upon the fact that you can not do this thing without common counsel.
> There is not any man who knows enough to comprehend the United States. It is a cooperative effort necessarily. You can not perform the functions of this chamber of commerce without drawing in not only a vast number of men, but men—a number of men—from every region and section of the country. The minute this association falls into the hands, if ever it should, of men from a single section or men with a single set of interests most at heart, it will go to seed and die. Its strength must come from the uttermost parts of the land and must be compounded of brains and comprehensions of every sort. It is a very noble and handsome picture for the imagination.

Then I omit what he says on that subject. He says, further:

> But there are other ways of using the Government of the United States—ways that have long been tried, though not always with conspicuous success or fortunate results. You can use the Government of the United States by influencing its legislation. That has been a very active industry, but it has not always been managed in the interest of the whole people. It is very instructive and useful for the Government of the United States to have such means as you are ready to supply for getting a sort of consensus of opinion which proceeds from no particular quarter and originates with no particular interest, because information is the very foundation of all right action in legislation.
> I remember once, a good many years ago, I was attending one of the local chambers of commerce of the United States at a time when everybody was complaining that Congress was interfering with business. If you have heard that complaint recently and supposed that it was original with the men who made it, you have not lived as long as I have. It has been going on ever since I can remember. And the complaint came most vigorously, of course, from men who were interested in large corporate developments.
> I took the liberty to say to that body of men whom I did not know that I took it for granted that there were a great many lawyers among them and that it was likely that the more prominent of those lawyers were intimate advisers of the corporations of that region, and I said that I had met a great many lawyers from whom the complaint had come most vigorously not only that there was too much legislation with regard to corporations, but that it was ignorant legislation. I said, "Now, the responsibility is with you. If the legislation is mistaken, you are on the inside and know where the mistakes are being made; you know not only the innocent and right things that your corporations are doing, but you know the other things, too. Knowing how they are done, you can be expert advisers as to how the wrong things can be prevented. If therefore this thing is handled ignorantly there is nobody to blame but yourselves. If we on the outside can not understand the thing and can not get advice from the inside, then we will have to do it with the flat hand and not with the touch of skill and discrimination."

Is not that true? Men on the inside of business know how business is conducted, and they can not complain if men on the outside make mistakes about business if they do not come from the inside and give the kind of advice which is necessary.

Mr. President, upon the day following that address, the members of the Chambers of Commerce of the United States who had listened to the address undertook to give their advice about this bill; and they voted, 163 to 90, to condemn the bill. The 90 who were in the minority were almost unanimous, and they did vote for a minority report which condemned the bill as it now stands before this body. The minority 90 declared themselves opposed to Government ownership, but declared they believed there was an exigency which justified special treatment. The 163 were not only opposed to Government ownership, but they were opposed to the bill as it stood then and as it stands now.

The bill as it is now put before us has abandoned the position of the 90 minority without going to the position of the 163 majority, and it must have the unanimous condemnation of that tribunal to whose advice the President appealed.

The Chamber of Commerce of New York appointed a special committee to study this subject—a committee composed of experts in marine transportation. That committee, after mature consideration, prepared a report which was submitted and discussed at a meeting of the chamber of commerce. An adjourned meeting was held at which a supplemental report was presented; and that body of business men in the great exporting and importing city of the country adopted resolutions, by a vote of 290 to 4, condemning this bill.

Now, sir, I am aware that there will be a prejudice against this body of Americans because they met and lived in the city of New York; but, sir, they are Americans, and that is the great gateway of our commerce; and these men were men of special familiarity with the business of export and import of goods. Among their number appears the name of Mr. Paul Warburg, who is at the head of the Federal Reserve Board. Sir, that chamber of commerce was founded before the Revolution. For more than 140 years it has been composed of the most able, upright, respected, and intelligent American citizens, engaged in doing for our country the work of import and export of goods. The Chamber of Commerce of Boston has condemned the bill. The Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans has condemned the bill. There are many others. It is fair and moderate to say that so far as we now have expressions of opinion from the people of the United States they are overwhelmingly against the bill. Of course they are opinions from the men who are concerned in the exporting and importing business, directly or indirectly. They would be the first. But, sir, their opinions can not be ignored. They should not be slighted and held of no account unless the great body of the people of the United States have had their opportunity to consider whether these opinions of the men who first consider and act should be rejected.

The time has been scant. It is not until a measure is introduced and the discussion of it begins here that the people of the country really begin to turn their attention to the subject, and they are still in the very first stages of their consideration. That being so, the people of the country not having had opportunity and time to form and express their opinions, excepting the commercial men, who are naturally on the lookout and are very active minded about what is going on affecting their business, and their verdict being against the bill—that being so, what ought we to do? Well, what are we to do?

We are confronted by a most extraordinary situation. Have we discussed the merits of this bill as the Constitution of our Government requires that we should? I deny it. There has been much question, of late years, of the efficacy and much doubt as to the continuance of representative government; but so long as it continues, sir, there is no doubt about its necessary processes. Representative government does not consist merely in voting. It consists in the life and activity of representative assemblies who do, under special responsibility, what the people can not do for themselves. That is, they subject all proposed measures of legislation to the test of open discussion, perfection by amendment, correction of extreme views, correction of error upon one side or the other by the peaceful process of argument, which under free and real representative government takes the place of revolution and bloodshed.

That is the process for which we exist, not merely to vote. If we are merely to vote, there is no reason for our existence; the people can vote directly. We are here in order that we may give full play and efficacy to that great process of representative government, that greatest of discoveries of modern liberty, the great gift of Anglo-Saxon liberty to the world, the one thing which more than any other marks the difference between the modern free Republic and those old Republics of Greece and Rome and Italy which went down into chaos and tyranny. Representative government more than any other thing affords the hope that we can cherish that we shall never meet the fate of the ancient republics.

Now, sir, I say that the essential of representative government is not to vote; it is to discuss, to argue, to convince with open mind and frank and bold utterance, to spread out in the full light of day before all the people who have given us permission to represent them the reasons for and against.

Mr. President, no man has a right holding the commission of a State in this Senate to foreclose himself from contributing his real convictions to the discussion. No man has a right, having taken an oath to perform his duty, to foreclose himself from voting his convictions, and no man has a right to foreclose himself from being convinced and from acting upon his changed convictions upon any subject which is before this body. When you transpose the processes of this or any other deliberative body, into mere voting according to a preexisting agreement you have destroyed the great function for which we are here.

It is all very well to agree, it is all very well for a party to get together; but no party is greater than our country. No resolution was ever written greater than our Constitution. No obligation that can be imposed by a resolution is greater and more binding than the obligation that we all rest under to perform duty of representatives in a deliberative body with open mind and honest utterance, to carry on the discussion in the eyes and in the knowledge of all the people, for whom we are acting.

I use the expression "deliberative." Ah, Mr. President, that word points to the very vital quality of a legislative body. It is deliberative. If it is not deliberative, then it fails. No man has a right to come into it if he is not ready to take part in the deliberation.

Now, sir, what do we find? There was a bill introduced in December, read twice and referred to the Committee on Commerce. On the 16th of December, if I am correct, that bill was reported from the committee, there having been no hearings and but little discussion apparently in the committee. On the 6th of January a substitute bill was introduced containing some important changes. On the 23d of January, discussion upon that substitute bill of the 6th having hardly begun upon the part of the opponents of the bill, a caucus was held. Much has been told us by gentlemen who were present in that caucus. A minority of the Senate appear to have adopted a resolution which undertook to bind the majority of the Senate to support another substitute which was introduced by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] on the 26th of January. The resolution appears to have undertaken to bind the members of the Democratic Party in the Senate to the support of that substitute bill exactly as it was introduced. The yeas and nays were demanded upon the introduction of the substitute. They were ordered, and there was then a ruling that because they had been ordered this new substitute bill was not open to amendment. From that time to this, or from that time until yesterday, discussion has proceeded with the majority, with certain exceptions, bound by a caucus resolution not to keep open mind, not to consider any argument, not to make any argument unless it was in support of the caucus resolution. The discussions of the caucus were in secret. No one outside of the band collected there knows what considerations were presented to that body. No one knows why amendments offered there were voted up or voted down. We do not know here; the people of the country do not know; no one knows what reasons were suggested. We have had none stated here, with one exception.

The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has stated that the reason for refusing to permit ships owned by the United States to engage in coastwise commerce was not that members of the caucus did not think they ought to be permitted to engage in coastwise commerce but because some of them thought that it would stir up opposition to the bill. That, so far as I know, is the only indication of the kind of argument that prevailed in that secret assemblage.

We do know that members of the executive department were exceedingly anxious and active and potent in bringing about the conclusions which the caucus reached. We do know that those conclusions were a reversal of the original opinions of the majority of the members of the caucus, which were to go on and do the business of the country by disposing of the great supply bills. But nobody knows how, how far, or by what means, or through what arguments the anxiety and the potency of these gentlemen in the executive departments were brought to bear upon the secret deliberations of that caucus.

Now, sir, I am not speaking without evidence about this, for we have had many statements made on the floor to sustain my present observations. A minority of the Democrats and a majority of the Republicans in this body have been engaged for the past month in a protest as vigorous, as determined, as conscientious as any mortals could make it against having the discharge of the functions of this deliberative body overwhelmed and prevented by the imposition of the will of that secret body with all the unknown arguments and unknown influences that acted upon it. We have been trying to do two things—one, to secure for the people of the United States a right to the exercise of that share in their Government which the President of the United States in the extract I have read has declared they ought to exercise, to prevent this great change in the policy and principles of our Government from being wrought in the dark without our people having an opportunity to be heard about them; and the other to preserve the rights of representative assembly in the performance of its duty. And, sir, if there be any virtue in the right of free parliamentary government, the attempt of a minority against physical fatigue and suffering, against abuse and villification, to assert their rights—aye, more than their rights, the rights of their constituents; more than that, the rights of their country—to have the processes of free representative government wrought out in this vital legislation is justified—I say that this minority has been doing God's and their country's service in the assertion of the great fundamental rights of free government; and if there be any virtue in the rules and principles of parliamentary government, a minority that has been fighting for them is entitled to credit and honor rather than abuse and villification.

Let me say further, sir, there never has been in this Senate a majority yet for this bill in any form that it has taken. You talk about a filibuster; you talk about preventing a vote; why, look what we have done. There have been in this legislation two quite distinct views. One the exigency view. That was the President's purpose, as stated by him in his message. His proposition in the message of December 8 as to the ship-purchase measure was:

> It is not a qusetion of the Government monopolizing the field. It should take action to make it certain that transportation at reasonable rates will be promptly provided, even when the carriage is not at first profitable; and then, when the carriage has become sufficiently profitable to attract and engage private capital, and engage it in abundance, the Government ought to withdraw.

That is the basis upon which the President recommended the legislation.

There was a little discussion between the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] on the 29th day of January that is very illuminating regarding the essential character of the bill as it then stood—the substitute bill, introduced by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] on the 26th of January. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] suggests the third edition of the bill. Let me read a part of that colloquy. It is very instructive:

> Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to do that. I would not object to any reasonable provision which might be put in the bill for the purposes which the Senator has outlined; but this language goes a great deal further. Even if we declared in the law that it was the intention to permit such leasing only for temporary purposes and that the intention of the law was that this governmental corporation, when it got into business, should remain in it permanently, it would relieve the objection.

That is to say, the Senator from Nebraska was directly at variance with the President's proposal in his message:

> Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——
> Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.
> Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The permanency which the Senator from Nebraska asks for is permanency of operation of these vessels by the Government, and not simply permanency of ownership?
> Mr. NORRIS. No; I would not agree to that statement, because that means that they could be leased out for 99 years.
> Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the Senator from Nebraska misunderstands me.
> Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps I do.
> Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The permanency which the Senator from Nebraska desires is permanency of actual operation of the vessels by the corporation?
> Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.
> Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is not satisfied simply with the permanency of ownership if the vessels are to be leased out?
> Mr. NORRIS. No; I am not satisfied to give this corporation the power to lease out these vessels to various other corporations indefinitely.
> Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator, then, differs radically from those of us who would vastly prefer an assurance that they would not be operated at all.
> Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator is in favor of the Government constructing these vessels and then not operating them, if that is what he means, then I do disagree, of course.
> Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is what I mean exactly. I would vastly prefer an assurance that the Government would never operate them at all.

And, further on, following the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], I find this:

> Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, then, would at least favor an amendment such as I have suggested to the Senator from Florida, which would, of course, be entirely satisfactory to me. The Senator must understand that I have no objection to a temporary lease if it shall become necessary. I do not know that it ever will be necessary; but if such a contingency should arise, if this governmental corporation were operating a line of ships and they had no particular use for some vessel and some other corporation wanted to lease it to make a trip, as the Senator from Florida suggests, I certainly would have no objection to giving them the authority to do that; but under the bill as it stands this corporation could lease out every one of these ships for 99 years.
> Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, not only is that true, but is it not also true that the spirit of this bill contemplates that they shall be leased if practicable?
> Mr. NORRIS. I think so. I think the Senator is perfectly fair, and that is the reason I read, to begin with, the message of the President——
> Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the reason I can vote for the bill.

Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia in the remarks I first read represents not only himself, he is representing not only his position, but the position of a number of Senators on the other side of the aisle, a number of the Senators who regard themselves as bound by the caucus resolution. The bill as it then stood—the third edition, the second Fletcher substitute as it stood on the 26th of January—accorded with the President's message. Its fundamental principle was that ships should be bought or built for use by the Government of the United States only during the exigency, and that then the Government should part with them or lease them to others. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was contending for a modification which would prevent that. That is clear. That is what the bill was then.

Mr. President, that bill, the bill which provided for the acquisition of ships by the Government to be nominally operated by the Government, but with authority to have them operated by others, with all the force of the caucus rule behind it, was defeated in the Senate, defeated as the result of what you would call a filibuster. All those long days and nights we were winning the fight against that bill, which by the votes of a majority of the Senate was condemned. When the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] moved to recommit the bill and the Senate voted not to lay his motion on the table, that bill was dead, and dead forever, because by hard labor, by shortening our lives, we had won a majority of the Senate against that bill. There never was a Democratic majority for it, and there never will be. There was never a majority of the Senate for it, and there never will be.

What followed then? The caucus met again, and they are said to have secured the probability of certain votes upon this side of the aisle. I do not know whether it is true or not, but that is stated. By what means? By changing the bill; by rejecting from it that fundamental feature as to which the Senator from Georgia said that that alone made it possible for him and his associates to vote for the bill; by changing it so as to make it satisfactory to the Senator from Nebraska; to adopt his view and reject the view of the Senator from Georgia, as set forth in the colloquy of January 29, which I have just read. The motion to instruct the committee that is now before us is in execution of that purpose to abandon the old theory and adopt the new; and if there ever was a majority for this new plan, which is a plan under which the Government will be compelled to go on operating these ships unless prevented by some further legislation of Congress—if they are to adopt this new and different bill, it will not be by a Democratic majority, it will not be because the minds and judgment of the majority of the Senate have been convinced; it will be because, for the sake of winning, for the narrow and fleeting satisfaction of winning at all costs, the advocates of the bill are willing to abandon their deliberate and expressed judgment in order to get some votes from men who disagree from them absolutely and totally.

Sir, we are against having legislation upon this vital point thrust upon us without the country having an opportunity to make up its mind and to be heard upon that new bill. We will protest; we will protest in the exercise of our rights and the performance of our duty as representatives of the people of our States—and we ought to protest. We will protest in word; we will protest in act; we will not permit it, so long as we can prevent in accordance with due and orderly parliamentary procedure. I should despise myself if I took any other position. The real will of this legislative body and the real rights of the people of the United States shall not be overrun by a secret caucus, supplemented by a bargain, against the conviction of a majority of this body, without such loud protests on this side of the Chamber that they will be heard and that the people of the country will be set to thinking as to whether our constitutional Government is to be shoved aside and in its place is to be substituted an extraconstitutional government by secret discussion and minority rule.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator from New York whether any of the substitutes presented express the view of the minority as to the legislation which is to be had upon this subject?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator from Nevada by saying that during his long and regretted absence the minority were subjected to a severity of treatment, against which I know his just and kindly nature would have revolted, and amendments proposed by the minority to this bill were laid upon the table seriatim, without opportunity for discussion or even of explanation of their purpose.

Mr. President, I have nearly finished what I had in mind to say.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me another question?

Mr. ROOT. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I observe that a substitute for this bill has been prepared by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and another by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and I will ask whether either of those bills represents the views of the minority as to legislation upon this subject?

Mr. ROOT. Oh, Mr. President, I could not identify them, and I will not stop to do so. I do not know whether they represent them or not, and I can not be drawn into a discussion as to whether they represent the views of the minority or not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, If the Senator will permit me just a word, I will say that it seems to me to be the patriotic duty of Congress——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I can not yield for the Senator from Nevada to make a speech. I must decline to yield further.

I want to say one word before I sit down about the gravity of the fundamental proposition of this bill as it stands now, which is permanent Government ownership. I have said something about the effect of the steps which the Government of the United States has been taking upon the governments and powers of the States, but there is a broader field upon which this bill trenches. Granting that we are willing to see all the self-government of the States disappear and a system established under which the Central Government in Washington will be all powerful—I say granting that—there is a still more important question to which I alluded at the beginning, and that is the question whether the people of the United States are ready to enter upon a policy of State socialism.

It has become very common to run to the Government of the United States whenever there has been any trouble. I observed it some years ago in regard to the quelling of disorder. I remember when a riot occurred in one of our States which the sheriff ought to have quelled with a posse of his county, instead of doing his duty, he ran to the State capital and called upon the governor to send him the State militia, and the governor, instead of doing his duty, came running to the National Capital to get the President to send the Federal troops there. I have seen it done over and over again. The tendency is to lose that virile capacity for self-help that made us the Nation we are and to lie down on the Government. So with the radium bill. There was no real exigency about radium, but it was said that radium was a great curative agency, and so they ran to the Government to take possession of all the radium. It was so with the cotton-purchase bill. There was no exigency that is not being disposed of now in good, old American fashion by people helping themselves, and yet the first reaction was to run to the Government.

There is a glut in eastbound freight now. It is decreasing. It came, in the ordinary course of events, from natural causes, ensuing from the war. It was nothing that the ordinary laws of human nature would not dispose of, and nothing that they are not now disposing of. But they must come running to the Government. The Government must help everybody out of trouble. Is capital needed, the Government must furnish it. Is power needed, the Government must furnish it. Is somebody inconvenienced, the Government must prevent it. So the Government becomes every day more paternal, and so our people become every day less independent and more reliant upon the power of the Government.

Ah, Mr. President, it was not so that our people was born and grew. It was not in reliance upon any Government that our fathers faced the terrors of the sea and the forest, and fought with hunger and cold and poverty and savage foes, and felled the forests, and tilled the soil, and settled the farms, and built the factories and the railroads and the great public works, and illustrated and glorified humanity by their works of charity and benevolence. It was not in reliance upon any Government that the American people grew to full stature, the most self-reliant, adaptable, competent, fate-compelling people the world ever knew.

Ah, sir, underlying all this great structure, of more value than all our possessions, all the possessions of all the millionaires and all the corporations, is the one great quality of a free, self-governing people, independent and self-reliant, character based upon that Anglo-Saxon liberty that has grown for a thousand years, that independence of character that knows no superior, that bows to no power—strong, self-helping independence. That is the richest possession of our country; but we can lose it. We are beginning to lose it. Every step that I have detailed here by which this Central Government is overwhelming the governments of the States, every step by which the Government is reaching out its paternal hand to help those who are too weak or idle or lazy or indifferent to help themselves, is washing away and reducing that great and vital quality of individual character on which the perpetuity of our liberty, our freedom, depends.

The habit of lying down on the Government is progressive. More and more one yields to it. The habit of calling upon the Government for help necessarily involves giving to the Government power—power to interfere with the daily affairs of life; power, in the conduct of ocean transportation, to control the business of all the men who wish to transport. Every appeal for help carries a grant of power. The habit of yielding to power destroys independence. The habit of lying down upon Government and invoking its power spoils independence; and for a trifle it is proposed to take one more step upon that fatal and easy descent to Avernus. Never, Mr. President, until the American people have had their chance to say whether they will tread that road or not!

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I assume at this time to address myself to some of the things just asserted by the learned Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] in his complete and copious oration on the evils about to be put on the Government by the Democracy. I regret that a course of illness has kept me from this body during the last three weeks and that I am readily amenable to the charge that some things might have happened of which I am ignorant from the fact that I have been away. I regret that a consciousness of physical weakness at this time greatly impairs the confidence I have in myself to complete an undertaking to which I would be glad at least to contribute physical strength.

I do not feel that I would have essayed to speak in this particular debate, certainly not at this time, had I not been strongly impressed as I heard the Senator from New York with the fact that he was endeavoring to indent upon the public mind from an eminent source, which he knew would be paid great heed by the press of this country, that a wrongful revolution was being undertaken on this side of the Chamber, aided by the allies on the other side, all in contravention of the spirit of democracy, in violation of the purposes of representative government, and in defiance of the Constitution of the United States. I have yet to see the able Senator from New York rise save to express his viewpoint that anything undertaken from this side of the Chamber or that which militates even in his imagination or his fear against the private benefits so long enjoyed by that coterie of men in this country—for whom he with his gifted colleagues has been the most valiant and outspoken spokesman—but that such has been an offense against decency, a violation against honor, and an infraction of the sovereign Constitution.

For myself, and assuming in no wise to speak for any other man, I say to the Senator from New York that he in one exclamation is right. "The time has struck." I assert that there will be no longer any playing with imaginary distinctions in government in order to defeat the popular will of its decree at the ballot box on the one hand, or the needs of this American country for justice on the other. No amount of sophistry born from the consciousness of superiority, pampered by its flatterers, will impress me to fawn nor to shudder in the presence of these aphorisms of oracular wisdom which seemingly can not come from any source but New York.

What is the fear of the Senator from New York? It is, first, that we have entered upon an embarkation of an undertaking by the National Government in behalf of the people which is in violation, as he would have it, of the fundamental doctrines upon which this Republic was established. When did the able Senator from New York, or those for whom he speaks, become conscious of this invasion, or become stung by the wrongs against which he inveighs? Where was the voice raised against the Federal Government being invited to aid when the Government railroads, so designated—the Union Pacific Railroad, but lately the client of the able Senator from New York, the Central Pacific Railway, the Southern and Northern Pacific Railroads—through their representatives under Republican administrations, could step on the floor of this body, corrode its ancient institutions, corrupt its sacred history, and debauch by notorious bribery its Members, in order to obtain Government power of a grant of Government railroad privilege and an empire of land constituting the area of 16 States all belonging to the people yet given for the benefit of a few, many of whom located at New York and the other States in the East, opposing this "Government invasion"? These profited in millions and millions of money wrung from the people through Government aid, while the people were robbed of millions and millions, their institutions corrupted, their courts defiled, their local lawmaking powers flouted and defied.

Mr. President, when the Government aid could be invoked for the private benefit of the select it was highly moral, fittingly exemplary, wholly constitutional, and nobly American. Where were these conscientious contentions when a favored set of gentlemen devised the system under a Republican administration of a national-bank charter and put the Federal Government behind these select masters and chosen favorites constituting the national bank with a charter and apparent guaranty of the Government in which the Government got no benefit, but these private beneficiaries boundless wealth? Then it was honorable, justifiable, commendable for the Federal Government to be utilized; when it was for the benefit of these select—a few against the many, and robbing the masses of America to enrich millionaires who afterwards converted their power into the great insurance companies of this country, and debauched the Legislature of New York, corrupted the courts of the country, robbed the widows of their dower, the children of their inheritance, and stamped their violation of law and decency upon this Republic to a degree far in excess of that of the era of Crassus or Lucullus in Rome. It was all right then to enable these beneficiaries to fasten their undertaking upon the Nation's credit, and in every wise commendable in its enterprise for them to use the National Union and its name for their personal enrichment.

When did my able friend first conceive these great infamies as the result of an undertaking on the part of the Federal Government? Was it when the able Senator himself, an officer of this Government—Secretary of War—ratified the undertaking of the Federal Government behind the money-loaning institution in the Philippine Islands and put the power of the whole Federal Government behind one banking institution and privileged it to do business in New York, and the Government of the United States, and under guise of loans to the farmer on his land, drew the small pittance from the farmers of the Philippine Islands under the guise of a governmental beneficiary institution—to be appropriated by every exploiter of these ignorant and defenseless people? Was there anything wrong then? I can not see from the records that the able Senator then found that the Constitution was being violated.

When an exigency on our country called for the building of the Panama Railroad by the Federal Government under the Senator's jurisdiction, at a time when he had both voice and power, was there anything then so in violation of the Constitution that my able friend carried his duty to the point of obstructing it? Against that slow state of accretion of the encroachments of national power which seems to menace this Nation the Senator rises in the closing days of his eminent service to admonish his country; but I do not see from the records that the Senator raised his voice against the United States building the Panama Railroad with the finances of the United States.

Then, Mr. President, we contemplate a few steps further. It was wholly constitutional to create the system of the protective tariff in this country and in the name of the Federal Government to lay a heavy hand of tax on the bread of the poor, upon the clothing of the humble, upon the industries of the citizen in order that from that tax a bounty might be secured in the name and by the power of the Federal Government to put in the pockets of the favored few, who had long been the beneficiaries of national favoritism—providing they would return these favors by giving a part of the riches obtained by Government aid to assist the national Republican elections. Did the distinguished Senator from New York at such a time during all the glory of his course find it necessary to raise his voice against the unconstitutionality of this system? I am unable to see that he did, or that he objected to such anywhere on the ground that it was invading the rights of the individual or the States.

Now, to the third observation. Says my able friend, the States are losing their heretofore position. Well, if they are, who brought it about? When every State in this Union, under the education of the fathers to which the Senator refers, sought to execute its own policy in the protection of itself against extortionate railroad rates, it was the class of gentlemen for whom the learned Senator speaks who rushed into the Federal courts and, under the claim of being governmental beneficiaries under the Federal Constitution, sought the Federal courts to enjoin the State and paralyze its agency in order to prevent it from executing its local regulation laws, and, claiming the power under the Federal Government, obtained decrees from the Federal courts which enjoined the local government from exercising control of their own local affairs and fastened upon these people a form of government that gave to these nonresident beneficiaries the right wholly to place these States in thraldom and pillage the people and destroy their local institutions, all under the theory of Federal interstate commerce. Here was the Federal Government's intrusion, here was the invasion of the power which denied the local government the right of protecting their own people.

Can I lay my finger upon any source more potent in these operations than was the legal ability of the learned Senator from New York himself? Mr. President, the time has come when the Federal Government must announce that its real mission now is to secure by whatever appropriate means are just and constitutional that form of relief which the people of this country demand for their necessary service and for the complete justice for their country. It will matter little indeed in the hours of the future that some man may weave from his imagination or evolve from his ingenious sophistry some line of distinction which may be urged as a reason why things can not be done, all in order to defeat the people doing the things needed by them to be done. The time is upon us when the people will ascertain the manner in which the right thing can be done, and through their representatives in any assembly they will order it by that method to be done. The question is not so much Is the thing constitutional by a standard of the past, obsolete in the present? but Is it in harmony with the institutions of the present, unprovided for in the past?

Mr. President, what are the objections being presented? The Senator says, behold the minority gathered itself together, and in some form of conference or caucus has had a secret and dark session somewhere, out of which has been born through some Machiavelian process unknown to him and so murky as to be beyond his clear and penetrating vision, a result designated as the shipping bill. Says the Senator, "no opportunity for discussion," "no opportunity for the knowledge of the contents," "no chance for the other side to know what was undertaking," yet in the very same breath this distinguished gentleman, though renowned for logic, and who, no doubt, delights in the appellation which those like myself are pleased to place upon him as of great legal mind—in the same breath my eminent friend charges the Democracy with taking its whole secret over to the Republicans—Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, and Senator LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin—and to those detailing the whole plan of action, unfolding the complete design, and seeking their cooperation, and obtaining upon the merits of the proposition their cooperation. Then with the admission that the proposition had been so unfolded as to obtain these Senators' aid, the Senator from New York characterizes such result as a trading alliance—unholy and obnoxious for its audacity and publicity.

Mr. President, how different is this form of "caucus action" and "conference" from that in which the Senator was but late a participant, when one Senator of the name of Aldrich, of Rhode Island, after ascertaining what the barons of big and bad business demanded, cracked his whip, and all of the Republican old guard sank to their knees, under that kingly rule, obeying in "party solidarity," what the distinguished ex-President Taft designated as the ideal of organization, the acme of statesmanship. Sir, under those years of systematized control, when under the order of one man certain Republican Senators yielded as the fledglings beneath the curling lash, was the golden age of Republican Party domination. But when all of a party in conference may gather together to consider the merits of a proposed measure, and take it to the whole-souled, large-hearted, patriotic nature of any progressive Republican, then it is an "unholy undertaking."

Yes, Mr. President, the Senator says there can be no reason to justify such caucus or conference as has been ours to aid the passage of the bill. Yes, when these on this side, with the aid of those on the other, according to the merits of the proposition, hold a conference to advocate and pass it, that is a voice "violating the Constitution," "profaning the Senate," degrading representative government, but when the distinguished Senator from New York, with the very able Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], leads his fellows into conference through some subterranean passage underground of the Capitol, and combine together how to defeat the bill—never out in the air, never out in the open, never reasoning, never expressed, never defined, never detailed, never disclosed—ah, that is statesmanship! That is a glorious undertaking; marvelous in conception, brilliant in design, patriotic in its sinuosities, constitutional in all its infamies! [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, where is the logic of the able Senator from New York speaking in behalf of those for whom he stands? The able Senator says that in this method the income tax was passed. Well, I ask my eminent friends on the other side, Are you now in favor of repealing the income tax? I pause that one of you may rise and condemn the methods of conference and subsequent results which created the income tax. I pause to give you an opportunity to say to your countrymen that you are in favor of repealing the income tax that was obtained.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. I am ready to vote for a repeal at any time.

Mr. LEWIS. There never was a doubt in my mind but what the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, in view of what we know he represents, would be found always in favor of repealing anything that laid a tax upon those particular interests of which he is known to be the spokesman.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not in favor——

Mr. LEWIS. The able Senator may rest assured when I said I pause I looked at him and felt that of all the Senate he would be the man to compensate in that way the great services that had come to him from certain sources in the last election.

Mr. PENROSE. There is no reason for the Senator to make that statement.

Mr. LEWIS. The able Senator from Pennsylvania has become the single Senator who said he would vote for a repeal. I now ask him, if he would vote for repealing the income tax, because he is opposed to the Federal Government levying any income tax?

Mr. PENROSE. As long as the revenues of the Government can be adequately provided for by a protective tariff I do not consider that an income tax is necessary for Federal revenues. It is in the nature of a war tax, and those subjects of direct taxation should be left to the great sovereign Commonwealths and the great municipalities that have all the modern improvements and developments to finance and construct. In two years from now we will have an adequate protective tariff, a restoration of prosperity, an end to all this wildcat experiment with the fiscal policy of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, has the Senator concluded?

Mr. PENROSE. I have.

Mr. LEWIS. I trust he will not leave the Chamber. His voice to me and his observations are ever interesting, though not instructive. [Laughter.] I trust he may remain.

Mr. President, then the Senator from Pennsylvania is in favor of the repeal of the income tax, because he would have instead a protective-tariff tax levied which would take the money from the pockets of the people and give it to the barons of Pennsylvania. He is opposed to an income tax, because it levies a tax upon these barons, and makes them contribute to maintain the Government, out of which they have wrung so many millions from the million poor of this country. The reason appeals to me as the kind of reason it is well may go to the country as the only kind that may be offered by any man who desires the repeal of the income tax.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not opposed to an income tax on principle, and any State that feels it ought to levy an income tax is justified in doing it. I take the ground that this is a war measure, as far as the Federal Government is concerned, and that we should first endeavor to raise the expenses of the Federal Government from the time-honored excise taxes and through the customhouses. The soup line and the bread line are sufficient evidence in the city of Chicago to take the foundation completely from under the statement of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator's position is now that he does not favor the repeal of the income tax. He merely differs as to who shall levy it. His point of view is that we need a tariff.

Mr. President, I could not understand that seemingly blunted judgment that thinks it can impose upon the American public at this time such apparent hypocrisy as that a protective tariff would be a remedy for the depressed business conditions. Mr. President, there never was a time in the history of the world when there was such an embargo upon every form of importation as could come into a country as is now created by the conditions of the war. No protective tariff that could be devised in the intellect of man could have so succeeded in eliminating every feature and nature of importations so completely as present conditions. This fact is answer to the Senator, showing that it was not the mere presence or the mere absence of a tariff, however high he would have it, that could have contributed to the conditions now apparent all over the world. In Chicago it is true——

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LEWIS. It is true that so long had the condition of public pillage of the poor and of the industries of this country continued that the people were awakened; their indignation was so great that just as the storm came upon them they called for the Democracy to go in against the power that is being felt just now because of the heavy hand of tariff-favored masters who are able to lay it upon the miserable in order to penalize them for having had the liberty of individuality to oppose a wrong, that individuality which the Senator from New York lifts his voice and his eyes toward heaven as he prays shall continue as the inheritance of the independent citizens of our Nation. Mr. President, unless the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to rejoin me further, I shall resume my reply to the Senator from New York.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York says there has been no time for the discussion of this measure. Some of my eminent friends over on this side, of the Democracy from the South, have expressed—a number of them—considerable differences as to the merits of this measure. From those eminent Senators I differ; but, in the spirit of their sincerity in their position, of course I readily acquiesce. But, Mr. President, they have not found it agreeable to utter as their objection such an absurdity as that the country has not had time or opportunity to express itself on this measure.

The Senator from New York has just inveighed against the theory of the referendum. How else would he have the country express itself except by the very theory which he says violates the Constitution and is an infraction upon the theory of the Republic denying representative government and giving a deathblow to the integral life dividing the three coordinate branches of the Government? Says the Senator, "The people have never expressed themselves on this bill." Says the able Senator, "The people have given no directions upon this measure."

Now I answer the Senator, and I say nor have the people expressed themselves upon the laws of neutrality which he asks be enforced. They have had no time to express themselves as to what or what not should be our course in regard to the war in Europe. They have not taken time during the war to consider the duty of America toward Europe by first having the question submitted to the American public through the ballot box. The officials selected in the last election by the people under the Constitution are ordained to exercise their discretion and their judgment upon any and all emergencies as they arise. It is for such that confidence is placed in the judgment of patriotic men.

Mr. President, neither had America a chance to pass its opinion upon the resolution supported by the Senator from New York in the matter of our occupation of Vera Cruz, which, if passed, might have plunged the country into war, drenched Mexico with blood, overcoming the nation in devastation, and wrecking the future of her people, as well as of our own, as a peace-loving and peace-abiding people; yet the Senator felt the conditions justified his resort to such a measure, which was the exercise of a form of discretion of a Senator in an emergency as he saw it at the hour of arising. When has the country had an opportunity, at such an hour as this, to have submitted to it for consideration every emergency that has arisen in government such as that which concerns us, unhappily, in this Nation at this hour? There is no reason in the argument; there is no logic in it; and the able Senator from New York can find no foundation in it as a justification for the position he has assumed against this measure and against the policy of providing relief to the people from the monopoly of shipping masters and shipowners.

Mr. President, I now wish to make answer to certain objections urged by the Senator and his colleagues to the merits of the bill. I may be charged through the public press, through its representatives, of saying that which possibly I should have been admonished was not a cautious expression, but, speaking for myself, I now desire to reply to one of certain objections which have been urged against this measure.

First, I take the words of the Senator from New York, which we will accept as the hub around which others build the periphery of their arguments. It is that in buying these ships we buy a fight; that in obtaining these ships we obtain a quarrel. My honorable opponents, I ask you by what logic do you arrive at that result? Is that urged with a view of frightening the opposition from undertaking to relieve the just needs of the people, while you who have opposed the measure serve your purpose in serving those who are benefited by cutting off any legitimate competition upon the sea and maintaining their evil monopoly that has so long prevailed, while you cause the farmers' grain to rot in the bins, the cotton to fall in prices in the market, the products of the manufacturers to waste for want of a market, and the army of soup men, to which the Senator from Pennsylvania refers, forced to multiply because of lack of employment, due to the fact that we can not sell our merchandise because we have no method to send them to the markets desiring them? Senators, making the objection of war, where do you get this argument?

Senators, where will be the difference in the risk of war—if such will follow the buying of ships—if instead of our purchasing the ships the $9,000,000 proposed by you to be voted as subsidy shall go into the pockets of favorites, for whom the able Senator and his colleagues speak, then the ships be purchased by these subsidized favorites and be launched upon the waters, carrying such cargo as shall be deemed by belligerents to be contraband? Where will be the difference if such a ship should be wrongfully seized, so far as the duty of your country is concerned? Will she not be as readily involved then in conflict as if the ship were owned by ourselves? Will we hesitate to protect the American citizen owning his property any less than we would protect the Government owning its property if there should be a violation of the rights of an American citizen who owned or operated the ship? Would there be any difference of conduct on the part of our Government than would be pursued toward our Government itself if it were the owner of the ship? On the other hand, if it were a mere private citizen, without regard to whether or not he was the beneficiary of a subsidy, who owned the ship and put it out upon the waters and its rights were violated, would there be any less duty on the part of our Government to go to the rescue of the owner of that ship than there would have been had it been owned by the Government itself and operated under the agency of a private corporation or by a Government subsidized company?

In what way do you distinguish, my honorable opponents, that we invite war in one system more than in another? Shall you give it out to the Nation that you would favor allowing a private owner, for whom you speak, to have his rights violated and have wrongs inflicted upon him and no action to be taken by your Government to defend it? Our position as to him would be, and must ever be, that he was an American citizen. As such he would have our guardianship and protection.

Mr. President, in 1846—if I do not mistake the date of history—when English property was seized in Grecian ports, and one of the owners demanded redress from Greece and a guaranty from the then guarantors of Greece—Russia and France—Palmerston, then premier of England, in support of his demand delivered his famous speech in Parliament upon the theory that it was sufficient, whether the property was under the direction of Government or not, that it was the property of an English citizen; and turning his address under the very famous title of civis Romanus sum, he said it was but converting it from "I am a Roman citizen" to "I am an Englishman."

We in America respond that if any American owns any ship that puts out upon the waters of the world's sea in the discharge of legal duties that it owes to this country in complete obedience to law, and any people anywhere see fit to assail that vessel in violation of international law, it will not matter to us whether it is owned by the Government or by the beneficiaries of a subsidy from the Government, or by private persons; it will be defended and protected upon the theory that its owner is an American citizen! If these ships purchased by us under this bill shall be launched upon the water, clearly within their rights, clearly within the law, and set sail to foreign ports, we will neither be alarmed now by the frightening admonitions of the distinguished Senator who summons up a picture of danger and disaster to dissuade us from coming to the relief of our oppressed people, nor in that other form, coming through threatening cables from foreign countries that would attempt to intimidate us under terror from the duty this Congress owes America as an American Nation and to American citizens as citizens of the United States. If it shall come that these ships of our people, under their rights, are put upon the sea and sent forth to execute their mission in behalf of America, they will execute that mission if they have to be convoyed by an American cruiser or a battleship. There is neither cowardice nor shrinking when the duty is imposed upon America as an American Nation to act in behalf of an American citizen. Let there be no distinction attempted in this body to go out to the world that America draws any line of demarcation between the duty she owes her humblest citizen with his humble craft, obeying the law of the land, and the most powerful fleet under the control and orders of the Government of the United States.

Then, my fellow Senators, where are the fears which you express as against this bill founded on any different basis from those which would obtain against any other form of American ownership of vessels owned by an American, put upon the seas by an American, and sent out under an American flag obeying the laws of America? Sirs, we want no quarrel with any people anywhere—we will do much to the loss of our own commercial advantage to avoid complication or conflict. But, sir, if in the discharge of our obligations to serve the American people we are forced to conflict to maintain our rights, as Americans we will not shirk the obligation; and to all the world we announce peace, if possible; but American rights to American citizens by whatever course necessary! Then with this knowledge, let those who contemplate an attempt to intimidate us beware!

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina for a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator just at this point in his argument in regard to the bill we have recently passed providing for the admission of ships to American registry, and which had support to some extent on the other side, and against which the argument to which the Senator from Illinois is now replying was not made. Since the passage of that act there has happened what we all knew would happen and what was said upon this floor would happen—and the votes that were cast upon the other side and upon this side were with full knowledge that it would happen; and it was passed after the declaration of war, after the war conditions were similar to those now obtaining—since we passed that act there has been transferred to the American flag ships that had theretofore floated the Belgian flag, ships that had theretofore floated the English flag. The purchase of those ships stands upon no different basis than the purchase by the proposed corporation of a ship that may now be floating the English flag or the Belgian flag, with a view of transferring the vessel to the American flag.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I accept the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina, and now I yield to the Senator from New York for an interrogatory.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina has just said that there is no difference in principle between the ships that were covered by the emergency registry act of August of last year and the ships to be purchased under the pending bill if it becomes a law. There is a vast difference, which will be appreciated by the Senator when I call his attention to it. Under the registry act of August of last year we simply permitted the then American owners of ships to transfer the ships to the American flag. This bill contemplates at this time, while hostilities are pending, the purchase of ships belonging to belligerents. It presents an entirely different situation, in my judgment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois will pardon me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield again to such interrogatory as the Senator from North Carolina may desire to submit.

Mr. SIMMONS. We made no such distinction as the Senator has mentioned. We provided that any American citizen might purchase a ship constructed either in this country or abroad, and that that ship should be admitted to American registry. We did not say it had to be owned by an American citizen before the act was passed, but we provided that if he subsequently acquired the ownership of a vessel, whether it belonged to a citizen of this country at the time of the purchase or belonged to a citizen of any other country at the time of the purchase, whether it floated the flag of Belgium or of Germany or of any other nation or country in the world, if he acquired the title to it, then he was entitled to registration under the law which we passed.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, that is substantially true——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield further to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to such further interrogatory as the Senator from New York desires to make.

Mr. O'GORMAN. What the Senator from North Carolina has stated is substantially true as far as it goes; but it was distinctly asserted upon the floor of the Senate, and contradicted, I think, by no one, that the American owner of a ship flying a foreign flag could, without question, transfer the ship to an American flag, because he owned the ship before hostilities began; and the opinion was repeatedly expressed that the American citizen who purchased a vessel under the registry act would take it with the chances of seizure upon the high seas.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the able Senator from New York, I must say, is slightly in error——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. Pardon me. Does the Senator from North Carolina desire to interrupt further?

Mr. SIMMONS. I may want to say something further.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator wish to respond now?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not at all.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say, if I may be permitted, although knowing that the Senator from New York did not address the interpellation to me, that the junior Senator from New York is slightly in error in his quotation as to the meaning of the law and its language. As I understand, there is but one question, and that question is this: If a ship in an American port is sold to this Nation or to any citizen of the Nation, and the sale is made in good faith, there ends the whole question. The able Senator from New York, both Senators from New York, as well as others, will recall—and I can not but pause at this time to pay my tribute of praise to the address, a portion of which I read, delivered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] touching the question of neutrality and violations of it—but, Mr. President, I invite the attention of the able Senator from New York right now, and of those interested, to this fact, that as early as the time of Cushing as Attorney General our Government, in six opinions of the Attorneys General, has supported the view I urge. This is supported by the United States Supreme Court in the case of the Georgia—Seventh Wallace——

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. In a moment I will yield to the Senator with pleasure—laid down the proposition that the question was one of bona fides; that if a man bought a ship at such time for the purpose of a ruse, merely to aid one of the belligerents, of course it would be interdicted; but if it was a real sale, if it was a legitimate one, the aspect of the matter would be entirely different.

The London conference only touched that subject, in addition, by simply adding that the burden of proof was upon the one who asserted in time of conflict bona fides; but the distinguished Senator now on his feet [Mr. COLT], known as a renowned jurist, and the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], also very eminent both as a jurist and as a lawyer of later practice, will recall that that rule is born of the doctrine merely of good faith in any form of transfer, such as that if a man about to fail in business shall sell some property of his or his business the burden of proof is upon him to show that he did not know he was in such failing circumstances in order that he would not be charged with conspiring to defraud his creditors in the distribution of the assets. That is the theory, as I understand it. I now yield for a moment to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I merely wanted to ask the Senator from Illinois a question.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield for an interrogatory.

Mr. COLT. The bill provides that the Government shall purchase ships. I should like to ask the Senator, from an international standpoint, whether there is not a distinct difference between the purchase by the Government of a ship from a belligerent and the purchase by a citizen of a ship from a belligerent? May I not say, in reference to that, that the Government is bound by neutrality; that the citizen has no neutral duty; that it is not a question of the bona fide transfer about which so much has been said, but it rises above that, when you come to the Government, to the general principle whether it is aiding one side or the other or is an act of neutrality on the part of the Government or a Government-controlled corporation to purchase a ship of a belligerent. I merely wanted to ask the Senator if he did not recognize that there was a difference between a citizen, a subject, purchasing a ship and the Government of the United States purchasing a ship?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, in the first place the able Senator discloses either that he has not read the bill, or, having read it, that he has forgotten the distinctions the bill discloses. The bill does not provide that the Government shall purchase any ships. It provides for the organization of a private corporation which would be exactly like one to whom a subsidy of money had been given, as advocated by many eminent gentlemen on the other side, and this private company becomes the purchaser, not the Government. If we assume from the Senator's remark that the Government must stand behind it upon the theory of being in loco parentis, which I assume is in the mind of the Senator, my answer is this:

The Government is under the obligation of neutrality, but the Government is not under obligation of neutrality as a mere shallow, intangible, invisible thing called government. It is a trustee for the thing he says owes no neutrality—the citizen. It is the citizen who is neutral. The Government is the mere voice of the combined citizen; and, after all, it is but the same thing. It is the neutrality of conduct and voice by those who can and do conduct and express voice, to wit, the citizens of the neutral country.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to an interrogatory.

Mr. COLT. Has the Government, through this corporation which it is proposed to organize, any control over the operation of these ships through the shipping board?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator that I hope it has. For myself, I would not support a measure which provided otherwise.

Mr. COLT. If the Government has control, either directly or indirectly, is it not bound by the rules of neutrality, and can it in any manner aid one side or the other of the belligerents and maintain neutrality?

Mr. LEWIS. My answer is, Mr. President, that if the Government is interested and expects even to supervise, among other things it would supervise would be obedience to the laws, whether those laws were the navigation laws applicable to the port of New York, as the vessels steamed out or steamed in, or the international laws applicable to the ports of the world. I say to the able Senator that his argument applies to any citizen. The duty of our Government to observe the operations of any railroad under the interstate-commerce act, to prevent it or any ship carrying ammunition in violation of the law, to prevent it violating neutrality, is just the same if it is owned by private persons as if it belonged to the Government or was supervised by the Government. There is no difference as to the obligation or duty.

Mr. COLT. I should like to ask the Senator a further question: Has the Government, under international law, any power to prevent a citizen from purchasing an interned ship? A citizen is bound in the first instance by municipal law; and in the absence of any international law on that subject a citizen has a perfect right to buy an interned ship, the same as he has to transport contraband goods. The Government has no power over him and no responsibility in regard to neutrality with respect to that act, except as it violates some international law.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the able Senator that he is wrong in two respects, as I see it, respecting his judgment greatly as I do.

First, the mere fact that a ship is interned does not render that ship at all a ship in violation of any law. The owner may have consented to internment to escape charter obligations. Being interned merely means that it is immured somewhere for some reason; but it does not become in any respect whatever, by merely being interned, the subject of a foreign country or the object of belligerency. If the able Senator meant to say a ship of a belligerent country, then I take his question, and I say, if he means a ship of a belligerent country the title of which is being held by the belligerent country or a citizen of such, I answer that no citizen of our country could get the benefits of the registration of that ship if it were in violation of the neutrality laws, because it would be presumed that the officers of the Government would not permit him so to violate the law. Therefore he would get no benefit of the purchase if he were so foolhardy as to undertake it.

Second, I answer my able friend that he is in error, unless I am greatly in error upon my understanding of international law, in saying that the obligation is any different upon the citizen as such and the Government as such. The only difference is that the Government serves as the agency to enforce the citizen's obedience, and I must respectfully urge that it is a mere difference between Government and citizen as to the thing upon which the foreign government operates. It can not operate upon the individual citizen of a foreign country, and can only operate upon the agency for the individual citizen, to wit, his organized society, called government.

Now, Mr. President, unless the Senator from Rhode Island has some other interrogatory, I move toward the close of my observations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina for an interrogatory.

Mr. SIMMONS. As the Senator had finished the point he was making and was about to reach his conclusion, I should like to place in the RECORD the act to which I referred a little while ago, known as the registry act. The act, as amended, would read as follows:

Any seagoing vessels, whether steam or sail, which have been certified by the Steamboat-Inspection Service as safe to carry dry and perishable cargo, wherever built, and which are to engage in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands, etc., being wholly owned by citizens of the United States or corporations organized and chartered under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, the president and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States, or corporations organized and chartered under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, the president and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States, and no others, may be registered as directed in this title.

There is not a word in it that limits the right of an American citizen to buy a ship from any person whatsoever.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me just for a question?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from New York for an interrogatory.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if a single ship has been purchased by an American citizen under the provisions of the registry act?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; not so far as I know. I am not advised about that.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina for an interrogatory.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I am advised about this—that certain ships belonging to great corporations in this country that were flying the flag of another country at the time this act was passed have been transferred to the American flag.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia for an interrogatory.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The interrogatory will be a reply to the question of the Senator from New York. I thought the Senator from North Carolina had finished.

Mr. SIMMONS. I had not quite finished.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina for an interrogatory.

Mr. SIMMONS. At the time we passed that act we were not expecting that the ships of foreign citizens that were then flying foreign flags would be admitted to registry under the act; but it was the expectation that other American citizens who did not then own any ships at all would be attracted by the new conditions we created by this act, and that they would buy ships, interned or otherwise, wherever they could get them at the best price in the open market, and that those ships would be admitted and were entitled to be admitted to registry under this act.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire will state his point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. The point of order is this: I should like information as to whether it was an interrogatory or a question that the Senator from North Carolina asked? [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMMONS. I refer the Senator from New Hampshire to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I reply that, not being an adept in lexicography, at this particular moment I shall not enter into that field of analysis. I leave it to the splendid capacity of the eminent alienist from New Hampshire. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia for an interrogatory.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I understood the question of the Senator from New York, it was not limited to whether interned vessels had been bought by private citizens who had not before owned vessels.

Mr. O'GORMAN. It was not limited.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from New York for an interrogatory only.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, I wish to answer the Senator's question, as I thought it might be of interest just at this time. Private citizens who did not before own vessels have bought during the past 60 days, within my knowledge, vessels that fly the flag of Great Britain, transferred those vessels to the flag of the United States under American registry, carried them to Bremen with the consent of the German Government, discharged their cargoes, and returned home with German cargoes without interruption.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, having accepted the interrogatories of all the Senators, and realizing that they have had the courtesy to answer them for themselves, it would be a work of supererogation for me to enter upon further reply. [Laughter.] I return to my speech. I desire to thank the Senators who have been courteous enough to allow me to make these yieldings without imposing upon me the literal effect of a ruling which, however right, is not without its embarrassments to the one who is on his feet. I must come to the conclusion that I am occupying the time of my colleagues longer than I had expected. I thank them for the attentive audience they are giving me.

Mr. President, as I review the observations of the Senator from New York in my mind, as I remember them, not wishing to do injustice to anyone, I quote them with the consciousness that I may not remember them accurately. I wish to refer to what the Senator paid great heed to, and that is the chambers of commerce.

The Senator said there was a meeting in Washington of the chambers of commerce, and that a majority of its number decided adversely upon consideration of this bill.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] recalls to my attention that the Senator from New York refers to all the chambers, the National Chamber of Commerce, I fancy. Mr. President, I have this to say: It may be true that that body of gentlemen decided adversely to the bill, but what of it? There is in this country ever to be found a set of gentlemen who always know more about the legislation than the legislators who frame and shape it and who never fail to express their judgment wherever opportunity affords them the chance. Now, with great respect to the chambers of commerce, I see my able friend, the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], and I invite his attention to what I now say. What confidence can we put in these reports and recommendations from chambers of commerce, however well they mean? The junior Senator from Massachusetts read to this body from that very source, the Chamber of Commerce of Boston, its condemnation of the Panama Railroad as an adventure and its denunciation of that railroad as a losing adventure, showing how little these commercial bodies really know of the Government operations. Promptly the officials of the Panama Railroad returned a reply showing that the Boston Chamber of Commerce in its resolutions was wrong in its facts, misstated its premises, was unjustified in its conclusions, and wholly in error according to reports of the Federal Government as recorded here in its annals at Washington.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield for an interrogatory to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to ask the Senator in what respect the statement made by the Boston Chamber of Commerce was in error?

Mr. LEWIS. I have the record here and I will put it in the RECORD. In three respects: First, by stating that the road had been a failure. Second, by stating that it had been a losing venture. Third, by stating that the Government operations had been responsible for all these results.

I will make them as an addenda to my remarks.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, not in the Senator's time but in my own time, I think I can prove that all three of those statements are correct.

Mr. LEWIS. I shall be glad to hear from the Senator about that question, but I now say to him that if there be no objection, I will introduce in my remarks, for the RECORD, a letter sent by a department specifically replying to those resolutions that the chamber of commerce adopted. I will introduce them in my remarks so that the Senator may have them in the RECORD, upon which he may address his observations to my addenda.

But now, Mr. President, if these chambers of commerce to which the able Senator from New York alluded have made observations against the bill, of course I am not willing to accept the idea that these chambers of commerce are like the wise men of whom we are told in the Holy Scriptures had all wisdom born in them, and with them it will die. I can not overlook the fact that many of these gentlemen were honest in their absolute opposition to the bill, for two reasons: One was, they come in large numbers from the coast cities, where the private transportation companies have their influences, and are naturally influenced against the competition of any other company. Secondly, they are honestly opposed to the opening by the Government of enterprises of this kind, because they really feel that any undertaking by the Government intrenches upon the dividends to be paid by these private institutions, which, of course, have their investments in the different concerns represented very largely by these gentlemen who came to serve as the representatives of the chambers of commerce. Thus, we will not overlook the personal interest that makes it absolutely impossible for these agencies to be impartial or correct in their judgment; and therefore I can not agree with the Senator from New York that their judgment should be binding upon the legislative body whose members are sent here by the people to investigate the subject in all of its relations and ramifications and reach their conclusions upon the basis of abstract justice.

Mr. President, I have no other allusion to that subject. I now return to the concluding portion of the Senator's speech.

I recognize the Senator from New York as speaking that sentiment which is lately held by a large number of gentlemen of his party, and that is that wherever this Government attempts any undertaking on behalf of the people through the agencies of the Government it should be promptly obstructed and defeated, not because it is unconstitutional, not because it violates the fundamental lines of demarcation in government, but because it does offer opportunity of competition with private enterprise that heretofore enjoyed monopoly of privilege.

Mr. President, the able Senator from New York concluded his observations by saying that the people of this country will control their own Government. I answer the able Senator that since they beheld his performance in Chicago, in the National Republican convention, and the conduct of that convention and its results, they have taken control of their own Government. They are now for the first time since the Civil War controlling their own Government, and it is because of just such performances as the Payne-Aldrich tax bill and the Aldrich currency bill. This latter measure that sought to put the Government behind the favored few, that they might issue money upon their promissory notes, and repress entirely the price of the labor and toil of every citizen of this country while they enriched themselves upon the usurious rates they charged the farmer upon his farm, the toiler in his factory, and the laborer in his mill by authority of the National Government and a Republican administration. Mr. President, beholding these things, the people have seen that the time has come when they shall possess themselves of their Government, and they have now, under a Democratic administration, proceeded to accomplish this fact.

Mr. President, the time has gone by when the people can be deluded by the specious argument upon governmental distinctions, that they have no right to do for themselves that which it is their right to do to repair a wrong. In the heart of the American Nation is the decree that that which is for their welfare shall by the people be executed.

Senators, there are but two forms of separate government now recognized by geographical or constitutional limitation—one, the nation; the other, the municipality. The conditions arising in the last 20 years have wiped out those intermediate legislative lines of State and Nation as before existing. The Supreme Court of the United States assumes to hold the local statute of Kansas unconstitutional, that merely forbade a man to be discharged from his employment in Kansas because he was a labor-union man. They assumed to sit in judgment upon the State of Kentucky and hold her statute unconstitutional that sought to protect her people against a trust monopoly. In many other instances of this nature the Federal Government has wiped out the States as sovereign political governments. This has been done under Republican doctrine and Republican policy—Federal intrusion upon and Federal invasion of State power.

Sirs, this Republican invasion and degradation has been accomplished in order to serve with favoritism the few who defy law. The Democracy now will convert this new power of usurpation to accomplish justice to the many. It will now appropriate the privilege to assure through this power that justice may be done the citizen, opportunity of prosperity given to the Nation, and full relief against oppression afforded to the people. Sir, the people have reached this judgment that whatever is necessary to their welfare shall be done by whatever government is necessary to execute it. Wherever it can be done by the local government wholly within local limitations, there only it ought to be done; but where a local government can not give it and it is necessary to extend beyond the local power in order to achieve the relief, then there it shall be done by and through whatever agency of constitutional government is accessible for the purpose.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York adverted to the attempt of the southern Members to meet by a relief measure the unprecedented cotton situation of their States. That measure was by their conscience and heart justified because of the emergency which had settled upon their people in great distress.

Mr. President, during the Spanish-American War, during the war between Germany and France in 1871, during the war in 1883 between France and China, the conditions then set upon our country were unusual. From these grew many unusual needs. These were met by emergency measures. In every emergency of this kind there arise exceptional instances which must be treated with wisdom and justice. This was the adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States in the greenback decisions, in the income-tax decisions, and in every instance where national convulsion had shaken the Nation from its fixed foundations, embedded in peace.

Mr. President, it is that situation with which we are now confronted, and so far as I am concerned I am quite prepared to meet the new existing emergency upon my country and my people. I am ready for it because it has come upon our people, forced upon them. Now, sir, for their self-defense they are forced for their self-preservation to adopt whatever course by any agency that can legally accomplish their relief. This condition has been availed of that the people may have their rights and preserve their heritage from the gripping hand of persecution and the clutch of strangling monopoly and crushing power.

Mr. President, where is the man who can justify before his country or his constituents a position at this time that will deny the farmer a chance to sell his cotton and his grain at the highest price in the markets which need his product? Where is the Senator who can justify his opposition to a measure which offers opportunity of serving the manufacturers and workmen by sending the product of their workmanship and labor abroad, where there is a demand? Who of you will decline to give opportunity to the thousands of idle now in the streets, who would have employment if you but make opportunity for selling the results of their labor? Who among us wishes to impoverish the people of his home and bankrupt the Treasury of his country? I am sure there are none. Each man as he listens to the dictates of his heart answers with me, There are none who could do such a thing.

To you, Senators from the South who have departed from your party, I speak. You differ on a distinction of theory. Admitting you are right, will not your patriotism direct you to waive the pride of personal opinion in order that you could cooperate in the great objects of relief of humanity which this bill has as its object? My colleagues, every pulse of my heart beats for my fellow comrades of the South. I recall the history of the degradation with which you were visited by Republican administrations in the dark days of the South's desolation. Mr. President, when I saw certain of my distinguished southern friends on this floor in opposition to this measure and giving comfort to the enemy and service to the persecutors of their people, I thought of their children and the miseries they had to undergo before all the world at the hands of these Republican masters, who these well-meaning but mistaken southern colleagues of mine support in their opposition to justice and Democracy. For myself, Senators, I can not refuse the relief to my fellow citizens, crying their distress; nor can I forget those who put on your people in the hour of their despair the crown of sorrows; nor can I ever desert the interests of those who were visited with disgrace and political persecution by those who now ally themselves with you, when the object is the destruction of your cause and the cause of Democracy. My southern colleagues, you know my feelings. I can say to you, as Ruth to Naomi:

> Entreat me not to leave thee, nor to cease from following after thee. Whither thou goest, I will go. Whither thou lodge, I will lodge. Thy people shall be my people—thy God my God—and where thou diest, will I die and be buried also.

Senators, Democrats, view the situation we have created! There will not be a country in Europe, governed by kings and monarchs and which has been sneering at the effort of democracy in its struggle for self-government, that will not delight in the dishonor and humiliation you would put on your President by your mistaken course. There is not an opponent on the Republican side who will not greet with laughter the defeat of a Democratic measure by Democrats—through their own disaffection and dissension.

Democratic Senators, I bring to your reflection as I leave you the lesson from the picture of the Conquerors, by Coutoure. You recall the canvas in the Louvre. In the front ground are to be seen Hannibal, Cæsar, Pompey, and Napoleon. Behind them the outlines of the determined and cruel countenances of the despotic rulers who follow in the wake of the military murderers. They sit astride their caparisoned steeds. They stretch across the middle of the roads and fill the spaces on the broad highways with their crushing advance. Just beyond them, crouching in shuddering groups, the miserable poor and the defenceless, beholding that it is but a moment distant when they are to be the victims of this merciless march and fall beneath the iron-shod feet of those who are to be driven over them. Behind the hedges and near the side of this merciless array stand men who had but lately been opponents and in conflict. One was in blue and the other in the blouse of red. They were known as the blues and the reds—they were hereditary foes and had been set upon each other by the masters, that advantage might be taken of their division and self-destruction, forced upon them by those whose interest it was to divide them that they might be overcome and by the hands of each other beaten down. These two—the blue and the red—saw these masters riding over their countrymen and on their way to further desolation of the land of their fathers. Then they moved out from their hiding place, and the blue, turning to the red, said: "My brother, why do we fight? Which way is your way?" The red replies: "Mine's the other way from those who trample our kindred. For, as they ride over those they will turn to ride over us." The blue answers: "True, if their way be ahead, ours is the other way—for our children, who have been hungered; for our wives, who have been dishonored; for our country, which has been stripped and pillaged." Then, both together, with their faces lifted to the heavens above, strike hands and made the vow, in response to the call of their beloved ones, saying: "If the persecutors move one way, ours must be the other; then, brother, together we march for home, for children, for country."

So say I to you. You see the way your persecutors go—ours is the other way; then we, too, together for home, for children, for country! [Applause in the galleries—suppressed by the Chair.]

ADDENDA.

Under permission granted to-day I herewith present certain correspondence had by Mr. E. O. Drake, vice president of the Panama Railroad Co. Let it be remembered at the outset that the Panama Railroad Co. is simply another name for a Government bureau, as the entire capital stock of this "company" is owned by the United States Government. The insertion of this correspondence in the RECORD at this time is designed primarily to refute the unwarranted and inaccurate pretensions of certain Boston shipping interests who are opposing.

These shipping interests have gathered themselves about the Boston Chamber of Commerce and have caused that body, through one of its committees, in all sincerity, no doubt, to send out a plea to Members of Congress against the pending ship-purchase bill and on behalf of a scheme of direct subsidy.

Before calling attention to inaccuracies in the letter referred to and presenting my data, let us see who stand sponsors for the communication and its allegations. They all seem to be very splendid men.

First, it is signed by the Boston Chamber of Commerce, Mr. E. J. Bliss, president, and Mr. James A. McKibben, secretary. Mr. Bliss is a director of the Regal Shoe Co. and also of the International Trust Co.

In the letter the Boston Chamber of Commerce declares its opposition to ship-purchase bill because it would—

Discourage private capital and personal initiative, and deter the development of an American shipping industry, so vital to the commercial progress of Boston, of New England, and of the whole United States.

The able members of this chamber of commerce then propose six specific schemes for getting more profits into the coffers of the Shipping Trust.

With the letter is transmitted a report of the committee of the chamber on merchant marine. This report contains the suggestions some of which I say are not accurate and which I will take up later. The statements relative to the Panama Railroad Co. vessels—Uncle Sam's steamship line between Panama and New York—I will show to be inaccurate at this time.

First let us see who are the able gentlemen who compose this committee of the Boston Chamber of Commerce. They are very busy men, as their numerous interlocking directorates would indicate, so if they were not able to check up all the alleged facts that had been included in the report which they signed, they should not be blamed. I certainly do not attach to them the slightest blame. Here are the names and some of the activities of this eminently competent, but quite occupied, we must admit, committee:

E. G. Preston, treasurer S. S. Pierce Co.; director John Hancock Life Insurance Co., Boston Safe Deposit & Trust Co., Boston Confectionery Co.; trustee Home Savings Bank.

E. E. Blodgett, lawyer (Blodgett, Jones, Burnham & Bingham), director Coastwise Transportation Co.

L. A. Coolidge, treasurer and director United Shoe Machinery Co.; vice president and director American Zinc, Lead, & Smelting Co.; director Boston Fast Color Eyelet Co., United Xpedite Finishing Co.

P. E. Fitzpatrick, director Brown Durrell Co. (hosiery, underwear), Boylston National Bank.

Frederick Foster, lawyer.

Theodore Jones, treasurer and director Jones, McDuffee & Stratton Co., (glass, pottery, and lamps), Home Savings Bank, Brookline Trust Co.

Winthrop L. Marvin, secretary and treasurer National Association Wool Manufacturers, was secretary Merchant Marine Commission 1904–5; associate member Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers; author of The American Merchant Marine, Its History and Romance; contributor to magazines on tariff, Navy, and merchant marine.

Robert S. Peabody, architect of firm Peabody & Stearns, director Massachusetts Institute Technology and Museum Fine Arts, of Boston, chairman Boston Park Commission.

George F. Willett, president Eastern Leather Co.; United Printing Machinery Co.; Norwood (Mass.) National Bank; treasurer and director American Felt Co.; director general Chemical Co., Boston University, Daniel Green Felt Shoe Co., Massachusetts Employees' Insurance Association, Merchants' National Bank, United States Worsted Co., Winslow Bros. & Smith Co. (sheepskins), Woonsocket Machine & Press Co., Winslow & Co. (naval stores).

These gentlemen say:

There is some precedent in the practice of other nations for Government ownership of railroads; there is none whatever for Government ownership of a merchant marine.

It is true that all the nations of the world, practically, except England, the United States, Turkey, and Spain, own their railroads—"some precedent"—but the impression made by the remainder of the statement will not quite bear out. Aside from the very extensive experience of Russia in Government ownership of a merchant marine, the other great nations have gone so far at ship subsidy and subvention as approaches very close to ownership. The title of the private owners is in almost every case subordinated to an effective Government claim. But in Russia the Arkhangelsk-Murman Steam Navigation Co. was chartered May 15, 1895, under Government control. The Government subscribed to 56 per cent of its capital stock, which in the gross amounted to 1,112,800 rubles—about $556,400. The dividend rate was fixed at 5 per cent. From surplus profits, if any, 1 per cent was to be paid to private shareholders, and of the balance 25 per cent was to be distributed in bonuses to the management and employees of the company, 37½ per cent added to the insurance fund, and 37½ per cent to be used for the rebate to the Government on the subsidy allowed. This Government-owned company owned 16 vessels of 11,187 gross tons and 10,038 horsepower.

In 1903 the Russian Government took over the Russian-Danube Steamship Navigation and provided by statute for the purchase and operation of additional new vessels. The management of the concern was placed under the bureau of merchant marine, department of merchant marine and ports. The Russian-Danube Navigation owned 14 vessels, 6,334 tons, 9,390 horsepower.

"The volunteer fleet" is another shipping organization owned and controlled by the Russian Government. This branch of the merchant marine was placed completely under Government control in 1902. The Government advanced to the volunteer fleet for the purchase of six new steamships 3,060,000 rubles, to be paid by the treasury in 1912 1,530,000 rubles and in 1913 1,530,000 rubles, this sum to be returned to the Government in full out of earnings in 20 years beginning in 1914. One of the regulations provides:

The reserves of the army and navy shall be given preference in appointments to the service in the volunteer fleet. The captains, mechanics, surgeons, engineers, sailors, and firemen of the vessels of the volunteer fleet shall be chosen chiefly from among members of the navy department, who are either in the reserves or on the retired list.

The volunteer fleet, January, 1914, owned 32 vessels of 116,422 tons and 98,460 horsepower. It seems that the taking over of these large divisions of the Russian merchant marine by the Government was prompted by a desire to put the ships onto a substantial and reliable basis which could not be secured under the greed of private capital. The splendid working of the new system is abundantly set forth in an unprejudiced article in Fairplay, weekly shipping journal (London), volume 62, page 447, February 26, 1914, as follows:

THE RUSSIAN VOLUNTEER FLEET.

[Extract from Fairplay, weekly shipping journal (London), v. 62, p. 447, Feb. 26, 1914.]

Since the year 1909, when the management of the Russian volunteer fleet was intrusted to the ministry of marine, and when the business of the concern was placed on something like a commercial basis, the results of its operations have improved considerably. Ever since 1885 that company has been the recipient of a yearly subsidy, amounting to 600,000 rubles, for the maintenance of a steamship service between Odessa or St. Petersburg and Vladivostok. Notwithstanding the State assistance, however, the company up to 1909 worked for the most part at a loss. Then, with the change in its management, came a change in its prospects. In 1909, for instance, the net profit realized, not including the subsidy, amounted to 512,132 rubles; in 1910 there was a surplus of 561,563 rubles, in 1911 of 178,807 rubles, and for 1912 the net profit was 289,290 rubles. In view of this altered state of things it is not to be wondered at that the Government considers that the time has arrived for revising the subvention allowance. A bill, in fact, has been laid before the Duma providing that for the next 10 years—i. e., from 1914 to 1923—the Volunteer Fleet Co. shall receive a yearly subsidy of 178,383 rubles for the working of the above-mentioned main line instead of the yearly sum of 600,000 rubles, as hitherto. The Government takes it for granted that henceforward there will be an annual increase of about 110,700 rubles in the earnings and an average increase of about 36,000 rubles in the expenses. The new bill stipulates that there shall be, as formerly, 18 voyages in both directions every year. The ports to be called at on the outward voyages are to be Nicolaieff, Constantinople, Beirut, Port Said, Djedda, Hodeida, Djibouti, Colombo, Singapore, Hongkong, and Nagasaki, and on the homeward trips Nagasaki, Hankow, Shanghai, Hongkong, Singapore, Penang, Colombo, Djibouti, Hodeida, Djedda, Port Said, Beirut, Constantinople, Feodosia, and Batoum. Nine of the company's steamers must, under the new bill, be put into the Odessa-Vladivostok line; four of them must, however, on account of their age, be replaced by new ones, and these new boats must have a speed of 12 knots, must be fitted for both passenger and cargo traffic, and be of about 8,000 tons carrying capacity. In order to furnish funds for the payment of this new tonnage—which, as far as possible, must be built in Russian yards—the company is empowered to raise a loan of altogether 3,920,000 rubles—namely, of 600,000 rubles in each of the years 1915 and 1916, of 1,500,000 rubles in 1917, and of 1,220,000 rubles in 1918. The new steamers have to be installed in the service as early as 1915, and seeing that the Russian yards will be fully employed for a long time to come in executing orders received for the construction of war vessels, it is more than probable that some of the new boats for the volunteer fleet will have to be built abroad.

I have not now at hand further data to refute other statements, as I am sure I will be able to do later concerning Australian experiences and other statements as to "the net experience in Government ownership which the world affords," but the correspondence which I will now insert concerning the Panama Railroad Co. line—Uncle Sam's line between Panama and New York—so completely negatives the wild, inaccurate, and unconsidered statements as to that line as to leave little to be said. I hear denunciations of Industrial Workers of the World propaganda, but how about the berating of the Government in such a splendid achievement as the building of the Panama Canal, and especially the steamship side of the undertaking, which has certainly been as brilliant and successful as any undertaking in the history of man's achievements?

Read the record of reduced rates to one-half of the former rates, of revised agreements that protect American shippers to South American ports. Study the figures and determine whether Uncle Sam is a blunderer and the Shipping Trust is perfection. Put your fingers to your brow and ask yourself seriously why these steamship owners want to keep Uncle Sam from going further in the Government ownership and operation of steamships, and then turn to the letter of these Boston men of trade and commerce and shipping combines and contemplate the nerve of them as they submit their plan to transfer about $100,000,000 gold a year from the pockets of the people to their own coffers.

The following is the correspondence with Mr. Drake, which I will take occasion to discuss later, but the friends of the Shipping Trust also use the data:

PANAMA RAILROAD CO.,
New York, September 15, 1914.

Hon. J. W. BRYAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BRYAN: Your letter of the 5th instant has just been received by me.

When the United States Government secured control of our company we were operating a steamship line between New York and Colon as a feeder for the railroad. It consisted of the steamships Allianca, Advance, and Finance, which were owned by the company, together with other chartered steamers that were secured from time to time, as warranted by the traffic.

The maximum freight rate then existing between New York and Colon was $8 per ton, and outside of a few of our employees, who were carried at lower rates, the prevailing fare for passengers was $75 each way.

The three steamers we had in the service were not, of course, of sufficient capacity to meet the demands for transportation of freight and passengers when the construction of the canal was commenced, and the Isthmian Canal Commission, the department of the Government in charge of the work, purchased the steamships Colon and Panama from the Ward Line and turned them over to us for operation on the basis of our company paying interest, charter hire, and depreciation.

The minimum freight rate was gradually reduced from $8 to $3.50 per ton, and is still effective, and practically all of our passenger accommodations have been availed of for the transportation of Government employees. These demands have been so urgent that we have not been able to accommodate the tariff passengers desiring to sail on our steamers, who have consequently patronized the other lines running between New York and the Canal Zone.

When the steamships Ancon and Cristobal were purchased for the transportation of cement to the Canal Zone, they were turned over to us without charter expense, because it was realized that any charge of this character assessed against us would be reflected in the rate established for the transportation of cement; and with a view to reducing this to the lowest possible limit, we were relieved from the obligation of paying charter hire for the steamships Colon and Panama upon the understanding that cement would be carried on the Ancon and Cristobal at actual cost, and that in arriving at this cost we would credit the Panama Canal with the amount we would pay for the charter of the steamships Colon and Panama. As a result of this arrangement all of the cement carried by our steamers in connection with the construction of the canal has been burdened with a transportation charge of only $1.25 per ton of 2,000 pounds, while on tramp steamers that we have been obliged to charter from time to time because our steamers were not of sufficient capacity to carry all of the cement needed in the work, the Government has incurred an expense of from $2.25 to $3 per ton of 2,240 pounds.

Up to the middle of August, when we turned over the steamship Cristobal to the Quartermaster's Department for the return of American tourists in Europe, we were operating six steamers—the Ancon and Cristobal, the Colon and Panama, and the Allianca and Advance. The last two are the property of our company, the Finance having been lost in New York Harbor about four years ago.

Up to May 31, 1914, we have charged up $358,653.35 to the depreciation of steamers owned by our company; we have maintained a rate of $3.50 for rough goods between New York and Colon, and $4.50 per ton on general cargo, as against the $8 rate in effect previous to the time the Government assumed control of our company, and as against a rate of $6 that is now being charged by steamship lines operating vessels between New York and ports contiguous to the Canal Zone; we have carried thousands of employees of the Government and their families from New York to the Canal Zone at the $20 and $30 rates, as against the $75 rate prevailing by other steamship lines; we have competed with foreign lines for the freight traffic moving between New York and ports on the Pacific coast both north and south of Panama, without being parties to rebates, reduced freight rates, or concessions in passenger fares to the important shippers interested in this traffic; we have assisted in the development of traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States as against the transcontinental railroads by allowing steamship cocarriers on the Pacific a proportion of the through rates sufficiently remunerative to enable them to maintain their steamers in the traffic and accepting a proportion for our Atlantic haul that in most cases results in a loss to our line; we have by the operation of our steamship line induced our Pacific Ocean carriers to agree to a gradual reduction in the rates to and from the United States and Pacific ports of Mexico, Central and South America, to the level of the rates to and from Europe, thereby doing away with the discrimination that has for years existed in favor of the European market; by our action in maintaining low and yet reasonable rates between New York and the Canal Zone we have saved the Government very considerable money in the shipments that have been forwarded by other lines that were forced to meet our rates, and notwithstanding all this the operation of the steamship line has been financially successful, as you will note by the following table:

	Profits.	Deficits.
1905	$157,245.49
1906		$37,158.21
1907	158,562.95
1908		178,810.67
1909	104,995.98
1910	167,952.25
1911	77,187.97
1912		201,761.13
1913	221,489.92
11 months to May 31, 1914	267,019.29
Total	1,154,453.85	418,730.01

I believe the above will give you in a concise manner the result of the operation of our steamship line since its control by the Government, but if there are any further details that you require regarding expenses, earnings, charter, depreciation, or anything else that you think would be of any interest to you, I shall be very glad to furnish them to you.

Yours, very truly,

E. A. DRAKE, Vice President.

Ten specific interrogatories on the various phases of the case were then submitted, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 25, 1914.

Mr. E. A. DRAKE,
Vice President Panama Railroad Co.,
24 State Street, New York City.

MY DEAR MR. DRAKE: I have your very interesting letter of the 15th instant and have given same considerable study. I shall use the data it contains in connection with a discussion of the shipping bill which President Wilson is demanding of this session of Congress. I am an enthusiastic supporter of the administration policy along this line and desire to do all I can to support the same with such recordations as your operations afford. With this in view I want some further information from you and note your kind offer to furnish same if I so desire:

1. What was the amount appropriated by the Government to secure control of the Panama Railroad Co.? How much was put into the business by the Government?

2. In your estimates of profits or deficits for the several years, do you figure interest on this total investment? If so, at what rate?

3. When the Colon and Panama were purchased from the Ward Line was the amount paid for these vessels included in the investment, and was interest charged on that portion of the investment?

4. You speak of "charter hire." What was the amount you were to pay for "charter hire" to the Government on the Colon and the Panama? From the fact that you paid "charter hire," I infer that you did not include the original amount of the purchase of these vessels in investment on which interest was to be charged. At the same time I note that you paid interest as well as "charter hire." If there is further data in connection with this feature, so that I can make it perfectly plain in debate in connection with this letter of the 15th, please give it to me.

5. The Ancon and Cristobal were turned over to the Panama Railroad Co. without charter expense, you say, to effect a low rate on cement. Under that arrangement does the low rate of $1.25 per ton evidence the real cost of transporting this cement? That is, is it the cost of transportation as you would have incurred had you been a strictly private corporation without governmental protection, and could the tramp steamers have hauled the cement at $1.25 per ton if they had waived profits? Can you give me a fairly accurate approximation of the total amount saved by the Government on transportation of materials, supplies, and men to Panama during the construction of the canal by virtue of the Government's ownership of these vessels, as compared with the amount the Government would have had to pay if it had not owned the vessels?

6. The Finance, you say, was lost in New York Harbor about four years ago. Was the value of this vessel included in depreciation or profit and loss? How was it accounted for?

7. Up to May 31, 1914, you have charged up $358,653.35 to depreciation of the steamers owned by the company. Does that sum cover all of the depreciation? In other words, are the vessels and property of the Panama Railroad Co. worth the sum paid for them less this depreciation?

8. On the subject of rates you say you have maintained a rate of $3.50 for rough goods between New York and Colon and $4.50 on general cargo, as against the rate of $8 previously in effect and $6 now charged to ports contiguous to the Canal Zone. Could a private corporation carry this freight and traffic at the same rate you are charging if profits were eliminated? It is persistently claimed by fellow members of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries that your vessels are not self-sustaining. Is there any further data you can give me to controvert beyond doubt this claim?

9. On page 4 of your letter of the 15th instant you speak of doing away with a discrimination that has existed for years in favor of the European market in Mexican, Central and South American ports. Will you give me any data you can to amplify and demonstrate this feature both as to the nature and extent of the discrimination heretofore practiced and as to the reduction you have brought about?

10. In your itemized statement on page 4 of your letter of the 15th instant you show a deficit of $37,158.21 in 1906, a deficit of $178,810.67 in 1908, a deficit of $201,761.13 in 1912. What is the explanation for these deficits in these particular years? Your total profits for the years mentioned are $1,154,453.85. Your total deficits are $418,730.01. This makes the aggregate profits exceed the deficits by $735,723.84. Is this a true statement of the profits and is it a fact that the Government has actually made this much money by virtue of the ownership of these vessels during the time covered by their operation?

I realize that I am burdening you by these queries, but I shall appreciate very much full answers to them in order that I may demonstrate to Congress the fact that men employed by the United States Government are able to do things of this kind and have as much sense and as much efficiency as men employed by the private interests of the country, and the story of governmental waste and inefficiency is not borne out by the facts.

Thanking you for your kindness of the 15th, and thanking you in advance for such further information as you will be kind enough to furnish for immediate use, I remain,

Sincerely, yours,

J. W. BRYAN.

Mr. Drake answered as follows:

PANAMA RAILROAD CO.,
New York, October 2, 1914.

Hon. J. W. BRYAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BRYAN: I take pleasure in submitting the following replies to the specific inquiries contained in your letter of the 25th ultimo, previously acknowledged:

1. The old French canal company was the owner, by purchase, of 68,888 of the total of 70,000 shares of the Panama Railroad Co., and when the United States Government bought the assets of the Panama Canal Co. for $40,000,000 it secured these 68,888 shares. My recollection is that they were valued at $7,000,000 by the representatives of the United States Government who arranged the purchase, but correct information regarding this, as well as concerning the cost of the remaining 1,112 shares purchased by the Government to secure complete control of the company, can undoubtedly be obtained from the files of Congress in Washington or from Maj. F. C. Boggs, chief of office of the Panama Canal, who is located in that city.

In considering this question it must be borne in mind that the Panama Railroad Co. operated a railroad across the Isthmus known as "Panama Railroad" and a steamship line between New York and the Canal Zone known as the "Panama Railroad Steamship Line."

As explained to you in my previous letters, the facilities of the steamship line were sufficient to take care of the commercial traffic that was offering up to the time the United States Government undertook the work of constructing the canal. The railroad the company operated across the Isthmus was also similarly situated, but in order to handle the large amount of material, supplies, and workmen required in the construction of the canal it became necessary to practically reconstruct the road and equip it with modern rolling stock that its previous commercial traffic did not warrant. There were two ways in which this could be accomplished—the company could either make these improvements out of its own or borrowed funds and charge the United States Government sufficiently high rates for the service rendered to warrant this expenditure, or apply to this purpose all of its own funds, borrow the additional moneys required from the United States Government, and charge rates for the transportation furnished to the Government that approximated actual cost.

The latter plan was determined upon, and the company secured loans of $650,000 from the Isthmian Canal Commission and $4,285,197.03 from the Government, making a total indebtedness of $4,935,197.03. All of these advances, with the exception of $272,234.92 that was expended in the rebuilding of our steamship Allianca, were applied to the retirement of the company's bonded indebtedness and the improvement of the railroad facilities at the Isthmus in order to enable it to handle the Government's traffic at low rates; and from the net revenues of the company these loans were repaid to the extent of $1,687,864.92, leaving a balance now due of $3,247,332.11, upon which, by act of Congress dated March 4, 1911, we are relieved from further payment on account of principal or interest.

As an indication of the low rates that we charged I would refer you to our annual report for the year ending June 30, 1913, which shows that although the freight traffic we carried for account of the Government was 56.67 per cent of the total traffic carried over the railroad only 17.60 per cent of the company's revenue was derived from this, the balance being the result of the carriage of commercial freight, which though forming but 39.50 per cent of our tonnage yielded 82.40 per cent of our freight revenue.

2. The correspondence exchanged with you related only to the operation of the steamship line. From the reply to inquiry No. 1 you will see that of the loans secured from the Government only $372,234.92 was applied for steamship purposes, and this was repaid.

Interest was paid to the Government on all the loans secured for the railroad's account to March, 1911; 4 per cent was the rate on loans secured for new equipment and construction, and 2½ per cent on the loans secured for the retirement of the company's first-mortgage bonds.

3. The steamships Colon and Panama were purchased by the Isthmian Canal Commission and are not the property of our company; they therefore do not appear in our capital account as an asset of our company.

My answer to inquiry No. 4 gives you the details of the interest payments to the Government on account of the use of these steamers by our company.

4. The steamships Colon and Panama were purchased by the Isthmian Canal Commission, at a cost of $1,312,000; we paid for the use of these steamers 8 per cent per annum on their cost, 4 per cent representing depreciation and 4 per cent interest on the investment. We also obligated ourselves to keep these vessels insured for their full value, to make all ordinary and extraordinary repairs, and at the expiration of their charter to return them in as good condition as when received, ordinary wear and tear excepted. In addition to the 8 per cent on their cost, we have also paid interest at the rate of 4 per cent on the value of the additions and improvements that were required to fit these steamers for our service, these latter amounting to $416,476.74.

On October 31, 1910, we discontinued making any direct payments for charter or depreciation, this being recovered from us through a relatively reduced rate that we established for the transportation of cement for account of the Panama Canal on the steamships Ancon and Cristobal. The total charter we paid to the Government up to that time was $585,947.04.

5. The rate of $1.25 per ton that we now charge for the transportation of cement on the Ancon and Cristobal was established by taking the actual cost of transportation, without any charge for charter, interest, or depreciation, and taking therefrom the amount per annum that we were paying for the use of the Colon and Panama. If we were a strictly private corporation without any control by the Government we could not possibly carry cement in steamships of American registry at anything like $1.25 per ton; nor could any other steamship owner operating even foreign steamers carry cement at this rate without incurring a heavy loss.

The highest rate we paid to a Norwegian tramp steamer was $3 per ton of 2,240 pounds, and we secured this only because the chartered owners had homeward traffic from Cuba that was available for the return trip. The lowest rate we secured from tramp steamers, even under the most favorable circumstances and with the assurance of full homeward cargo, was $1.60 per ton, but under ordinary conditions of the charter market an English or Norwegian tramp steamer can not make any revenue from the carriage of cement to Colon unless the rate is in the neighborhood of $2.40 per gross ton and full homeward cargo can be secured at paying rates.

It would not be possible for me to give you even an approximate idea of the amount saved to the Government on the transportation of materials, supplies, and employees by virtue of its ownership of our line, as compared with the amount it would have paid if it did not control the line. You will realize in a moment the difficulty of this task when you consider the following:

First. All employees have been carried to the Canal Zone at an expense to the Government of $40 for each adult; and all the employees and their families traveling at the expense of the employee have been carried at the rate of $20 or $30 for a journey of 2,000 miles, occupying nearly seven days, as against the tariff rate of $75 by other lines, which during certain seasons of the year when the tourist traffic is not important, apply a rate of $56.25 for the transportation of Government employees.

Second. The rates on all Canal Commission supplies is $3.50 per ton on rough goods and $4.50 per ton on general cargo, as against the previous tariff rate of $8 per ton.

The other regular lines have also been obliged to meet our rates in order to secure any share of the traffic, because the Government, although owing our line, does not patronize it exclusively.

6 and 7. The book value of the steamship Finance at the time this vessel was lost was $244,265.37; we received from the White Star Line as its share of our loss $33,333.33; the amount of depreciation figured on our books was $40,607.61; the balance of $170,324.43 was charged to profit and loss account.

The book value of the Advance and Allianca is $762,713.62; the amount of depreciation to May 31, 1914, is $318,045.74, thus making their net value on May 31, 1914, $444,667.88.

I consider that I am conservative in stating that the vessels are worth in the market their present value on our books. We could not replace them by steamships of American registry that are capable of giving us the service we now receive from them at anything like this amount, and they are worth more than their book value to us.

8. At the rates of $3.50 per ton for rough goods and $4.50 per ton on general cargo our steamship line, which receives no assistance whatever from the Government or from the railroad company, is self-sustaining and earns a profit. If we were a private steamship line independent of any connection with the Government there would be no inducement to carry employees and their families at a $20 and $30 rate, because this does not much more than cover the cost of their subsistence, and we could take steps to secure good paying freight traffic that is now lost to us because we can not follow the practice of other lines in securing it.

9. The principal part of the freight traffic carried over the Panama Railroad was, up to a few years ago, the freight between Europe, Central America, Mexico, and South America in both directions. We had one steameship connection on the Atlantic running to the United States, and eight running to Europe. Our cocarriers on the Pacific Ocean, with the exception of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., operated steamers of foreign registry, and as a result of the various pooling and other arrangements that were and probably are still effective in connection with European traffic there was more or less a community of interest between the European-Atlantic carriers and the various carriers on the Pacific.

The traffic to and from Europe was always subject, more or less, to competition via the Straits of Magellan. This did not so seriously affect the traffic to and from the United States, but the result was that the rates to and from Europe were gradually reduced, while those to and from the United States were maintained.

For instance, on traffic to Central and South America the rates on high-grade cargo, such as laces, ribbons, silks, etc., were $9.94 per ton higher from the United States than from Europe, although the distance is 1,000 miles less. On cotton goods, domestics, linens, etc., the rates were $7.39 per ton higher; on canned goods they were $9.82 per ton higher, and on edible cargo, such as crackers, meal, flour, sugar, etc., the rates were $3.82 per ton higher. On shipments of clean coffee from these ports the rates to the United States were from $3 to $3.80 per ton higher; on sugar, $5.43, and on hides and skins, $13.30 per ton higher than the rates to Europe.

Our railroad across the Isthmus being the intermediate carrier had no justification under private ownership to reduce this revenue by insisting upon its cocarriers establishing rates to and from the United States on as low a basis as those to and from Europe, but by the operation of our steamship line we gradually brought about a condition of affairs by which the rates from the United States were lowered from time to time until they were finally on a level with those effective from Europe. This, of course, was not accomplished without considerable objection on the part of our Pacific Ocean carriers, some of whom even to this day feel we have unnecessarily reduced their revenues by lowering the rates from the United States to the level of those from Europe when, in their judgment, the rates from the United States should be higher than those from Europe, because the latter are not subject to the competition that exists on traffic from Europe.

We have also succeeded in gradually inducing our carriers on the Pacific to establish the same rates on shipments to the United States as on those to Europe, although, as a matter of fact, we have no right and no power by which this could be brought about. The principal disputes we have had with our steamship connections have been the result of this policy and of our refusal to increase rates from the United States when, because of charter or other conditions, all the various steamship lines in the world were engaged in raising their charges.

10. In 1906 the deficit of $37,158.21 was directly attributable to the loss on traffic due to the earthquake in San Francisco and to the diversion of some of our local and through cargo to the steamships of the Hamburg-American Line and the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co., which inaugurated that year a service between New York and the Canal Zone in opposition to our line.

In 1908 a deficit of $179,810.67 was due to our loss of tariff passenger traffic to the Royal Mail and Hamburg-American Lines and the carriage instead of employees of the Government, who with their families were furnished transportation to and from the Isthmus at the rate of $20 for each adult; the operation of five steamers on our line, which was imperative in order to maintain the food supply of the employees of the Government when the general and commercial cargo could easily have been handled with four steamers, and the falling off in our traffic of 14,823 tons; and the increase in charter expense of $129,749.69 for the hire of steamers while we were repairing the Allianca and making extensive necessary repairs to the Colon.

The deficit of $201,761.13 in 1912 was the result of the following conditions:

The Pacific Mail Steamship Co., which, as you know, is controlled by the Southern Pacific Railway Co., refused to exchange traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States unless granted what was unquestionably an unreasonable proportion of the through rate. The Government offered every inducement to independent steamship lines to handle this traffic, and finally secured a connection. This independent line found it necessary to establish a service from Philadelphia in order to give their steamers on the Pacific sufficient tonnage to make their ships profitable. This Philadelphia service was discontinued by the independent line, and rather than lose the entire tonnage over the railroad we assumed the operation of this service. We knew at the time this would entail a heavy loss to our steamship line, but that it would be more than offset by the earnings of the railroad on the large amount of traffic it would continue to handle because of that service. Our loss in this connection was $70,057.29.

The Pacific carriers at one time brought more cargo to Panama than could be moved across the railroad to Colon in time to forward by our connecting steamers, because the facilities on the Isthmus were almost congested by the large tonnage we were unexpectedly called upon to handle by the Panama Canal and the inability of their operating officials to promptly release our cars. When the cargo was moved across the Isthmus we were obliged in order to prevent a block of all our facilities to secure a tramp steamer as a warehouse to receive it as fast as delivered from cars and to bring it to New York. The expense of this amounted to $21,739.20 and is properly chargeable to the railroad, but it is a steamship expense and has been charged to our steamship line.

Extraordinary repairs were required on our steamships, especially the Colon and Panama, which as above indicated are the property of the Government. The amount charged on this account during that year was $207,488.88.

An additional pier rental in New York City, because of the Ancon and Cristobal being turned over to us, cost $13,071.88.

The increased cost of stevedoring, as the result of handling a class of California traffic that had always been forwarded up to that time by steamers or sailing vessels operating via Cape Horn or the Straits of Magellan, and an increase in the rate of wages paid to stevedores cost $65,519.73.

I trust this will satisfactorily answer all the inquiries you have made, and regret that on account of press of other important matters I have not been able to furnish this to you more promptly.

Respectfully,

E. C. DRAKE, Vice President.

I can not further discuss this matter now, but this data is furnished freely for full use in this debate by all sides. I am sure those who are proud of the splendid work of the Government in this crowning achievement of man at Panama have no cause to be otherwise than proud of the handling of these steamships.

NOT VOTING—2.

Goff	Tillman

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the kaleidoscopic changes that have been going on in the Senate for the last 10 hours leave me a little mystified as to exactly "where we are at." I am forced to come to the Chair to get my information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). As the present occupant of the chair understands, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has moved the recommitment of the bill known as the ship-purchase bill, and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has moved to amend that motion by certain instructions, which the former occupant of the chair has held to be divisable. So the immediate question before the Senate is the adoption of the first proposed instruction in the motion for recommitment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Chair kindly inform me, then, what became of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to know what has become of that amendment.

Mr. STONE. As I understand, Mr. President, the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] offered a proposition in the form of an order, and the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] related to that motion or resolution, which, as I understand, has been withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was laid on the table. Both of them were laid on the table.

Mr. STONE. They were either withdrawn or laid on the table. They have been disposed of.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber at least long enough to congratulate them for the progress they have made to-day in this matter. I can not help but recall the very prophetic statement of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] not long ago, in which he deplored the condition of the poor old Democratic Party, which seemed incapable of conducting the affairs of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not sympathize with him at that time so much as I do to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question. Why does he leave out the adjective "dear" in his reference to the Democratic Party?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, because I did not know but that it was not quite so dear to-day as it then was. At any rate, Mr. President, I think the Senator's statement has been exemplified in the management of this bill during the day.

I want to call the attention of that side of the Chamber to the loss of 8 or 10 hours in attempting to do something against the collective conscience of the Senate of the United States. There may be some of those on this side of the Chamber who believe in the principles of the ship-purchase bill; but I am inclined to believe, Mr. President, that there are none of them who will join you in committing the offense against the Constitution, the rules, and the conscience of the Senate, and against individual Senators, as you have attempted in the several votes that have been had upon the question. The Vice President of the United States has certainly been very considerate to your side in the selection of those whom he has asked to take the chair in his absence. He has given you your most courageous men, those who are not afraid of the Constitution or of the laws or of any rule of the Senate. The picture of Ajax defying the lightning sinks into insignificance and looks meek and cringing compared with the courageous attitude of those who have occupied the chair, in their defiance of the Constitution and of the rules that have heretofore governed the Senate.

Have you made anything by the defiance of those rules? I should have been glad to have gone on at 7 o'clock this morning, after having stayed up all night, and follow the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]; but immediately you attempted new methods of cutting out debate; and so eager were you to prevent anyone else debating the merits of the bill, that you have been debating your own little party quarrels and fighting your own little battles all the day. But, Mr. President, the time spent has not been wholly lost. We have been getting the secrets of the Democratic caucus. It is certainly enlightening, if not a matter of pleasing interest to the people of the United States, to understand that a great policy can be foisted upon the United States by one single individual, whose mind wabbles during the night, depending upon the state of his stomach, the quality and character of his previous dinner, and that his vote against the policy one day, affected by the intricate workings of his digestive organs during the night, has changed the whole policy of the Democratic Party from one which would be independent upon the shipping bill to one which binds its members by some kind of a Mollie McGuire oath, taken behind closed doors, that they pledge their political life and honor that they will follow the dictates of that caucus.

Mr. President, I myself do not object to conferences. During the 16 years I have been in the Senate I have never yet failed to attend a Republican conference, and during all that time there has never been one single attempt of a Republican conference to compel any Member to abide by the will of the majority, whether that majority was two-thirds or any other number.

This morning, when a call for a quorum had been made and a quorum had responded and the Chair had announced from his place that a quorum was present, I immediately got recognition of the Chair and had concluded one-half of one sentence when some Senator arose upon the other side to introduce an entirely different proposition—a measure to change the rules of the Senate. Immediately I raised the point of order that no Senator could, without his consent, be taken off his feet after he had been recognized and while a voting quorum was present, as announced by the Chair. During this same Congress—only last summer—this same question was before the Senate, and with an almost unanimous vote on the other side you held that you could not introduce a new subject or take a Senator off the floor for that purpose without your consent. To-day, with exactly the same question before you, you reverse your position, and Senators on the other side were counted almost solidly in favor of the proposition that you affirmed only a few months ago was erroneous.

Mr. President, you can have one rule for one bill and another rule for another bill; but, as has been suggested, they will come back to plague you. You can not force them down the throat of a minority by brute force. I have intended to speak but a short time upon this subject, but the methods of the "dear old Democratic Party," as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] would describe it, by attempting to break down all the rules and shifting the battle from one against a ship-purchase bill pure and simple to one of a defense of the Constitution and the rules that have governed the Senate for 125 years, those of us who have heretofore not spoken upon the subject at all can be counted to raise our voices and to take as many hours as may be necessary to defend that old Constitution and the rights of the Senate to free and fair discussion on the floor of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, it has been a little amusing to me to listen to the oratory on the other side of the Chamber about filibusters on this side. It was only two years ago when nearly every Member on that side of the Chamber, Senators who to-day raise their eyes in holy abhorrence against a filibuster and clasp their hands in an attitude of prayer, were then conducting a filibuster, not for the purpose of defending the Constitution and the rights of the Senate but for the purpose of obtaining a few post offices in the United States, hovering like vultures over a poor, dying animal, too hungry to wait until he had died before they began the dissection process.

Those Senators who have been so ardently condemning the filibuster carried on upon this side of the Chamber in defense of the Constitution were engaged in a filibuster for three months in order to gather up a few petty little post offices which they wanted to steal from the Republican Party. That is the difference between a Democratic and a Republican filibuster. We gave way and let you have those offices, but we will not give way and let you overrule the Constitution or the rules of this Senate.

Mr. President, I believe in a filibuster at times. I simply want those on the other side to take off their white robes and remove the aureole from their heads so that we may see them just as they are, and have them admit that they filibuster whenever they want to gain a point. You filibustered all of last week in order to gain time to reorganize your broken lines. We are doubtless talking much longer than we otherwise would in order to prevent a caucus of the Democratic Party from hurling the country headlong into socialism.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal of talk of late years about getting rid of the old parties—the Republican Party and the Democratic Party. The Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Minnesota have been making speeches of late years along this line, in which they have deprecated the fact that we have any parties whatever. I have been a little in sympathy with them, believing that the Republican and the Democratic Parties have scarcely kept up with the changing issues. To-day the country is principally divided upon the question of paternalism, or socialism, and conservatism.

I am perfectly willing to organize two new parties that will bring this great question to the front—a socialist party and a conservative party. I will put into the one party all of you who want the Government to go into business on its own account, who believe in Government ownership of everything, and to put in the other those who believe in the old order of things, which has been in existence since the days when God Almighty told Adam to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow, which edict has really been a blessing and not a curse to humanity, and upon that issue I would be perfectly willing to meet you and go to the people of this country.

Can the Senator from Illinois, or any other Senator here, give me one single instance where a filibuster has succeeded that it has not been for the benefit of the country? You admit it on the other side when you say by a filibuster you saved the country from the force bill. The public cried "Hurrah" when the last sentence was uttered upon your river and harbor bill and it was killed by a filibuster. You can not conduct a filibuster unless you have at least not only a fair proportion of the Senate with you, but you must have the country back of you, and the country is back of us in this filibuster.

Mr. President, it was alleged that this filibuster is very wicked because it denies the right of a majority to rule. How are you going to determine what are the rights of a majority of the whole Senate when you bind the minority of the majority party by a rule which controls them against their own conscience? The real majority is on this side of that great question.

It has been stated here by one of your own Members that more than half on that side of the Chamber are against this bill at heart. This side, with the exception of two or three Members, are all against it. Therefore, when you say that we are filibustering, we simply say that we are defending the majority against the effort of a minority in a cause to defeat the will of the individual membership of the Senate.

Mr. President, I want to be as short as possible. This ship-purchase bill is before us on a motion to recommit to the Committee on Commerce, with the desire on this side of the Chamber that it may remain there, and on the other side, that it may be so amended as to secure a majority vote when it is reported back to the Senate.

I will address myself to the first of the three amendments to the motion for recommitment. I want to specify particularly on what particular amendment I am now talking, because if the same spirit is indulged which took me off my feet this morning, and kept me off for eight hours, it will undoubtedly result in my discussing each one of those amendments as often as I can get the floor to discuss it. I simply give this mild little warning, that there is at least one on this side of the Chamber who does not intend to be driven by such methods as were adopted by the Chair this morning. Everyone of us remembers the black Friday in this Senate of some little time ago. You are glad to escape the mistakes you made that day. You will reverse yourself in the mistakes you made to-day, but while you are doing that you are showing the same incompetency of the Democratic Party to control the destiny of this great Government. After all, I think you will progress more rapidly by allowing us to go on and debate this bill in the Senate, because I do not think you are going to get the majority in the Senate here to say that you can cut off the right of debate, and when you bring this matter back to the people you will learn, I think, that those who have prevented you from having your own way have been your best friends, the friends of your own party.

You have been talking to us about wanting to reflect the sentiment of the people. Very well, if you want to reflect the sentiment of the people, why is it that you are so fearful lest this bill should not pass this session? Why, the very last expression of the people sent a number of Congressmen back to the House. The last vote, with the personnel that that vote represents, is the last expression of the people, is it not? Why, then, are you afraid to accept the result of their last act? You have not had this matter before the people in any form whatever. You have not had it as a part of your own declared policy. It has not been presented in any way, even to a Democratic convention. It comes here born out of nothingness, and you immediately say that the people want it, but at the same time you utter those words you dare not keep it open until the people themselves can pass upon the question through their last selected representatives.

Now, why not press the appropriation bills and get through with them? The people personally want that done. Then, when that is done, in 30 days you can call an extra session, and if you represent the sentiment of the people of the United States you can put your bill through. The fact is that you know that it will fail, and that is the reason why you are willing to throw aside all the rules of the Senate and hurry this through before the very people whom you say you are trying to save have an opportunity to express their views upon it by their vote in the other Chamber.

I think I am justified in assuming that either this bill will have to give way to appropriation and other absolutely necessary measures or that neither this measure nor any other one will be enacted into law during this session. So the question resolves itself into either doing nothing this session or dropping this measure for the present—a measure on which the Senate is almost evenly divided in vote and overwhelmingly antagonistic in real sentiment, uninfluenced by party fealty or unscared by the administration club.

With the continuous pouring in of petitions against this ship-purchase measure, no one can claim that it has any universally popular backing. I think the majority of the American people are against it, but that is a question upon which we may honestly differ.

On the other hand, all the people want the appropriation bills passed at this session. The country does not want another extra session.

The business of the country abhors this continual action and reaction of the Congress of the United States, where they never know from one year's end to the other what they must take into consideration in conducting their business.

Furthermore, there are bills and resolutions in our committees supported by the petitions of hundreds of thousands, and earnestly desired by millions, and against which not one single petition has been filed. If we wish to respond to the public demand, then let us drop this contested proposition and take up the resolution to prohibit the sale of munitions of war to belligerents.

Millions are asking for this and no one is protesting against it that I have heard of.

Then let us take up the farmers' measure—the rural-credits bill. The whole agricultural section of the country is interested in this measure and not a single protest has been lodged against it.

So one of the reasons why this measure should be sent back to the committee and remain there, either without instructions or with instructions to give it a decent burial, is that we may pass Senate resolution 6688, prohibiting the sale of munitions of war to the European belligerents. The merits of this resolution are, therefore, involved in this motion, because we can not get it before the American Senate unless this other matter is taken out of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I have many thousands of petitions asking for the present passage of Senate resolution 6688, prohibiting the sale of munitions of war to European belligerents. The questions involved in that resolution are of far-reaching consequence, and the vast number of petitions show clearly the deep interest of many of our American citizens of Teutonic ancestry, who feel that the supplying by this country of war implements, ammunition, and so forth, to only one side engaged in the great contest now being waged in Europe, even though it may not violate international usages or law, the strict letter of neutrality nevertheless operates to the advantage of the allies and the disadvantage of Germany and Austria, and hence places this country in reality in the attitude of being a sort of side partner of the allies.

No one, Mr. President, who has given the subject serious consideration can say that the course we should pursue is perfectly clear and free from doubt. I would not be frank if I did not admit that plausible arguments could be given why we should not change at this time a usage that has been sanctioned by international acquiescence for centuries, and in which every nation has fully indulged.

There can be no question, however, but that the nation which has taken the lead in the past in disfavoring war as a means of settling international difficulties ought not to be foremost in supplying other nations with the war material to settle such difficulties by the slaughter of each other; that the nation which says, by its treaties with other nations of the world, "We will submit all our difficulties to a court of arbitration and will not go to war against any other nation until a joint commission of the two has investigated and reported all the facts concerning the disagreement" ought not, when other nations, without warning and without discussion, fall at each other's throats, say to them, "Go to it; here are my arsenals; I shall be highly gratified to fill your orders. Ideals are fine to talk about, but business is business."

We ought not to fix a day to pray for peace while we are selling ammunition for war. We ought not to stand with the Bible in one hand and a bomb in the other marked "For sale."

In my opinion, Mr. President, there is but one proper and consistent policy for this country, and that is to say to all nations of the world: "We are against the arbitrament of war; we are against blood and tears; we are against the murder of men; we are against the agonized sobs of women; we are against killing the fathers, the sons, and the brothers; we are against filling the world with the widows, the fatherless, and the unwed; we are against famine and pauperism; we are against misery and woe and anguish as a means of settling international disagreements, and we will not allow our honest motives, our sincere convictions, to be questioned or sullied by furnishing the instrumentalities to bring about such deplorable, such horrible, conditions in the world."

The question which presents itself to-day is not whether this should be our policy, but whether we can initiate this policy at this particular moment, when nations are in a death struggle; whether this sudden change of policy at this moment would not in its effect operate and would not be looked upon as a move designed to assist one side as against the other; and, if we are to adopt a policy of this kind, whether we ought not in fairness to all nations give timely notice, so that any one of them might prepare itself by being thus apprised that in case of war it could not purchase war materials in the markets of this country.

Mr. President, presenting the two sides of this question, we find, first, the claim that by continuing to sell munitions of war to the belligerents, inasmuch as only one side can, under the conditions, reach our market, we are favoring that side in the war, and are therefore unneutral.

From the other side the claim is that, relying upon a continuance of trade relations in accordance with international usages, some of the great countries have not kept themselves prepared for a long, severe war, but have depended upon their ability to purchase war materials in this country if they found themselves engaged in a great conflict, and that our sudden reversal of a policy which we and all other countries had followed and are still following would, in effect, be assisting the country which had prepared for war against the country which had not so fully prepared, and would therefore be an act of bad faith. They urge, and very consistently, that a country which is buying war material from other neutral countries can hardly complain if its opponent is also buying war material from this other neutral country. To-day, through fear of being drawn into this war sooner or later, none of the neutrals, I am informed, are selling munitions of war to the belligerents. And in fact, Mr. President, I do not understand that any belligerent power has challenged our right to sell war material if we act impartially.

It is clear, therefore, that if we take such a step as that of laying an embargo on the shipment of arms and war munitions to belligerent countries we must do it as a great American policy—not as an obligation but as a moral duty. We must not put ourselves in the attitude of making a change because it will help this side or hurt the other side in that sanguinary conflict.

I will consider the last contention only—that the sudden change of our ancient policy would be unneutral and in bad faith—because if we continue the sale of munitions of war, I admit we can do so in harmony with past usages and without violation of the strict letter of neutrality as construed by the great nations of the world, including all those now engaged in the war, even though the effect of it may be of special advantage to one side or the other. On the other hand, if we place an embargo on the sale of guns, battleships, and ammunition, thereby depriving some of our citizens of great profits, we are doing so in order to maintain a great national policy, an anti-war policy, and not for the purpose, as I have said, of favoring or injuring either side of the controversy. If the selling of munitions of war to either or all of the warring nations can not be regarded as an unneutral act, no matter whom it may favor, then certainly the refusal to sell those articles to either or any of them, no matter whom it may favor, can not be regarded as an unneutral act.

Mr. President, no matter from what country our ancestors, immediate or remote, came, we ought never to forget that we are American citizens with but a single fealty, and as representatives of our country in its foreign as well as its domestic relations our course should be unswerved by sympathy for one and unswayed by prejudice against another nation. This duty becomes more apparent and the dangers of a different course more manifest when we recall the millions of people who have emigrated to this land from the several countries now engaged in warfare, and whose sympathies naturally turn toward the land of their own or their ancestors' nativity. We can not allow our views concerning the responsibility for this conflict or the sympathy or hostility of the press, or of any portion of our own citizenship, to ripen into any act on our part which should have even the semblance of assistance to either belligerent. If we fail to do this we wrong the sensibilities of the children of one land to please those of another, and, worse yet, we weaken our own independent national character and compromise our national integrity.

In blood we are English, German, French, Scandinavian, Irish, Scotch, Russian, Polish, Italian, and so forth. That admixture of blood should hold our respect, kindly good will, and sympathy toward every one of these great nations, while our Americanism, our just pride in our own independent nationality, should keep us free from the animosities of any of the nations toward each other.

In a letter from the Secretary of State to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations he takes the position that an embargo at this time would be an unneutral act; that it would be hurtful to the nations who are strong on the sea but weaker on the land, and beneficial to those who are strong on land and weaker on the sea. No candid man can deny that it would have this effect; and if we adopt the policy merely for the purpose of injuring the one on the sea or of benefiting the one on the land, if we do it for the purpose of equalizing their effective war power, we might be charged with protruding ourselves into the conflict, and we should be guilty, as the Secretary suggested, of an unneutral act. We have no more moral right to do a lawful act for the purpose only of equalizing the belligerents' war effectiveness than we have to take war measures for that purpose.

The Secretary is also correct when he says that all the neutral nations have during all wars furnished belligerent nations with munitions of war. The Krupp Co., of Germany, has been a source of supply to all belligerents; so of the shipyards of Great Britain, the arms factories of France, and the armor-plate manufactories of the United States. Not only have war munitions been sold fully by all nations, but loans by financial institutions of neutral Governments have been made that munitions of war could be purchased by belligerents.

There is but one ground upon which we can lay this embargo, and that is that we ought in good morals to do it, ought to do it as a national policy to be followed hereafter.

I can conceive of a case where such a sudden change of old usages might be clearly unjust, and therefore unneutral. Take a case, for instance, where a great power fully prepared, armed, and provided with all war material necessary to destroy a smaller nation should make an aggressive war against it, and that this smaller power should be wholly unprepared, relying upon treaty rights and the general usage of trade relations to secure the means of defense by purchasing from us. Our refusal in such case, without previous notice or warning, might well be considered a most unfriendly and unneutral act. But no such condition confronts us here. All of these nations at war are great nations, all prepared to a great extent, all capable of manufacturing their own munitions of war. Of course, some may be especially strong in military power and others in naval power; and if the war should find one or the other deficient in any particular, its special strength in other particulars might hold the battle undecided until it could make good wherein it happened to be deficient.

While nations at war may properly have a right to take any steps that will weaken its adversary, it has no right to expect another nation to maintain without change any purely domestic policy because of its effect on its enemy. The United States, which is not responsible for this war, and which at its very inception offered its services as mediator, can not be placed in a position by those who were determined to battle wherein we may not modify our domestic laws in any manner that seems to us just or proper. Many nations of the world, to protect their food or other supplies while other nations are at war, even levy an export tax often in such amount as to make the exportation prohibitive. If our food supply was at all short and we had the power to prevent exports, we might well exercise that right to prevent a shortage of food. We could do the same in the matter of clothing. Of course, under our Constitution this country can not levy an export tax; but we would clearly have the authority if we thought the conditions would be beneficial to our country during this war to raise our tariffs against any country, even though such act might injure one particular belligerent country and be beneficial to another. No country has a right to complain of an act which is beneficial to our own citizens, even though it may not operate with the same favor or disfavor on other warring countries.

If we have a right to change our policy because of conditions brought about by the war, without charge of unfriendliness, how much greater is our right to depart from ancient usages for a great national principle when the enforcement of the principle works to our financial disadvantage. The fact that it does work to the disadvantage of our own people ought to overcome any presumption of intended unfairness.

I am not unaware, Mr. President, of the source, or possibly double source, from which petitions favoring the passage of this resolution generally emanate. It may be that from one source they represent an historical animosity, and from the other a strong sympathy for the Fatherland. But that does not change in any degree the justice of the proposition, and if the fact that many of our citizens have that sympathy can not be urged in favor of its passage, it certainly ought not to be urged against it. So, we are brought face to face with the question, Ought we to take this step as a protest against the arbitrament of arms as an advanced, enlightened, and Christian policy.

And right here, Mr. President, on the point that for the most part these petitions come from German-American citizens, I want to say a word. Undoubtedly a sense of injustice to the Germanic race may have intensified the interest which they have manifested in this subject; that their interest has been intensified because they have felt that the great press of the country has been very unfair to their Fatherland, unfair to German character, unfair to the German people. I do not refer so much to the discussions in the press as to the responsibility for this war, as I do to the charges of outrages and brutalities claimed to have been committed by German soldiers. These charges which filled columns of our press in the earlier stages of the war, combined with a general attitude of hostility, very naturally created a sense of resentment against what they knew to be a slander upon the German people.

As I have stated, Mr. President, none of us should forget for a single moment that we are Americans and Americans only, and no matter what our views may be as to the cause of this murderous conflict, or who may be responsible for it, our duty is to refrain from words of either condemnation or justification; and as Senators with great international questions of extreme delicacy to be met, while this conflict continues, we should be especially guarded in our every utterance concerning the war itself.

But, Mr. President, this ought not to close our lips when we believe that the sensibilities of a great portion of our citizenship have been unjustly wounded.

Mr. President, I have been surrounded by and lived with German people all my life, have sat by their side on the old benches of a country schoolhouse in earlier boyhood days, studied lessons from the same books, shared together the contents of our dinner baskets—I think generally to my advantage, as theirs always proved the German prodigality in that direction—played with them and sometimes fought with them, in which pleasant pastime they were always fair. In earlier manhood days they were my companions and friends; in business life, my clients and associates. I have known them in the fields, in the workshops, in the office, in all lines of commercial business, and in their homes; and for the past quarter of a century it has been my privilege to face one of them at the table of my own home, one who has presided over my household. I have always found them conscientious, generous, jovial, and hospitable; and we will search the world in vain for a more kind, tender, and sympathetic people. And, Mr. President, when anyone tells me that the German people as a people are cruel and brutal, that they strike off the hands of children and ruthlessly murder and maltreat helpless women, I will take the occasion to deny it and will join them in an earnest protest against such wholesale libels.

I know war is hell wherever it may be, and out of the millions battling in this conflict, forced to stern measures, with the fierceness of battle in their hearts, with ranks reeking with blood of friend and foe, there will necessarily be found many in both armies whose acts will bear the stamp of savagery. If we find murder and brutality, as we always do in every country, even in times of peace and tranquillity, when nothing abnormal stirs the blood, what may we reasonably expect in time of desperate and maddened carnage? It is the magnifying of these isolated cases of brutality into an indictment of a whole people, and only one of the contending armies, that shocks one's sense of justice and calls for earnest refutation.

I know, Mr. President, that the passage of this resolution will put this country on record for all time, and, to my mind, that is its principal virtue. But, Mr. President, it will be a record that points to peace and not to war, and as such; and believing that its passage can not be justly construed as either unjust or unneutral, I shall support it. And, Mr. President, I insist that this ship-purchase bill, paternalistic in form and socialistic in substance, breeder of bitter dissensions and controversy in the Senate, demanded by no party platform, and supported by no real emergency, ought to be laid aside long enough for the Senate to speak the American conscience on the subject of whether this great country shall indirectly traffic for profit in the blood of other people.

And so, Mr. President, I ask that this poor, misshapen child of chance, this ship-purchase bill, fathered by God knows whom, that came undesired into the world, born before its time, ripped from the reluctant womb of a struggling, screaming Democratic caucus, be given a gentle opiate and put to sleep in the arms of its foster mother, the Committee on Commerce, that we may bring to the front and vote upon the resolution prohibiting sale of munitions of war to every European belligerent.

Mr. President, there is one feature of this proposed ship-purchase legislation of far-reaching consequence to this country. It is most important and more or less perilous because of the controversies in which it is absolutely sure to entangle us with the belligerents now engaged in a death struggle in Europe. It is more important to us, as it compels us to adopt a policy which will just as surely come back to plague us in the future as it is certain that day will follow night. That feature is our attitude relative to the purchase of what we call interned ships of any one of the belligerents which may be offered for sale.

Of course, Mr. President, the word "interned" is not the proper term to apply to those ships. We might better say "imprisoned" ships. Whatever policy we adopt to-day with reference to such ships will bind us as an honorable and consistent Nation in according the same privilege to other great nations of the world, to other great neutral countries, in case we should be engaged in warfare with any power.

I can best present this situation by hypothetical questions.

Suppose this country were engaged in war against Great Britain; the other great nations of the world were neutral. We know that when two nations are battling against each other each seeks to strike at the weakest point of defense. Here, then, we would have our own country with full capacity and ability to produce within its own borders all the food products that would be necessary for the support of our vast population as well as our Army and Navy. We would be able to produce in this country all the cotton, all the wool necessary to clothe our people and our Army and Navy. We could produce in this country all the chemicals necessary for the manufacture of explosives. We could produce in this country all the copper necessary for the manufacture of shells or guns. We could produce all the coal and all the steel necessary to supply our war ships and armaments. We could produce all the oil and gasoline we could possibly use or need. In the matter of home supply we would be better situated than any other country in the world. With this home supply of everything needed in peace and in war our few merchant ships could be wiped off the seas and we would scarcely feel it. Our land batteries and our mined harbors could protect our war vessels if their inferiority in number should make it necessary for them to take advantage of the coast defenses.

Looking at the other side, we would find a country which must import three-fourths of the food necessary for the support of her congested population; practically all of the clothing material, boots, and shoes; practically everything that would be necessary for cavalry and the greater part of that which would be necessary to manufacture explosives, shells, and so forth. The very life of that nation would depend upon her being able with her fleet to keep open the avenues of trade. Her great merchant marine necessary to supply her demand, necessary in time of both peace and war, is a vital point of danger in time of conflict. It would be impossible for her to protect the vast number of ships necessary for her commerce against our cruisers which could be sent to every corner of the earth and threaten every sea spanned by her merchant marine.

It needs no great military or naval expert to demonstrate that this would be our mode of warfare in a conflict with Great Britain. It will be remembered that in the War of the Revolution American cruisers preying upon British commerce, forcing excessive insurance, did more than any other force to bring that country to terms of peace. We would strike straight at Britain's bread line in event of a war with that nation.

Let us then suppose further that American cruisers striking at this particular line should drive a British merchantman, loaded with grain from Russia, back into a Russian port, or that this merchantman should flee back to the port from which she had started, in order to escape capture; that then the Russian Government, or Russian citizens, if you please, should purchase this British vessel, thereby not only depriving our warships of the prey which they had trapped but supplying British citizens with the gold representing value of the ship to be used in defense or aggression against us; and not only this, Mr. President, but sending the very ship with the very cargo of wheat to a British port; or, if that should be dangerous, to a French port to be unloaded and reshipped across the narrow channel.

Of course, with the present world agreement upon the subject, cotton goods, wool, clothing not intended for the army, and food may pass freely, and thus the ship loaded with food which our cruisers had imprisoned could be sent back laden with food for the enemy, whose food line we were making a special effort to destroy.

What would the attitude of the United States be in such a contingency? Would we not vehemently protest against such an avoidance of every element of friendly neutrality? Would we not say to Russia: "At an enormous expense we have sent our warships across the Atlantic or into the Mediterranean to capture this very ship. Just at the moment when we have imprisoned that vessel you, by your act, release it and under your flag deprive us of our advantage."

Or, leaving Russia out of the question, suppose we would drive a British vessel or a dozen vessels, laden with grain, into an Argentine port. Argentina, which must export her wheat, finds it to her advantage to purchase these English vessels, and send them out laden with her grain, which may ultimately reach Great Britain. What would be the attitude of the United States in such a case? Why, Mr. President, if we would for a single moment adhere to such a policy as that we would deprive ourselves of our all-important means of warfare. The same hypothetical question might well be applied to a case of war with Japan.

Now, let me give you another far more important feature of the case than this: The Senator from Montana attempted to elucidate, the other day, that by not accepting the London agreement we would hold to a policy upon which we had insisted before that time, under which we insisted it to be the law that belligerent ships could be purchased in good faith just as freely as the goods in those ships, or any other noncontraband articles. Let me follow that up and see where it will land us. If that is the correct policy, then that ship can pass from hand to hand. Every important British, Japanese, and German vessel engaged in commerce is so constructed as to be convertible into a cruiser. Is not that true? Very well, then, suppose we have these English vessels in a Russian port. Now, according to the philosophy of the Senator from Montana, any Russian subject or the Russian Government can purchase those ships as freely as though they had not been driven to seek refuge in a neutral port. Very well, then, suppose a Russian subject should purchase this ship and send it laden with grain to Great Britain, as he would have a right to do under the present rules. Has not the one who bought the ship the same right to sell it? If the sale does not differ from a sale of a bale of cotton or a sack of wheat, it would be to his advantage, would it not, to sell that ship to the British Government or to a British citizen, who could sell it again to advantage to his Government, which would need it? Then when you have sold it to the British citizen and he has sold it to his Government, which covered it with armor, armed it with guns, and again sent it out against American commerce or to battle against us, what would be our attitude?

Do any of you believe that we ought to adopt a policy so dangerous to us in the future as would be that, and do any of you doubt for a single moment, Mr. President, that that policy would be the first one that we would repudiate if we ourselves were ever in a war?

When we had our Civil War we declared a blockade of the Southern States, and would not let a copper coin or a bushel of wheat or anything else go into that country. We seized and confiscated every ship that attempted to pass the blockade; and yet you ask us now to adopt a policy which, when we are at war with another nation and have practically imprisoned all of her great shipping, those vessels can be sold to a foreign country, to foreign citizens—to neutrals—and sent back to their own country, where they can be rearmed and again sent to assail this country. Mr. President, we had better hang just as close as we can to the London agreement if we are looking out for our own interests.

So two questions naturally arise: First, have we ever adopted that policy or conceded to a neutral such a right? Second, ought we to adopt it in the future? The argument of the Senator from Montana sought to show that we had adopted a policy of this kind—that the American claim and that the British policy had always admitted the right of a neutral to purchase the merchant vessels of a belligerent, not only before the beginning of the war but during its continuance, unhindered and unchecked by any rule other than that the purchase should be in good faith; and, as his argument would indicate, good faith consisted only in the fact of actual purchase, without any reversionary interest, mediate or immediate, in the original owner. While I read over his argument hurriedly, I nevertheless carefully scanned it for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not this country had ever adopted a policy or had ever insisted upon a policy that would make the belligerent vessel transferred during war, under the conditions which I have indicated, to a neutral country, exempt from seizure. While the context of the Senator's argument would indicate that the rule was absolute and unquestioned, the references given by him would, in my opinion, scarcely sustain such a contention.

It is difficult, Mr. President, to say with any degree of certainty just what has been the attitude of any country on the question of transfer of a belligerent vessel to a neutral flag. Each war has had its own peculiar conditions, its particular questions. The failure to insist on any prior doctrine held by a belligerent can not be safely taken to be a waiver. A doctrine or policy which in one war might be of very minor importance might become a matter of vital interest in another. In the one instance the breach of that doctrine by a neutral might be overlooked; in the other it might call for a most earnest protest, and for war itself if the belligerent could afford to add to its enemies. A country battling for life or liberty has always been allowed a fair degree of discretion by a neutral in the exercise of its judgment. Many acts of a belligerent in the stress of conflict are overlooked which would not for a moment be tolerated in times of peace. The rapid development of the science of war, the annihilation of space by modern invention, the changed process of commerce, and the relation of nation to nation necessitate a correspondingly rapid evolution in the code of laws relating to the duties, rights, and obligations of belligerents and neutrals. It behooves any nation, therefore, to exercise great caution in either adopting or enforcing a policy which might very speedily be found to be dangerous to itself; and we might well commend the cautious attitude observed by the former Secretary of State, now senior Senator from New York, when he avoided in his instructions to our delegates to the London conference questions that might put us on record and tie our hands where it was not necessary to do so.

What we want to get at, Mr. President, is what has been the general understanding of the great nations of the world on the subject of the transfer of a belligerent vessel which has been driven to shelter into a neutral port by the enemy's ships—which has crossed in safety the 3-mile dead line, over which the merchant vessel may pass but the war craft may never follow. And what is the present international understanding concerning the duty of neutrals toward such imprisoned vessel? There never has been, nor is there at the present time, any international agreement having the binding force of a treaty on the subject. So far each nation has made its own laws and enforced them through its own prize courts. So far each nation has been governed by a code designed to meet its own requirements, limited only by its necessity to maintain peace with neutral nations. It is not, therefore, strange that the rules of conduct should be rather chaotic and uncertain.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, similarity of conditions and consensus of opinion on natural rights have been sufficiently numerous and potent to insure a general similarity of conduct on the part of warring and neutral nations toward each other which we may properly denominate international law or custom.

And, first, what has been that law in the past? The Senator from Montana declares his view of it in the following words of his address on January 28:

> It is that a neutral nation may trade with either belligerent, except in contraband. The neutral may buy anything from the belligerent. If property of a citizen of a belligerent nation is sold and transferred to a citizen of a neutral country, it is his, and as much entitled to be regarded as his, as much entitled to protection and to immunity as though he had produced it in his own country or acquired it from a fellow citizen.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for a question.

Mr. STERLING. I would like to ask the Senator, first, if it is not a pretty broad statement, in the face of the language of the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Field, in the case of the United States against the Etta, where the rule seems to be somewhat different. The court, after speaking of the French and Russian practice, refers to that in the United States and England, and says:

> In England, however, the validity of such purchases have been sustained not, however, without much discussion and some hesitation of opinion. They are allowed to be legal, but obnoxious to such suspicion, and courts will always deem it to be their duty to look into them with great jealousy.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, Mr. President; but the Senator will find that even in those cases on which you look with such just suspicion, they will apply to a line of cases where the transfer at least was before the vessel had been driven into a port and the flag had been transferred. Here the vessel is on the ocean; it is flying the flag of an enemy, a belligerent, not the flag of a neutral, as in those cases, or that vessel is practically imprisoned, imprisoned while it has the flag of the enemy flying above it, and the transfer is made after that. It makes a very much stronger case than even that, which is looked upon with great suspicion by the courts.

Mr. STERLING. I agree with the Senator thoroughly in that position, but this is as far as the court has gone in any case.

Mr. McCUMBER. And I purpose to go further, to show that by the very authorities presented by the Senator from Montana no such broad rule has been laid down; that the case he has cited is one of an instruction to the Admiralty of Great Britain in cases where they find a vessel at sea with a neutral flag, not a vessel at sea with a belligerent flag, floating over it.

The Senator from Montana bases this most broad and sweeping conclusion upon a paragraph in a manual prepared by Thomas Erskine Holland in 1888, by the authority of the Lord Commissioner of Admiralty, as follows:

> A vessel apparently owned by a neutral is not really so owned if acquired by a transfer from an enemy, or from a British or allied subject, made at any time during the war, or previous to the war but in contemplation of its breaking out, unless there is satisfactory proof that the transfer was bona fide and complete. (Holland, par. 53, p. 17.)

Mr. President, neither this paragraph nor the long list of instructions following it will bear out so broad a conclusion as that reached by the Senator. All that can be claimed from this paragraph is that a transfer of a belligerent merchant vessel can be made either before hostilities begin or during hostilities if there is satisfactory evidence that the transfer is made in good faith.

A very casual reading of this paragraph, taken in connection with the instructions which follow it, will show that they are given to guide the naval officers in cases where a vessel is overtaken at sea, a merchant vessel bearing a neutral flag, but which had at some previous time been the property of a citizen or subject of an enemy.

I wish the Senators to bear in mind that these are instructions that are to guide the British warships when they seize vessels bearing a neutral flag where the transfer had been made before that time. All of them admit that you can not make a transfer at sea. Why not? What is the reason? If it is a matter of good faith, why can you not make a transfer at sea just as well as you can in port? The reason is clear. It is because the presumption is conclusive, then, that it was done to escape the natural consequences of an enemy vessel, the natural dangers of an enemy vessel, to escape from the consequences of war. Will not the same rule hold if you find a vessel at sea flying an enemy's flag, and you drive it before you, and it is able to cross the dead line—the 3-mile limit—before the warship overtakes it? The reason is the same—that any transfer then will be conclusively held to be to escape the natural consequences of either capture or imprisonment; either to remain there or to get out and be captured. I read now these instructions:

In the event of such a transfer being alleged, the commander should call for the bill of sale and also for any papers or correspondence relating to the same. If the bill of sale is not forthcoming, and its absence is unaccounted for, he should detain the vessel. If the bill of sale is produced, its contents should be carefully examined, especially in the following particulars:

(a) The name and residence of the vendor.
(b) The name and residence of the purchaser.
(c) The place and date of the purchase.
(d) The consideration money and the receipt.
(e) The terms of the sale.
(f) The service of the vessel and the name of the master, both before and after the transfer.

The name and residence of the vendor are material to show whether or not he was an enemy.

The name and residence of the purchaser are material to show whether or not he was a person resident in British, allied, or neutral territory.

The date and place of the purchase are material to show whether or not the transfer was made in contemplation or in consequence of the war.

The consideration money is material, in case the vessel is alleged to have been transferred by sale, to show whether or not the transaction was bona fide; for if the transaction was professedly a sale, then the fact that the consideration was nominal or wholly inadequate would be a just cause for suspicion. But a transfer by way of gift or bequest will, if bona fide and complete, be as valid as a transfer by way of sale.

The receipt for the purchase money should be called for in case the vessel is alleged to have been transferred by sale; but if there is proof that the sale was bona fide and in other respects complete, the transfer will be good, although no receipt is forthcoming, and even though the purchase money has not in fact been paid, for the prize court does not consider any lien which an enemy vendor may have upon a vessel or cargo or freight for unpaid purchase money to be a subsisting enemy's interest rendering the vessel liable to confiscation. However, the fact that the purchase money, instead of having been paid in cash, has only been carried to an account will raise the presumption of the transfer being merely colorable, and such presumption can be rebutted only by clear proof to the contrary.

The terms of the sale are material to show whether the transfer was complete. The transfer would not be complete if the sale was not absolute, as if it contained a power of revocation, or a condition for a return of the vessel at the close of the war, or a reservation of the profits of the vessel, or of any control over her to be left in the hands of the former owner.

The service of the vessel and the name of the master, both before and after the transfer, are material to show whether or not the transfer be a genuine one, for if the service has continued unaltered by the transfer the commander will be justified in holding the transfer to be colorable only. The fact that the same master is retained in command after the transfer raises a suspicion, but standing alone will not be conclusive that the transfer was not bona fide.

If the transfer is bona fide and complete as between the parties, the fact that it was effected in fraud of the revenue or the law of the mercantile marine of any foreign country will be immaterial.

If the purchase was made through an agent, the letters of procuration should be called for.

You will see this is a case where the transfer has been made before the neutral flag is raised.

The main point to substantiate this which was presented the other day was to show that a vessel during war, as at any time, could be transferred to a neutral flag if the transfer was made for a valuable consideration and all the title and interest of the vendor passed to the vendee. You can see from the reading of it that it is nothing more than instruction given in a case where a vessel flying a neutral flag, and therefore presumed to be neutral, was transferred before it was seized would be held to be in good faith if transferred for a good consideration and no title therein retained by the seller. Any Senator can easily observe a vast distinction between this and one in which the vessel changes its flag after it has been pursued at sea or after it has been driven into the port of a neutral.

Mr. President, I especially call attention to the fact that these instructions cover cases where the Admiralty finds a vessel actually in the possession of a neutral and flying the neutral flag when intercepted. That is very different from a case where the belligerent war vessel finds a belligerent merchant vessel flying a belligerent flag, gives chase to that vessel, which makes its escape only by dodging into a neutral port which, by the law of nations, can not be entered by the belligerent war vessel. The question which I wish to get clearly before the Senate is, Can a neutral nation or its citizens or subjects, under the conditions last mentioned, proceed to purchase this merchant vessel, pay the full price to its owner, put it back into active service between the neutral and the previous home of the vessel and be clearly within neutral rights? If the neutral nation can do this, at what time can she do it? Is there any limit of time or circumstance? Suppose in this day of radiotelegraphy a warship locates a merchant vessel of its enemy a hundred miles away and a chase to overtake the merchant vessel before she can arrive at any port is begun. Could a sale for a full and fair consideration actually paid, with the bona fide intention of both seller and purchaser that every right, title, and interest of the vendor shall pass to the vendee, and followed by the hoisting of a neutral flag, save that vessel from capture and condemnation? If the broad rule laid down in the language quoted from the speech of the Senator from Montana prevailed, that could be done, because in defining the rights of a neutral nation he declares that the neutral may buy anything from the belligerent, and if the transfer is in good faith it is as much entitled to immunity as though the property had been acquired in the country of purchase and from a citizen of that country.

But, Mr. President, I do not believe that any one can or will concede the right of a belligerent to sell a threatened vessel during actual war for the undoubted purpose of escaping imminent capture. No one can claim that.

I am conceding fully the right of a neutral to purchase the merchant vessels of a belligerent in the due and ordinary course of business, even during hostilities, and I am further admitting that the mere fact that danger in navigating such ship operated as the controlling motive for the sale, or that the sale was for less than original value because of that danger, would not operate to make the sale mala fides.

They could do all that, I admit, under the old rule held by this country and Great Britain.

I am attempting to clearly distinguish between sales of merchant vessels by a belligerent to a neutral during war in the ordinary course of business from sales of escaping or imprisoned belligerent vessels.

If you admit that a pursued enemy vessel could not become, even by full purchase price, a neutral vessel during pursuit, then the question arises, At what particular time or event does the right to sell obtain?

Suppose the vessel reaches the 3-mile limit in safety and enters a neutral port, and the enemy cruiser waits outside, waits weeks or months, such waiting operating to imprison the vessel. Can the neutral nation take her out of that imprisonment and put her back into trade with the very country from which she came?

Or, in other words, suppose the imprisoned vessel is worth several millions of dollars. Then that many dollars in value of ship and the value of the commerce of that vessel have been bottled up by the enemy warship. Now, can the neutral country proceed, first, to pay the full value of the vessel over to the belligerent, thereby saving the belligerent from all financial loss; and then, in addition to that, give the belligerent the value of the commerce of that ship? I, of course, mean commerce in noncontraband goods. If that can be done, then a country neutral in effect can be exceedingly unneutral in act. She can render nugatory very many important war measures adopted by either belligerent.

I want to be right on this subject. I want the country to be right. I want this country to adopt a position to-day that it not only can, but will, defend to-morrow. A little, weak nation may be justified in its struggle to defend itself against great, overpowering nations in being inconsistent. Shiftiness on its part may be overlooked. But a great, powerful country like the United States can not afford to follow such a course, can not afford to give such a lesson to its people. Let our course to-day in this respect be adopted with great foresight and consideration. And let it be adopted with a view to the requirements of this country, should it ever become engaged in war with a great country, one which would tax not only its military strength and power, but its statesmanship and diplomacy in dealing with neutrals during that war.

I think the Senator quoted decisions and text-writer authorities which fully bear out his contention that the British rule has been not only that the belligerent vessels could be purchased during war by a neutral, but that they could be purchased either before or during war in either the ports of the belligerent or the ports of the neutral.

That there may remain no doubt as to the English rule, I quote from Third Phillimore's International Law, page 735, the author of which work was an eminent practitioner before the admiralty court in prize cases and later a judge thereof, the following:

In respect to the transfers of enemies' ships during war, it is certain that purchases of them by neutrals are not, in general, illegal; but such purchases are liable to great suspicion; and if good proof be not given of their validity by a bill of sale and payment of a reasonable consideration it will materially impair the validity of the neutral claim.

Then, Mr. President, he gives a long statement of the opinions of the lords of the privy council in the case of the Baltica and also in other cases. I will consider a few of them without asking them to be reprinted, as the Senator had already put it in the RECORD, and I do not wish to duplicate it. I especially call attention to the words "sale in the ordinary course of business." Dr. Lushington, in his opinion in the Baltica case, says:

The great principle by which I am to be guided in this inquiry is whether there is a transaction such as would accord with the ordinary course of trade, by which I mean not the purchase of this particular ship per se, for no one can doubt that this ship would not have been sold, and certainly not for the price, save for apprehension of the war; but whether independently of that motive, the transaction itself, the mode of sale, and of payment was accordant with the ordinary custom of merchants during peace.

There is the rule. Is it consonant with the ordinary course of merchants during peace? During peace a merchant may buy a merchant vessel in a foreign port or in his own port, he may buy it on the sea or anywhere else, but is it in the ordinary course of business for him to buy a vessel which is being chased down by a cruiser or which has been imprisoned? That, to my mind, is an extraordinary case of purchase and not the ordinary course between merchants in the sale of a vessel.

I can hardly conceive that the sale of a vessel fleeing from its pursuers, or practically bottled up and imprisoned by its pursuers, is in accord with the ordinary custom of merchants during peace.

It may be said that the opinion of the court in the Minerva case, cited by the Senator from Montana, meets this point. I think not. The Minerva case was not one of that kind. But the court, in the course of its opinion, said what I shall read, and I call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the mere dictum of the court upon a matter not involved in the question:

There have been cases of merchant vessels—

Mark you, there have been cases of merchant vessels—driven into ports out of which they could not escape, and they are sold, in which, after much discussion and some hesitation of opinion, the validity of the purchase has been sustained.

It will be noted here how carefully worded is this statement. There is no claim that this is the law; on the other hand, it is clearly indicated that such holding was an extreme holding. The court does not declare this to be the law. Had it so viewed the case the expression would have been very different. Undoubtedly there have been very few cases of this kind. Had the commercial world understood the right of a neutral to extend that far, there would undoubtedly have been in all the late wars thousands of cases of that kind.

The court calendars would have been congested with such cases, because every pursued vessel that could have gotten into a port would have been sold in that port; and yet in all the wars that we have had in the last 50 years we can find nothing of that kind, not a single case, in which merchants have dared to take the chance to purchase or the belligerent felt that he had the right to sell. The fact that there have been none of late years, or at least none which I have run across, is a most persuasive argument that the concensus of opinion of the maritime nations of the world has been that such purchases would not accord with a neutral attitude.

Nor, Mr. President, do I find anything in the communication made by our Secretary of State, Mr. Cushing, under date of August 7, 1854, that goes further than to merely indicate both the American and British rule that ships could be purchased by neutrals from belligerents in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, whether before or after the outbreak of hostilities. That is the only subject discussed by him in that communication, and he asserts the general right of neutrals as held by these two countries. I think it proper to quote a portion of this opinion for the purpose of elucidation.

The exercise of commerce by every nation is one of the incidents of its sovereignty. The sovereign rights of a particular nation are not to cease whenever any two other nations choose to go to war. The neutral State is to conduct impartially between the belligerents, but its commerce remains free with respect to them and to each of them. That commerce is without limitation saving only the restrictions as to contraband of war and places beseiged, blockaded, or invested, and thus restricted it extends in principle—to all the possible objects of mercantile intercourse.

Mark the words "in principle"—

No Government has a right to contest the validity of the sale of a ship on the pretense of its having been at one time belligerent property. To undertake to do this is to usurp a jurisdiction over the business of other nations; it is to derogate from their independence. (6 Op., 642.)

I again ask you to observe a limitation expressed in the first paragraph:

That commerce is without limitation saving only the restriction as to contraband of war and places beseiged, blockaded, or invested.

In a letter of October 8, 1855, Mr. Cushing makes a further limitation in which he says:

They agree unanimously that the bona fide sale of the vessels of belligerents to neutrals in time of war is lawful and valid unless made in transitu.

One would naturally ask himself why there should be any distinction between sale in transitu and sale at either port. If the sale is actually in good faith, if the money is actually paid, if there is no reservation in favor of the vendor, what earthly difference can there be in principle between a sale in port and a sale at sea? The reason which makes that distinction is founded upon a theory that must apply with greater force and cogency to a pursued or imprisoned vessel. The reason a sale at sea has not been recognized is that, nothstanding the elements of bona fides of transfer in respect to bill of sale, valuable consideration, and complete passing of title, there is a presumption that the sale was made to avoid capture by the enemy.

And if that means anything it must mean that, notwithstanding the other elements of bona fides, a sale made to avoid capture or to avoid imprisonment, a condition which is analogous to capture, must also be conclusively held to be void.

Thus it may be said that prior to the London conference in 1908 the law of both the United States and Great Britain recognized a sale of a belligerent merchant vessel either before war and in anticipation of it or after the declaration, made in good faith, whether the vessel was purchased in the foreign port or in the port of the neutral, but that a sale of a vessel at sea during hostilities was conclusively presumed to be void; second, that French and Russian laws denied the right of a belligerent nation to dispose of its vessels of commerce to any neutral; third, this also seems to have been the German view; fourth, that both the American and British law denied the right of sale of a belligerent vessel at sea during the continuance of war, and had formulated no definite rule on the right of a neutral nation to purchase a belligerent vessel driven by the enemy into its ports or imprisoned by the enemy's war vessels in that port. It may be possible that there are cases or that the words used by those who have spoken with authority on the subject may sustain the right of the neutral to purchase a vessel which is practically blockaded in its harbor by war vessels waiting without the neutral zone.

That may be said to be the status of the laws of this country and of the other great countries of the world, conflicting though they be, at the time of the meeting of the London conference in December, 1908.

The question now arises, Has there been a modification of the old law on this subject since the meeting of that conference, and are we morally or otherwise bound by the principal declarations of that conference? And I might well add, whether bound or not, should we make the leading declarations of the London agreement our policy in this and future wars—a policy which we can apply as consistently when its rules may be against our interest as we can when we should suddenly find them of immense value to us?

The following nations took part in the London conference: Germany, the United States, Austria-Hungary, Spain, France, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Russia.

In order to have a fair basis for the deliberation of the conference on the question of change of flag each nation presented its own views as to what should be the law on the subject.

I thought I had with me some quotations I wished to use here, but I do not find them. However, I can give them in a general way. Taking them up, Mr. President, by the several countries, it will be first observed that the American delegates, being extremely cautious, presented no memorandum on the subject at all. That was referred to a short time ago by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Montana in their discussion.

GERMANY.

The memorandum of this great naval and commercial power declared that a vessel carrying a neutral flag may nevertheless be treated as the vessel of an enemy if it carried the enemy's flag up to the outbreak of hostilities or within two weeks immediately preceding. In other words, the German position was that any transfer of the vessel of a belligerent to a neutral during war or within a period of two weeks antedating such war should not be recognized.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

This country declared it to be the custom of nearly all nations that the sale of an enemy vessel made during a voyage or after hostilities have broken out can not prevent the capture of the ship, which should continue to be regarded as an enemy. It then quotes paragraph 26 of the Institute of International Law at its meeting in Turin as a satisfactory solution. This paragraph recognized a sale made during war if made in good faith and not in the course of her voyage.

So it might be stated that Austria-Hungary had practically adopted the English view.

SPAIN.

This Government deemed acceptable paragraph 7 of the memoranda of the cabinet of London declaring that when the change of the flag of a ship corresponds to an actual transfer of ownership, its validity will be recognized; but if it is impelled by a desire to avoid by fraud the risks which nowadays exist for hostile private property in case of maritime war, it must be deemed a nullity.

FRANCE.

This country adhered to its ancient doctrine that "the change of nationality of maritime ships made subsequent to the declaration of war is null and void."

GREAT BRITAIN.

The memorandum of this country declared that the transfer, either by sale or gift, to a neutral of a hostile ship is not made invalid merely by reason of the fact that it took place during or in anticipation of hostilities, but that such transfer was not valid if it took place during a voyage or in a blockaded port.

ITALY.

The Italian memorandum seemed not to be clear, but the conclusion was that according to Italian positive law the sale of an enemy vessel to a neutral purchaser subsequent to the outbreak of hostilities was presumed to be fictitious, and as such could not be recognized, but that the secretary of the navy might recognize a bona fide sale.

JAPAN.

This country also recognized the transfer of the ownership of a vessel during or in anticipation of war by an enemy state.

THE NETHERLANDS.

The memorandum of this country recognized the validity of a transfer of a merchant vessel from the flag of a belligerent to the flag of a neutral during or at the outbreak of hostilities without any restriction except where the transfer was made in a blockaded port or coast.

RUSSIA.

This country has asserted the right of a belligerent to decline to acknowledge the neutral character of any merchant vessel purchased by neutral persons from an enemy State before war or before the purchaser was aware of the outbreak of hostilities.

From the printed remarks it seems to me that all these nations which presented memoranda agreed—that the transfer of a vessel for the purpose of evading the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed is not admissible.

In other words, they all agreed that a pursued belligerent vessel flying a belligerent flag, finding an asylum in a neutral port, or imprisoned there, could not be sold.

The statements of the representatives of these several countries throw much light not only upon what the law had been but what they in time of peace, uninfluenced by the passions and prejudices of war, considered should govern the maritime nations if war should ensue. They were in position then to consider the universal equities and justice of any proposition, a consideration which they could not give when engaged in actual warfare. What they then said is far more important with us than what any of them now say.

Quoting from page 11 of extracts from the proceedings of this conference I give the German view:

The German delegation pointed out that there is no general rule on this subject; that it would like to see the provisions of the German memoranda adopted; but in case the commission should not share this view, it proposed the insertion of the following article as article 35a:

"ART. 35a. Such illicit intention is presumed when the transfer occurred after the outbreak of hostilities. On the other hand, the good faith of the contracting parties is presumed when the transfer was made before the outbreak of hostilities."

There being such a wide difference between the American and the German view, the president asked the American delegation to submit a new draft which would reconcile their differences, and the American delegation agreed to do so.

The British delegation read a proposition which corresponds with what I have already designated the British position.

On December 18, 1908, Herr Kriege, the German representative, explained how this question should, in his opinion, be treated in the basis for discussion:

An explanation was made of the conditions which had led to the use of the word "escape" in rule 35, of the basis for discussion where the word "evade" would, perhaps, be preferable as conveying more clearly the idea of a transaction of doubtful genuineness. The president remarked that the situation demanded a compromise and that all seemed agreed on the fundamental principle. The new British article 35, in his opinion, provided nothing more than a general rule, too vague and without direct application. He proposed that it be suggested to the drafting committee to which articles 35, 36, and 37 would be sent that it begin by drawing up distinct rules for transfers before and transfers after the outbreak of hostilities. If a general rule were needed, it could be formulated later.

This suggestion was accepted by the American delegation, whose proposed amendment had no other object than to bring the draft into accordance with treaties in force between the United States and other powers.

At the ninth session, of February 19, the British delegation proposed a new text of rules relating to change of flag, the second provision of which reads:

The transfer of an enemy's vessel to a neutral flag after the outbreak of hostilities is valid if it is proved that such transfer was not made to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed.

Germany, through Mr. Kriege, insisted that the words "good faith," used in connection with a transfer after hostilities began, should be made clear and definite as to their meaning.

Mr. President, the manuscript to which I refer is entitled "Transfer of flag," which is made up of extracts from the proceedings of the International Conference, London, 1908, and of the Institute of International Law, 1882 and 1913. I read from page 15 of this pamphlet:

The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag after the outbreak of hostilities is valid if it is proved that such transfer was not made to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed.

The statement of Mr. Kriege is as follows:

I wish to call the attention of the commission to a difference which seems to exist between the proposition of the United States of America on the one hand and the propositions of Great Britain and Germany on the other hand.

Mr. President, I especially call attention to the fact that Germany and Great Britain are practically supporting the same view, with the exception that the German delegates desired that the words "good faith" should be made definite and certain. Mr. Kriege continued:

The question turns on the meaning of the term "good faith." All three propositions agree in requiring that the transfers effected during or immediately before a war should be made in good faith, but it seems that, in the view of the American delegation, good faith would be present if the agreement for the transfer was genuine and final and contained no pretense or irregularity. On the other hand, the German and British propositions mean by good faith that the intention to protect the ship from capture should not have been among the motives for the sale.

That is a most important feature. To continue:

In the sense in which "good faith" is used in these propositions, as in the original test of rule 35 of the basis for discussion, a transfer would be null and void if it had been induced by a desire on the part of the seller to protect himself from the loss which confiscation of his ship would inflict upon him; on the other hand, the transfer would be valid if there was reason to believe that it would have taken place just the same if war had not broken out or been imminent.

Mr. President, that was the German and the British idea of good faith of transfer.

Mr. KENYON. That was at the London conference?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. Mr. President, I continue to read from the views of Mr. Kriege:

It seems to me that this latter view of the question is the one which should be adopted. By so doing we should preserve rule 35 of the basis for discussion as it now appears in the summary. We should add to it the presumptions juris tantum of good faith before the outbreak of hostilities and bad faith thereafter. In this way we should preserve the conclusive presumptions of rule 37 of the original text as well as the other conclusive presumption proposed in Nos. 37 and 37a of the British proposition. The majority of the committee did not accept this consequence, and accordingly favored an unequivocal formula. The following was adopted:

"The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag effected before the outbreak of hostilities is valid, unless it is proved that such transfer was made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed."

Mr. President, this rule was finally adopted. The whole matter is embodied in chapter 5 of the London agreement.

On this subject the commission having this particular phase in charge presented to the conference a report. Among other things in this report they say:

The simplest solution would be to make a sharp distinction between the period preceding and the period following the outbreak of hostilities. In the former period the commercial interest would prevail and all changes regularly made from a legal point of view would be supported and respect of them required of the belligerents. In the latter period, on the contrary, the interests of the belligerents would have greater weight and all changes might be considered null and void by the belligerents whose right of capture they would interfere with.

If that means anything, Mr. President, it means that a neutral nation ought not, after war has been declared, purchase an interned vessel, an imprisoned vessel, and thereby interfere with the right of capture.

The report on pages 17 to 20 of the pamphlet Transfer of Flag is most interesting and instructive in showing the gradual coalescing of ideas which were in the beginning somewhat antagonistic.

On page 18 we find this declaration:

Considering the mere interpretation of law, it would seem as if a prize court, confronted by the above-stated proposition, would deem the transfer to be valid the moment the requirements of law had been fulfilled, and would not take the stand of the captor in appreciating whether there was good or bad faith. The majority of the committee did not accept this consequence, and accordingly favored an unequivocal formula. The following was adopted:

"The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag effected before the outbreak of hostilities is valid unless it is proved that such transfer was made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed."

This was the rule finally adopted.

The whole matter is embodied in chapter 5 of the London agreement. This agreement is signed for Germany by Kriege, for the United States by C. H. Stockton and George Grafton Wilson, for Austria-Hungary by C. Dumba, for France by L. Renault, for Great Britain by Desart, for the Netherlands by J. A. Roell and D. H. Ruyssenaers.

So it appears, Mr. President, that on the 26th day of February, 1909, the delegates of 10 leading nations of the world, men specially selected for their fitness to consider the great questions there discussed, men who not only knew what the law of nations was on the subject of transfer of a vessel from a belligerent to a neutral flag, but also what that law should be, met, pondered over, discussed, and debated, and finally formulated a set of rules to guide the enlightened judgment of maritime nations of the world on the rights of both neutrals and belligerents in case of war, to the end that when war should break out the world might have some standard other than the whim or necessity of any belligerent or sympathizing or hostile neutral to guide and limit their actions.

I want to call attention to a most significant fact—a paragraph contained in that agreement. It is the very first paragraph of the instrument. It reads as follows, and is quite important to any Senator who wants to get at the meat of the agreement and just exactly what the American delegates did, because this statement is signed by the American delegates:

> The signatory powers are agreed that the rules contained in the following chapters correspond in substance with the generally recognized principles of international law.

Mr. President, every nation that signed this agreement said by the signature of its agent that these rules substantially embodied the generally recognized international law on the subject. Our delegates may have exercised the right to contend that a different rule should prevail, but they by their signature also said that these were substantially the generally recognized rules of international law.

Now, what is one of these rules? It is embodied in article 56, and is as follows:

> The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag, effected after the outbreak of hostilities, is void unless it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed.

Can any one for a moment claim that the change of ownership of a pursued vessel or an interned vessel is not made to evade the consequences to which it is, as an enemy vessel, exposed?

It might be well here to pause a moment to observe who are the delegates who made that declaration. What are their special qualifications? Were they a body of men learned in the law of nations and especially qualified in reference to the law of naval warfare?

Taking the nations in the order of their signature to this agreement, we have:

Germany: M. Kriege, privy councilor of legation and legal adviser to the department of foreign affairs, member of the permanent court of arbitration.

United States: Rear Admiral Charles H. Stockton, retired, and Mr. George Grafton Wilson, professor at Brown University, lecturer on international law at the Naval War College and at Harvard University, plenipotentiary delegate.

Austria-Hungary: M. Constantin Theodore Dumba, privy councilor of His Imperial Majesty and envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary.

Spain: M. Gabriel Maura y Gamazo, member of Parliament.

France: M. Louis Renault, minister plenipotentiary, professor of the faculty of law at Paris, legal adviser to the ministry of foreign affairs, member of the Institute of France, and member of the permanent court of arbitration.

Great Britain: The Earl of Desart, King's proctor.

Italy: M. Guido Fusinato, councilor of state, member of Parliament, ex-minister of public instructions, and member of the permanent court of arbitration.

Japan: Baron Toshiatsu Sakamoto, vice admiral, head of the department of naval instruction; M. Yamaza, councilor of the imperial embassy at London.

Netherlands: J. A. Roell, aid-de-camp to the Queen in extraordinary service, vice admiral retired, and ex-minister of marine; L. H. Ruyssenaers, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, and ex-secretary general of the permanent court of arbitration.

Russia: Baron Taube, doctor of laws, councilor to the imperial ministry of foreign affairs, professor of international law of the University at St. Petersburg.

Now, Mr. President, it was all of these men, signing the instrument in the name of their respective Governments, who declared at the very outset of the instrument:

> The signatory powers are agreed that the rules contained in the following chapters correspond in substance with the generally recognized principles of international law.

Of course we are not legally or contractually bound to follow these rules. No other nation is compelled to do so, but believing that these rules do embody what is and what ought to be the law, every one of them, so far as I know, has accepted these rules substantially. They may have added to them or modified them in some way, but this particular clause concerning the transfer of the flag has not been modified by any of them.

Have we by any other act declared this London agreement to be or to conform to the American idea of what should be the international law?

Mr. President, what this Nation has said in times past on this mooted question through its Department of State is most important as an explanation of any present contention. But when we want to get any nation's present policy in this period of marvelous evolution, we are more interested in obtaining the nation's last declaration of policy. And, Mr. President, in a self-governing Nation like ours we want to get the expression, not of the executive, but of that branch of the Government whose final declaration is conclusive and binding on both executive and judiciary. We want to know what the Government has said through its representative, through that body of Congress which, under our Constitution, is especially charged with the duty of declaring through treaty or agreement the relations of this country with other nations of the world.

The last declaration of the Senate of the United States, whether expressed in a mere Senate resolution or in the adoption of an agreement on its part, may well be taken to be the declared view and policy of the United States.

On the 24th day of April, 1912, the Senate of the United States declared its adherence to the London agreement as the international law on this subject. And so, Mr. President, I say we should be bound morally, not contractually, to the view which we have declared should be the policy of all Governments. Under these circumstances we can not be consistently heard to say that, because we may reap some advantage, because we can buy an interned ship cheaper than we can buy one in time of peace, because we need that interned ship in our business, we shall abandon what we have said should be the national policy.

There is another reason, Mr. President, which may become vital to us in any future war, why this rule, practically held by all Europe, should also be the rule of the United States. I have spoken of the rapid evolution not only in commerce itself, in naval warfare, but also in respect to the liberalization of traffic in goods not contraband with an enemy. The old rule was that any goods intended for the use of the enemy for its sustenance could be confiscated. This rule has been modified of late so that it allows goods not contraband to enter the ports of a belligerent, even though those ports be invested by the war vessels of an enemy. We are interested that this new rule should not be annulled by the warring parties. I think no one will doubt the right of one country to declare a blockade of another's ports. We certainly did that in the Civil War, and we compelled the nations of the world to respect our blockade. The blockading nation would have the right to declare that no goods of any character should enter into the enemy's ports. Do we want that practice to be reinstated? If we can purchase an imprisoned ship from a belligerent and put it right back into the channels of trade with the belligerent, will not the investing nation be compelled to declare again the old policy of refusing to allow any character of merchandise to enter the ports of the blockaded belligerent? And would not such reinstatement of the old policy, the old law of blockade, offset many times over the benefits to be derived by the purchaser of the interned vessel, either by the neutral or the country from which the vessel was purchased?

There is another feature of this question of the right of a neutral nation to purchase an interned vessel and put it back in trade with the country from which it was purchased. If we maintain the right of any nation, or its people, to purchase and put back into commerce an interned vessel, provided only that the transfer is in good faith, for a valuable consideration, without respect to whether the transfer is superinduced by the fact that with the belligerent flag it is subject to seizure, we must concede the right of the owner to resell the same vessel under like conditions. Then a merchant vessel which has been interned could be purchased by a neutral, loaded with goods not contraband, and sent back to the ports of the country whose flag had previously floated over it, and by the owner resold immediately to its original owners, of course, for a valuable consideration, and immediately converted into a cruiser and sent out as a warship from that nation.

Again, I illustrate this phase by supposing that 10 years from to-day we should be engaged in a war with Great Britain, Japan, or Germany; that any one of the vessels which we drive into a neutral port could be purchased by the neutral country, put into commerce in uncontraband goods with the particular power with which we were at war, sold again in the port of that country for a valuable consideration and immediately converted into a warship to do battle against us. Let us pause before we bind this country, hand and foot, to such a doctrine. No other nation recognizes it. Germany does not recognize it, though it might be of slight benefit to her now, but of actual loss to her if her enemies should put in force the old rule against any goods entering her ports, which they could do without violating belligerent rights. Both countries in the end would be losers. If we want to be perfectly fair to all of these countries at war, let us not be attempting to help one out by buying her interned vessels and assisting the other by sending to her munitions of war. Let us refuse to do both, and neither of them would have either the legal or the moral right to complain.

Mr. President, nine of the great nations of the Old World, the most important of whom are now in a war with each other, have adopted article 56 as their policy to govern them during this war. Germany, England, France, Russia, and Austria have all adopted it, and we, through the treaty-making power of the Government, have declared it to be our policy. These nations took us at our word. They did not wish in this conflict to run counter to the last expression made by this Government on the subject. France and Russia abandoned their old doctrine that a transfer of an enemy ship to a neutral during war should be held absolutely void to conform to the London declaration and to our declaration that such transfer might be made, provided it was not done to evade the consequence to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed. What position are we in to crawfish out of that declaration of the Senate of the United States, a declaration which we have approved as our policy, to evade it for a little present financial gain during this war, only to reassert it at the end of the war? Knowing Germany's position, if we now purchase a British vessel and Germany torpedoes it, what will our answer be? There can be no consistent answer.

Mr. President, I have not been frightened at all concerning the danger to any ship flying the American colors that such ship might be sunk. I have never concerned myself very much about a British or a German merchant vessel sending up the Stars and Stripes to escape an enemy.

I can not understand why, if it is perfectly fair in war for a war vessel to approach its enemy by hoisting the enemy's flag or a neutral flag, and be enabled thereby to destroy that enemy's vessels, a merchant vessel, which has not a gun, which has lives to save, can not use this little ruse to escape a war vessel. I have no doubt at all of the right of any German, English, or French merchant vessel to use any kind of a ruse to escape a warship. Why, even the Emden was enabled to enter a port of Japan flying the Japanese colors, if reports are true, and before she had left that Japanese port she had sunk three Japanese ships. If that can be done by a warship, I can not see any particular reason against its being done by a vessel that can not defend itself.

Then, again, we have heard a great deal of late about the danger of firing upon a vessel flying the American flag under the belief by the vessel firing upon her that she might also be a British vessel flying an American flag. When we stop to consider that for a moment we will see that there is no foundation for such fear. Under the law of all nations a warship of one belligerent has no right to fire into an undefended merchant vessel of even a belligerent, much less one bearing a neutral flag. Such warship sends a shot over her bow or signals the vessel to surrender. She is then boarded and the officers and men removed and the vessel towed into one of the captor's ports, or, if the capturing vessel feels that it can not do that, it may have a right to sink or destroy her, to do anything that she sees fit with her, because she is a prize of that nation, but she has no right to murder the people who are upon that belligerent unarmed merchant vessel, which can not defend itself, any more than she has a right to drop her bombs over an undefended town where there are no troops or munitions of war. When German torpedo boats or submarines a short time ago captured three British vessels they did not proceed to fire into them. They gave orders for them to surrender, and they surrendered, and they took off the officers and crew; and these little war vessels, probably not being able to tow the captured vessels into port safely, did what they had a right to do—destroyed them. No one questions their right. But I think that if any one of them had immediately proceeded to destroy one of those unprotected merchant vessels without a demand for surrender, the whole world would have condemned any country that would so far forget the ordinary rules of honorable warfare. Therefore the scare headlines in the papers ought not to seriously affect us. It is simply a question, Mr. President, whether we ought to buy these vessels; whether we have a right to buy them and put them back into the trade of their own country or any other country; give to the belligerent country the benefit of the value of her vessels, and also the value of the commerce, just as though she had never parted with them at all.

I now want to consider for a moment, Mr. President, the emergency in the matter of exporting merchandise from this country.

EMERGENCY IN EXPORTING MERCHANDISE.

Mr. President, when the administration settles upon a policy which it asks the Congress to crystallize into legislative enactment, a policy which abandons all of the old landmarks of human progress which have guided and developed mighty nations, through the ambition, enterprise, and energy of individual members which constitute them, and sets us afloat on a shoreless sea of socialism, we may well pause and consider what such a policy means to us both as a Government and as a people. He who is able to comprehend what impulses within his own heart have controlled his every act, guided his thought, shaped his course, and developed his character, and is also able to comprehend what would have been the result on his own life if the field of operation for his individualism had been destroyed; if responsibility for his own welfare, his position, and of those dependent upon him had been taken over as a governmental function—will most naturally view with alarm any great step by which paternalism, always alluring to the unthinking, always insidious, is pressed as a policy upon the Nation. Whatever the Nation might gain in massed strength and power by paternalistic government, by the law of compensation must lose in individualism. The atom can not by integration become a portion of the mass without losing its liberty of action. He who surrenders individual liberty and responsibility surrenders the very elements that make for manhood. As I believe that individual character is more important than mere national strength or greatness, I have always opposed, and ever will oppose, the forces which are attempting to drive this country into socialism or paternalism. And, Mr. President, if one desires to justify himself in delaying a vote upon this measure he could find ample arguments for justification. The world is full of literature dealing with the dangers of this tendency. Volumes could be read to this Senate every sentence of which would be most pertinent and proper. But because the evil effects of such a policy would not be immediate but would require time to develop, one can hope but for little consideration of that subject and must turn his attention to those matters which are of immediate concern.

What is the emergency that demands the enactment of this shipping bill? And if there is an emergency, will it be met by the methods proposed in this bill? These are the two questions which first challenge our attention.

That we can not export the great surplus of this country's goods produced in 1914, the greatest surplus the country has ever known, as rapidly as we would like is not denied. That we are exporting to-day more rapidly than ever before can not be denied by those who exaggerate the emergency.

That war conditions which can not be met by the provisions of this bill are responsible for our inability to still further increase our shipments abroad also must be admitted.

Our principal exports are grain, flour, and other foodstuffs. Seven hundred and fifty million bushels of wheat raised in the United States is a heavy crop. The agricultural estimate is that this year we raised 900,000,000 bushels. That fact alone establishes one of the reasons for the increased demand for exporting facilities. Since the 1st of July, 1914, according to figures which I take from the New York Journal of Commerce of January 9, 1913, to the 1st of January, 1915, we exported wheat and flour in the equivalent of 201,060,585 bushels. During the corresponding period from July 1, 1913, to January 1, 1914, we exported but 143,050,801 bushels. In other words, just of that one article of export we actually sent out of this country during the war 58,009,784 bushels more than we did during the previous period of peace. It certainly seems that we are getting our goods out of the country quite rapidly, although, of course, we are hampered.

During the same period—from July 1, 1914, to January 1, 1915—we exported 7,773,580 bushels of corn, as against 1,928,449 bushels during the previous like period, nearly seven times the quantity. That certainly does not look as though there was serious congestion in the matter of foodstuffs ready for export. The exports of oats during the past six months was three times the total exports for the entire previous fiscal year. We exported during these six months 37,008,228 bushels, while we exported only 11,404,286 bushels during the entire previous year. The same rule holds good in other lines of food products.

But, Mr. President, I have a very late report upon this subject. This gives exports from the United States, taken from the Monthly Summary of Commerce and Finance, published by the United States Department of Commerce, and I want to take them by years, and months of the different years, to see whether or not we are getting our goods out of the country in pretty good shape.

Take barley. In October, 1912, we exported 1,383,235 bushels; in October, 1913, 590,313 bushels; in October, 1914, during the congestion that we are talking about, we exported 2,854,219 bushels, more than twice as much as in any other year for the same month. I suppose that a great deal of these exports is going to the belligerent countries. I will now take the exports of barley in November of these years. In November, 1912, we exported 2,494,460 bushels; in November, 1914, 2,576,551, or a little more.

I will take wheat, the principal food product. In October, 1912, in time of peace, we exported 15,255,077 bushels; in October, 1913, 7,434,106 bushels; in October, 1914, 19,578,469 bushels, very much more than we exported in 1912, and more than double what we exported in 1913 during that month.

Let us now take wheat in November. In November, 1912, we exported 10,584,168 bushels; in November, 1913, 3,851,492 bushels; in November, 1914, 19,182,115 bushels; in other words, nearly twice as much in November, 1914, as in November, 1912, and about five times as much in November, 1914, as in November, 1913. That is getting the grain out of the country pretty well during a time of war and congestion.

Again, taking our exports of wheat in December, 1912, we exported 9,490,101 bushels; in December, 1913, 5,726,831 bushels; in December, 1914, 28,875,762 bushels——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. We exported more than three times as much in December, 1914, as we exported in December, 1912, and five times as much in December, 1914, as in December, 1913, in time of peace.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. The figures the Senator has given are quite a surprise to me; and, in view of those figures, I will ask the Senator if there seems to be any great emergency existing at the present time, so far as the exportation of farm products is concerned?

Mr. McCUMBER. I gave these figures as bearing upon the subject of emergency to show that there was no great emergency, so far as farm products are concerned; and I am a little inclined to think that, the way the price of wheat is going up, the longer we can hold it the better for the owners of that grain. I do not think the farmer will get much benefit of this rise in value, because he has passed most of the grain out of his hands, except that reserved for feed. Nevertheless the American people, while it is held on this side of the ocean and is rising in value all the time, are likely to obtain a special advantage by keeping it a little longer and not rushing it too rapidly. Probably the very fact that there has been some congestion here, thereby preventing the glutting of the markets of Great Britain, has helped to keep up the price in this country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for a question.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has been giving some figures as to the export of wheat and other grains. Has the Senator any figures as to the difference in the price of bread in 1913 and 1914?

Mr. McCUMBER. There is no great difference that I can see, Mr. President. I have always claimed that the advance in the price of grain must be very great to have any effect on the price of a loaf of bread.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is in error with regard to that on those dates.

Mr. McCUMBER. The price of bread has gone up a cent a loaf, I think. If I am in error I will stand corrected. Maybe it has gone up 2 cents.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. For a question.

Mr. REED. The Senator has just stated to us how much wheat has been shipped since the war began, as an argument that there is no interference with shipments of grain.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope the Senator will not say that I have argued anything of that kind. I am willing that the Senator should quote my words, but I do not want him to put words into my mouth which I have not uttered, and when I have alleged just the contrary.

Mr. REED. I will let the RECORD speak for that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I said there had been congestion in our ports.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator tell us how much more was paid for hauling that grain than the ordinary and usual freight rate?

Mr. BORAH. Also, Mr. President, tell us who paid it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish, Mr. President, to be perfectly fair on this question. I do not always know who does pay the freight, whether the purchaser on the other side pays it or whether the farmer upon this side has to share in that freight. I have an idea that they divide it between them. I do not think that anyone can say that the man on the other side of the ocean pays it all, and that the man who raises the grain here is not affected. I am a little inclined to think that under some circumstances probably the ultimate purchaser pays it; but I think the lowering of rates would naturally tend to the benefit of both the producer and consumer.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator tell us how much the freight rates have been increased since the war began?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will reach that in a little while in my argument. I was trying to hurry so as to get through in a short time. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. No one would accuse the Senator of having been guilty of indecent haste. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not want them to, at least, Mr. President.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall also touch upon the question, Mr. President, of freight rates. Perhaps they are high, but I want the Senator from Missouri to determine, first, when he says they are high, how much it costs to carry that freight. That is the only way we can determine whether a rate is high or low—to determine what the cost of the freight is at the present time, considering all the conditions, and compare it with the prices charged, and I am going to consider some of those conditions and then allow the Senator from Missouri to draw his own conclusions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McCUMBER. I now yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am asking for my own information as to this. I have seen it stated that wheat is sold, delivered in Liverpool, delivered on the other side, and I would like to ask the Senator if he knows whether that is the fact or not—whether wheat is sold in this country delivered?

Mr. McCUMBER. I know that is not the rule.

Mr. FLETCHER. You know that is not the rule?

Mr. McCUMBER. I know that is not the rule.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is it sold f. o. b.?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; we have been pretty careful about that, because we do not want our grades to be questioned. The cash has to be put down in Baltimore or in New York. We take no chances on the condition of the grain in shipment, or anything else. Grain is settled for on this side of the ocean. Now, generally, the party on the other side attends to the freight charges; he buys in New York, in Boston, in Baltimore, or in New Orleans. But that would not touch the question of who really pays the freight. The man on the other side may pay it in the first instance, but as to who has to shoulder it, bear the burden of it, is quite a different question, because the man on this side, the producer, may have to sell his products so much cheaper because of higher freight.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will ask you one further question. Is the price here determined by the foreign market price?

Mr. McCUMBER. How is that?

Mr. FLETCHER. Is the price here determined by the market price in Liverpool, for instance?

Mr. McCUMBER. The price is determined by the markets of the world; the price is determined by the quantity of the grain all over the world and the conditions of shipment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is not the Liverpool price the controlling price in determining the market price here, as well as in other portions of the world?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no, Mr. President. Some years it is; in some sections it is and in some it is not. If the Senator wants to lay down a general rule, he can lay down the rule that the price of a commodity is always fixed at the point or field of greatest consumption. The field of the greatest consumption of American wheat is in the United States. We consume five-sixths of it in the United States. Of course that is affected by the general world level of prices, dependent upon the quantity raised in the world in a given year and the demands of the world in that year. I will come directly to the question of the rates.

It is contended that there is an emergency in the matter of rates; that rates have in some instances doubled and trebled, and it is stated that the purpose of this bill is to compel shippers to reduce these rates. I will not now discuss who pays the freights, whether the foreign purchaser or the American producer. I can not agree with those who say that they are all paid by the foreign purchaser. Ordinarily a reduction of freight rates inures to the benefit of both the purchaser and the producer and an increase is detrimental to both of them. It is undoubtedly true that in most instances the burden of freight rates is shared between the two, whatever it may be. But before we can properly arrive at a conclusion as to whether the Government purchasing line of ships will operate to compel a reduction of rates charged by other shipowners, we must investigate not only the question of the amount charged for freight but also the question of the cost of freightage, and then determine whether or not it could be reduced. I have read over the figures given by the Secretary of the Treasury as to the charges made for freight between certain points in the United States and European terminals on the 1st day of July, and the rates which he says were charged at the time he presented his figures. I was somewhat surprised at what I might call an adroit handling of figures to prove a contention. Everyone knows—at least, I assume they do; I have known it, or thought that I knew it—that shipping rates, as a rule, are the very lowest in midsummer when traffic is light, and that they increase very materially during the fall and early winter months when international traffic is the heaviest.

Perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire can correct me if I am in error in that respect.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. McCUMBER. The only fair method of comparison would be either to take the whole period and get the average or compare month with month—December, 1914, with December, 1915, for instance. But even the figures given are shown to have been selected, if accurate at all, from some particular port at some particular time, and do not represent the average rates even at the time given. One certainly can not deny the accuracy of the figures given by the Senator from Massachusetts, taken from the manifests of vessels which actually exported the products to foreign ports. And these manifests show a very marked lower level than the figures given by the Secretary of the Treasury. Nevertheless, freight charges are very high.

But, Mr. President, are there legitimate causes for these increased rates? Because the rates are high you say they are exorbitant. Why do you say that, Mr. Secretary of the Treasury? Have you investigated the increased expenses connected with the moving and handling of freight since the war began? Have you investigated the very many other elements that enter into this increased cost? If you have, you have not given the public the benefit of your investigation. You have not given the benefit of it to Congress. What right have you to insist that even a doubled or a trebled charge is not just until you have had a proper hearing on that subject? If you have investigated the question, will not you please now give us the facts? How do you know that if you had a score of Government vessels you would not be compelled to charge exactly what others are charging in order to cover your expenses and a reasonable rate on the investment?

Mr. President, you say by your bill that you are going to invite private capital. I have to assume that you are acting in good faith; that you expect private capital to take 49 per cent of the stock of this corporation. If that is true, you expect that that private capital is going to get some return upon its investment; you are in honor bound to see that it does get a reasonable return; and how can you forestall your own action by declaring that at the present time you can and will make cheaper rates without giving us one scintilla of evidence as to what elements of cost you can avoid which at present make up the excessive or exorbitant rates?

Remember that owing to a decrease in the tonnage available for use, on account of so many vessels being interned, the cost price of vessels has greatly increased, so that if you were to buy vessels to-day—and I mean in the ordinary course of business—you would have to pay from 50 to 100 per cent more than the prevailing price of a year ago. So you would start right into this carrying trade with a capital investment far beyond what it has been in previous years unless you intend to strike a bargain with a wounded and bleeding belligerent. If you are to run this business the same as you would run a privately owned concern, that your purpose is to make it pay a reasonable return upon the investment, and it is only upon such assumption that you can get private capital to subscribe, you must operate in such a way as to make the profits from carrying exceed the expenses, the upkeep of the vessels, the insurance, and the depreciation. If you do not intend to do that, then you are guilty of duplicity toward the public, because you have organized a corporation and you have invited the people themselves to subscribe for stock. I am assuming, therefore, that you intend to act conscientiously toward these stockholders, that you intend that your vessels shall pay a decent return upon investment. Well, you will have no difficulty in getting your ships loaded on this side of the Atlantic. You will obtain applications for all the space you may have. But how about coming back? What are you going to bring back from the other side? Now just pause a moment and examine your own position. You have got a large increase of export goods over the normal amount to be moved. You must use a greater number of vessels to move it. You land on the other side with your greater tonnage. You must sail back. What will you load your vessels with on the return trip? If you will examine your own statistics, you will find that just in proportion as our exports or material for export have increased, the amount of our imports has decreased, and greatly decreased. It follows then that you can not get a full load on all of your vessels coming back. The carriage out overbalances the freight back. Then you must return to this country either empty or with a very diminished cargo. It naturally follows that you must return with practically no cargo. To make good your loss from that source you must add to the cost of freight exported from this country.

Now, that is the first element of added cost of freight. You will be exactly in the same position with your Government-owned boats that the private owner would be in.

What is the next thing you would find? When you arrive at one of these foreign ports—say, England—you will find the worst congestion of traffic you have ever known. You will find hundreds of vessels ahead of you waiting for facilities to unload. You will find that some of them have been waiting nearly a whole month. In other words, they have been wasting time enough there to have crossed the ocean and back twice. Now, that lost time is not only a liability, in the fact that it takes away a month of the earning capacity of your vessel, which must be added to the freight which you carry, but it continues your daily expenses.

Mr. President, figures were put into the RECORD but a short time ago relating to the daily cost of keeping four transports which the Government of the United States leased for the purpose of our recent invasion of Mexico. These figures showed that the actual cost of keeping those vessels in idleness was about a thousand dollars a day for each of them, or about $4,000 per day for the four. Now, I assume that any large merchant vessel, such as would sail between New York and Liverpool, would require about the same attention, and a day's idleness would be about the equivalent loss of $1,000. That loss has to be placed somewhere. There can not very much of it be placed upon imports, because there are few imports from these warring countries. The bulk of it, then, would have to be loaded upon these exports. And there is another element of expense. You would have to make the charge on your freight to cover this just as much as the privately owned ship would be compelled to levy it.

What is the next thing you would encounter? You must get labor to unload your ships. Where will you get it? Most of the able-bodied men are either at war or drilling to prepare themselves for war. There is a great scarcity of labor. That means not only inefficient labor, which must be picked up wherever you can get it, but very expensive labor, with the present scarcity. There is another expense which also must be added to the freight charges. You would also find a lack of facilities for unloading in sufficient terminals, still further delaying and increasing expenses.

Again, when you should begin to investigate the cause of delay in reaching the wharves or piers you would be answered with the statement that preference is given to war materials, to transport ships engaged in moving the army, munitions of war, supplies, and food; that no private business can interfere with the public. And then you would wait and wait for opportunities, and all the while the expenses would be piling up, and every ton of freight must shoulder those expenses.

There is another very important feature pertaining to the cost and expense of operating vessels which the public generally have not given consideration. Most of the great vessels that ply between here and Europe depend for their real profits upon passenger traffic. That passenger traffic since the war has been almost annihilated. This principal element of income and profit which enables those vessels to give low or reasonable freight rates has been lost. It is no longer a factor.

The freight itself must now bear that burden. About the time we get through enumerating all of the things that go to increase the freight charges we will at least find that the Government, too, must operate under the same difficulties, and we will probably conclude that after all none of the freight charges are really excessive. They are only excessive when compared with rates charged under normal conditions.

Nor, Mr. President, can we escape another important factor in case we should purchase interned ships. The principal ones are passenger vessels. Their principal business is carrying passengers. They have been fitted for that particular purpose—built to carry a great number of passengers and a little freight. After we have purchased them we will have to spend enormous sums to fit them for freight ships only, unless we continue them as both passenger and freight with little or no passenger traffic.

So, too, it must be remembered that the growth and development, the kind and character, size and speed, of all vessels engaged in commerce are the result of the development of a particular line of commerce. They are fitted for that commerce. They are built to engage in that commerce at the least possible cost. You can not take ships specially built for a particular line of trade and use them profitably in an entirely different line any more than you can take an oil-tank vessel and use it for a passenger vessel.

And after all of this delay, when you return again to the port of New York and have unloaded the little freight you might be able to bring over from the other side, you will then be compelled to compute the profits or losses of the ship.

In that computation you will take into consideration the time lost, the meager tonnage brought back, the vastly increased expenses, and you will probably find just exactly what this shipper found who was referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts the other day, that with all the present high freight charges, your net would be less than you had received when freight profits were at their lowest level.

Now, Mr. President, the Government has no right to force this country into the paternalistic field upon the theory that there is a present emergency which must be met, an emergency in the matter of excessive freight rates, unless it can show to us conclusively that there would be a very material reduction.

If the Government proposes to simply increase the facilities for moving freight from this country, and it charges the same as others, there will be no material relief. While we may be in something of a hurry to get our goods exported, the prices are going up, we are getting bigger prices for them every day we delay, and with the present increase of exports we will have taken care of all of our exportable grain, foodstuffs, and manufactures before the next crop is produced, unless it be in the matter of cotton. And even in that there has been a very material increase of exports.

Suppose, on the other hand, the Government conducts this transportation of freight at a loss, who is benefited? Where must the Government make good that loss? If the Government loses a million dollars it must take a million dollars out of the pockets of the people. Does anyone deny that? What difference does it make to the people whether this million dollars is paid to enable owners of vessels to continue in the business and make a reasonable profit, even though it may be high, or whether it is paid to the Government? The one balances the other. So far as relates to its immediate effect, there would be no difference, but so far as relates to its ultimate result, the difference would be most disastrous to the people. Your forty millions expended would be a mere bagatelle. The only thing it could possibly do would be to drive private ships off the waters.

Can anyone possibly insist that any other effect would result, that if we operate our Government ships at a loss in order to reduce freight rates we will necessarily drive every one of our private-owned vessels that can not meet the competition off the ocean? At least they will have to be sent somewhere else.

The private owner of a vessel must make a profit or quit. He has no taxing power on the public to make good a deficit. So this experiment, if it does what some of you want it to accomplish, would have the effect of destroying the little merchant marine we have. It would force those vessels to change their nationality, to carry the flag of some neutral country like Norway, Sweden, or Denmark, where they could be operated much more cheaply in order to hold their own against this unjust competition of a Government continuing in the trade of the world.

Not only that, Mr. President, but, as I have said before, freight charges, whether high or low, are undoubtedly shouldered by both the producer of the things sold and the purchaser. You can not say that the one pays it all any more than the other. But when the producer must make good a deficit because his Government has run behind in operating a vessel he pays the whole deficit. The man on the other side does not shoulder the half or any part of it. That is all paid by the American citizen.

HOW WOULD GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP RELIEVE SITUATION.

Mr. President, it is still to be explained to the satisfaction of most of us how Government ownership of a vessel already engaged in commerce will relieve the situation. Certainly, if there are exorbitant prices being collected for carrying freight, exorbitant profits secured, then all the bottoms of the world must be taking advantage of that condition. They are not lying idle while there is a demand for big profits. It is a well-known fact, Mr. President, that they are all busy. They are all carrying goods, and if you change the ownership of those bottoms from private hands to the Government you have not increased your tonnage capacity by a single pound or foot.

Changing the flag on a vessel does not make it carry any more freight. As long as it is engaged in that business you gain nothing by that purchase. Secretary Redfield in a recent speech declared that there were 12 English ships which he could buy. Well, suppose that is true. Where are those ships? Are they plying between Great Britain and the United States or are they idle? You must answer that they are not idle. Then they are still doing just exactly what they would be doing if we spend thirty or forty million dollars for them. What we want the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of War to give us, if he has the information, is what bottoms, outside of the interned ships of belligerents, now idle, now not already engaged in transportation, can be purchased so as to increase the facilities for exportation from this country. He may answer that he can purchase those engaged in other routes of the world. Well, if he does that, and if he does what he admits he will have to do, and in all probability would do, operate them at a loss, then he will certainly drive other ships engaged in the commerce between the United States and the particular country to which he would sail these ships, to cease their operations between such ports and probably take up the very routes that had been abandoned by taking vessels from those routes.

So it looks to me, Mr. President, you must do one of two things—you must keep your hands off of the merchant marine of the United States or you must buy every vessel owned by an American citizen and own the whole thing. You must get into this up to your neck—so far that you can never get out—or you must keep away from it entirely.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator cites the observation of the Secretary of Commerce that he knows of 12 English ships which he can buy. Does the Senator think that the Englishman, who is usually a pretty wise personage, would be glad to sell those old ships to the United States Government and build new ships, and then drive the old ones off the routes of trade, because he could operate his new ships cheaper than he could operate the old ones?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, surely. There are a thousand of these things that one could consider which have not been laid before us at all. What right, I ask, has the Secretary to say that the freightage between New York or Boston and Liverpool is exorbitant because it may be double what it was a year or two years ago, unless he can establish to us that the cost of operating is not also double what it was two years ago? Yet we have not had a single word upon that subject, not one line of evidence.

Not only, Mr. President, would these Government-owned vessels be compelled to submit to all the delays caused by war, not only would they be compelled to incur the heavier expenses at the other end, but the operation by the Government would cost very much more than the operation by private concerns. No one has ever attempted to deny the proposition that it always costs the Government more to perform any act than the same could be performed under private ownership. And this leads me immediately to another suggestion.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. For a question, certainly.

Mr. STONE. It has been argued on that side over and over again that private capital would not be invested to compete with Government ownership, that it could not compete with it successfully, and yet the Senator from North Dakota is arguing that it costs the Government more to run its ships and costs the shipper more on his cargo—for, he said, the shipper would have to go into his pocket for it—than it would cost the private shipowner to operate his ships or than it would cost the exporter or importer to ship on a privately owned vessel.

I made a mistake in saying this, I know, because I simply prolong the Senator's discussion, but it seemed to me so pertinent that I could not very well deny myself the opportunity of calling attention to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am ready to have my speech prolonged.

Mr. President, the difference is a very simple one. The private owner can not tax the people to pay the difference; the Government can. Though the Government runs and operates its vessels under these higher expenses, it can carry goods for nothing if it wishes; it can carry them for whatever price it sees fit, and it can go right back to the taxing power and reach right into your pocket or mine to make up the loss. A private individual can not do it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure, for a question. That is always understood.

Mr. POMERENE. Where would the Senator get the money that would be used to pay the subsidies which some of our friends would like to give to different shipping interests, except by taxation?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly they would have to get it by taxation; and if I were discussing this subject at this time I might prolong this debate a little longer than I wish to do.

The Democratic Party is not in favor of a subsidy one way or the other. But what is the difference between a subsidy that is paid directly to the owner of a vessel who can operate a private vessel cheaper than the Government can operate a Government-owned vessel and going down in your pockets to pay the deficit caused by the more expensive operation by the Government? It is a subsidy in either way, because in both cases you get back into the people's pockets to cover the deficit.

Mr. POMERENE. And in the Republican plan of subsidy it goes to the private individual.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I would rather encourage the private individual, if it were necessary, by a subsidy. Although I can not say that I am one who advocates ship subsidies, I would rather pay that money to assist an individual to make his business prosperous. If he prospers in the operation of his ships he gives employment, spends his money in this country, and we are all benefited.

I have stated before upon this question that there is only one way to reach it. We have either got to subsidize Government ownership, or else we have got to change our shipping laws so that we can compete in the operation of our ships with those of other nations. That is the only way I see that is possible. I do not like any of these ways.

Why is it that when anyone has something that he desires to sell to the Government of the United States its value is always very much more, and often many more times more, than it is worth when sold to a private individual?

We see it in every foot of land the Government has to purchase for any purpose down on these streets. The Government pays for lots a price so exorbitant that you could not use those lots for any purpose and secure one-quarter per cent interest on the investment.

Sad as it may be, it is the truth that most people feel that any price they can work out of the Government is justifiable. And when the Government asserts that it needs anything the chances are 10 to 1 that there will be a combination made to hold up the Government for an exorbitant price. Already the press of the country is full of insinuations and declarations that options have been obtained by organizations upon interned vessels and on other vessels toward which the Government may have cast its acquisitive glance.

About the time the Government gets ready to take possession of them their prices will jump 10, 20, 30, and 40 and 50 per cent higher than they are to-day, and the Government will have to buy them because the Government has not time to build. It is an emergency and it can not spend 18 months to build new vessels.

The New York Journal of Commerce of January 14 gives the greater part of a column to the subject of the deals that are on hand and those that are in process of incubation the purpose of which is to obtain control of vessels which the Government might secure, and if this bill goes through to fix their own prices to the Government. How true these assumptions are no one on the outside can say.

All we can allege is that it is very natural, very common, and in my opinion the Government will undoubtedly find itself forestalled in the matter of these purchases. And with the war price of ships, the higher cost of Government operation, it will either be compelled to maintain the very rates it decries or else make the people themselves shoulder the deficit.

What countries have ships to sell to us? Do you imagine you can buy Norwegian, Danish, Swedish, or Netherlands vessels? Are not all of those vessels doing all they possibly can? They are all neutral countries, and their ships are at sea now carrying commerce. What earthly use would it be to purchase those vessels and simply change the flag? They are now running much more cheaply than they could be operated under the American flag, and by making the change we certainly would not be very liable to decrease the freight charges.

There is no emergency in the South American trade. In other words, there are sufficient ships to take the produce from one country to the other. Our great trouble with the South American trade to-day is that, due to financial difficulties arising from the European war, their commerce has been hampered. When you look anywhere for vessels, while you may find any number of them for sale at a very nice profit to the Government, you will look in vain for an increase in the tonnage which could be immediately engaged in commerce, except these interned or imprisoned ships.

SOVEREIGNTY OF THE UNITED STATES NOT INVOLVED.

It has been alleged, Mr. President, both by our Secretaries of Treasury and War that the sovereignty of the United States will not be involved if any of these ships should be seized; that as a mere stockholder in the corporation it would be subject to all of the liabilities that a private stockholder would be subject to. As a strict proposition of law that may be true. But we all know that the people of the United States will not look upon it in that light. They will brook no interference with a Government-owned merchant ship any more than they would with a Government-owned warship. We have just passed through a contest in which we felt the powerful influence of this jealousy against interference with anything that belongs to the Government in the Panama tolls controversy, where the contractual rights and duties were completely lost sight of.

The American people said: "We do not care what you contracted to do. We paid for the Canal Zone; we built the canal; it is ours; it is American; we take pride in it, and we want to do just whatever we see fit with it, and no one has the right to question that right." They lost sight entirely of the fact that we had to purchase that right, that one of the considerations in that purchase was that we should treat all vessels of all nations, including our own, equally. They did not look at that feature. They saw only the Government's sovereignty over that strip of country, and they were averse to having that sovereignty interfered with in any degree. Try as you will, you can not in the mind of the public disassociate mere ownership by the Government from the sovereignty itself; and if one of these vessels owned by the Government should be seized by a belligerent we would be forced into a controversy with that belligerent, and some one, either the belligerent or ourselves, would have to back down; and under present conditions I am inclined to think it would have to be the belligerent.

With a nationality made up of a citizenship derived from all of these warring countries, we have not been separated long enough from the parent countries to make us immune from natural racial or national sympathies; so an act of seizure by any one of them would be a firebrand that would set the country aflame, and although it affected only one nation it would create hostility among the several sections of our own country. I am not afraid of war with any of these countries. All they could possibly do would be to protest, and they would only resort to actual force when their lives would seem to be dependent upon maintaining their policies.

As a neutral country we have rights, but those rights do not go to the extent that we may continue commercial relations with any belligerent as though no war existed. Possibly as great a danger as we would incur would be that of a most awkward precedent which we would be compelled to repudiate in the future. Certainly we must admit that the law of nations to-day concedes the right of belligerents to determine what trade there may be with a blockaded port. We have always asserted that right. We must assert it in the future, and we can not deny it in the present; and when we attempt to force a Government-owned ship, the very sovereignty of the country, into one of these blockaded ports there is going to be trouble, and we are not going to escape that trouble by saying that our own sovereignty is not involved. The American people will declare that our sovereignty is at stake, no matter what the administration may insist, and we will uphold it. That is exactly what it means.

Right here, again, there is a proposed amendment to this bill. In substance, it is that we should not do an unneutral act in purchasing these vessels. What does that mean? The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury have both declared, and the administration has declared, that the act of purchasing and operating these interned vessels would not be unneutral; therefore they can do any of these acts and justify themselves upon the ground that it is not unneutral, although all the rest of the world declares that it is an unneutral act. You have left that question of neutral action to the decision of the administration, which has decided it in advance, and I confess I can not understand the position of those who are opposed to our buying and using these interned or imprisoned ships because they regarded it as unneutral are now willing to vote for the proposition that you can buy those interned ships provided you say in your bill that you shall not commit an unneutral act; that is, that the Government which declares that it is not unneutral may proceed to do the very thing which most Senators think is unneutral, and which has caused them to fear the result of a bill of this kind.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for a question.

Mr. COLT. Is it not true that international law is an agreement between nations; that nations alone are the only parties; and that the law is founded upon the customs and treaties existing among the family of nations? And is it not also true, just as you were saying about a treaty, that one party can not change the law, and that it requires the agreement of all parties to change it? Do you not so understand it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I certainly do.

Mr. COLT. That is, no legislation, no act of Congress can modify or change any such law, because it is a law between the parties composing the family of nations.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not only that, but in the solemn council Chamber where we now are, but a few months ago, with closed doors, we decided solemnly and, if I remember, without a dissenting vote that the declaration of London was international law and the law that should govern the United States. But to-day the administration says that it is not our international law, although the American Senate, the power that makes treaties, adopted it, and by their adoption declared it to be their policy. Of course we are not bound by it as a contractual obligation, because its binding effect as an agreement was dependent upon the formal adoption by all the parties represented. We are bound by it, as I tried to explain, only because it is an international law. That is the distinction.

We know also that the present international law is that captures and prizes are always made under the law of the prize courts of the captor. We have asserted that right in the past, we assert it to-day, and we will assert it in the future, and if we assert it as our right we have got to concede that the other nations will assert it as their right, and for the purposes of this war every one of the belligerents has accepted the London agreement and declared, with a few modifications, that it is the international law which will govern them. So our purchase and operation of these interned ships in commerce with the belligerent nation from whose subjects they are purchased will not only bring about earnest protest, but it will compel us to go before a people in the grasp of a life-and-death struggle, and, taking advantage of their plight and our consequent supreme power, force them to yield. God deliver us from that attitude in this great controversy, while at the same time extending our hands to these nations, telling them that we are their friends, ready to arbitrate their differences. We can not afford to put ourselves in that inconsistent position.

Mr. President, there has been considerable said about the decadence of the merchant marine. It seems to me that no one can be ignorant of the cause of that decadence. During the period of our national life antedating steam and sail vessels we were abie to build and did build and send into foreign commerce a comparatively great merchant marine.

The wage scale and the difference in operation between an American and a foreign ship differed in no material respect. As a great agricultural exporting nation and an equally great manufacturing importing nation there was a special inducement for the building and operation of American ships. There was nearly an equal amount of freight each way. But the advent of the steel vessel, concurrent with the advent of the steam motive power, changed the situation. The steel industry in Great Britain at that time had reached a greater degree of economic efficiency than in any other country. She had the iron, she had the coal, she had experienced cheap labor, and she built the ships.

Following this special advantage to foreign-built ships came the demand in this country which in due time was crystallized into legislation for better and consequently more expensive conditions of operation of our vessels.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am trying to get through, Mr. President, and will do so in a very short time; but I will yield, as I find that I have more material here than I thought I had.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	Norris	Smith, Md.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I demand the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Alabama that the Senate do now adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in connection with the discussion which has been had to-day, I wish to refer to some late reports respecting shipping conditions. The statement has been made that the rates are no higher than they were expected to be; that there is no excessive crowding at the ports and that there is no emergency calling for any action; that our commerce needs no relief from present conditions. It seems to me important now to have go in the RECORD some communications bearing on this subject right up to date.

The Senator from New York to-day laid much stress on the importance of doing nothing to interfere with private enterprise or to discourage private initiative. It seems to me that that argument is met by the teachings of actual experience in this country, by the demonstration which has been made respecting the efforts of private parties in the past in this important field. There is no need to guess at what private enterprise will do. There is no need to suppose how far individual effort will go in the direction of establishing a mercantile marine in this country, because we have had an actual experience of 50 years on that subject, because it has been absolutely demonstrated in the past what that means. After all we have done to encourage private enterprise, after all the legislation which we have passed favoring and encouraging individual effort in that great field, we know that to-day under the American flag scarcely 1,000,000 tons can be counted. We have paid and are paying to-day $1,212,500 in subventions to encourage the building of an American merchant marine. We pay about one-third as much subsidies and subventions as England pays in that direction, and the United Kingdom has twenty times the tonnage that the United States has engaged in foreign commerce—for we have less than a million tons after all that we have done to encourage the effort of private enterprise in all of the years that are past, whereas England has 20,000,000 tons in foreign commerce and pays only about $3,000,000 per annum of subventions or subsidies or quasi subsidies.

Private enterprise has not only failed utterly to develop an American merchant marine in the past, but absolutely refuses to do anything in that direction. You can never reinstate the American merchant marine by investing American money in foreign shipyards or in foreign ships. You can never develop a mercantile marine solely by subventions or subsidies. That sort of thing never has been done by any country in the world in the past. You can never develop the American mercantile marine by relying on private enterprise and individual effort, because our capitalists and those who engage in that industry positively refuse to build up an American merchant marine, positively refuse to put their ships under our flag.

What is the situation to-day? Why raise objection that this is no field for the Government, because it ought to be left to individual industry and enterprise? Why raise objections that the Government is increasing its centralized power, and we are extending the authority and the jurisdiction of the Federal Government to the diminution of the powers and authority and rights of the States and of individuals as arguments against this bill when we make no such objection as to other undertakings by the General Government; when only a few months ago some gentlemen who are now opposing this legislation were here asking Congress to establish a bureau for taking care of war risks in order that their ships might be given the protection which they could not get in any other way, or by any other means? The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I remember distinctly stood here and advocated the construction under the direction of the President of some 20 vessels by the United States Government to have them operated "between the ports of Alaska and ports on the eastern and western shores of South America," such vessels to be leased to and operated by the Panama Railroad Co., owned by the Government. Only a little while ago gentlemen were here also asking Congress to amend our navigation laws in order that their ships might come under the protection of the flag of this country, when it suited them to have that protection. And so we have the United Fruit Co.'s ships, and the Steel Corporation's ships, and the Standard Oil Co.'s ships coming under the flag of the United States and taking American registry at a time when it was dangerous for them to fly the flag of Belgium or the flag of England. Gentlemen on the other side favored that. Gentlemen on the other side favored establishing a war-risk bureau. The shipping interests wanted it. Gentlemen on the other side favored the change in our registry laws. These business interests wanted it. Now, why is it that they all at once discover that we are having the Government venture on an enterprise that ought to be left to private individuals, thus establishing paternalistic tendencies which are dangerous to our institutions?

Mr. President, the last report from the Secretary of the Treasury shows that on August 14, 1914, a committee of business men met in the city of Washington. I do not mention this in any critical sense at all, but I am referring to it as a matter of history. They had a right to ask for this legislation, and they did right to ask for it. It was right for the Government to establish that war-risk bureau. It was proper and right for the Government to change the registry laws so that these ships might come under our flag. I am finding no fault with that. I favored that then as I favor this now. The only thing I say is that you gentlemen are inconsistent when you favored those things at that time and now object to the pending legislation. As I say, Mr. President, on the 14th of August, 1914, a committee of business men appeared in Washington, and we find on page 6 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury this:

To illustrate the pressing needs, representatives at the conference called attention to the congestion of American grain and other staples at the seaports and in the interior awaiting transportation. It was pointed out that Great Britain, France, and Belgium are now insuring the vessels and cargoes flying their respective flags against war risks. In order to provide workable means of cooperating with the Government the conference resolved itself into a committee, with Hon. Seth Low as chairman, and adopted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That this conference, representing the business interests of all sections of the country, expresses its high appreciation of the prompt and effective action of the President and Congress and the Secretary of the Treasury in affording a prompt solution of the currency difficulties created by the sudden outbreak of war in Europe on a colossal scale, and that this conference urges upon the Government, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Federal Reserve Board to continue its cooperation by adopting such measures and rendering such prompt assistance as may be necessary to enable the country to cope with the difficulties created by the unprecedented disarrangement of foreign trade now existing, and recommends especially that immediate assistance be provided to permit the negotiation of bills of exchange against the shipment of products to foreign markets, so that the congestion already prevailing may be at once relieved and that the financial balance of trade may become in our favor.

"Resolved, That this conference urge the United States Government to establish a bureau of war-risk insurance, to be administered under the direction of a suitable Government department by a board of three or five members, which shall assume the risks of war on American vessels and American cargoes shipped or to be shipped thereon whenever in the judgment of the board it shall appear that American vessels or shippers on American vessels are unable in any particular trade to compete on equal terms with the vessels or shippers of other nationalities by reason of the protection offered such other carriers or shippers by arrangements for war indemnity through their Governments, and that such board have power to fix rates of premium, subject to change, to each country or for each class of cargo."

Mr. President, was that a departure? Have we ever had a war-risk bureau before? Was that objected to on the ground of its being paternalism at that time? Was that objected to on the ground of its being socialistic and probably leading the Government into loss? No such objection was then urged. The business men represented here were clamoring for that legislation, and it met with no opposition on that side of any consequence, as I recall. They went on further:

Resolved, That the present opportunity to extend American foreign trade and the opportunity now to begin the creation of a mercantile marine under the United States flag is so great that this conference appeals to Congress, by immediate and effective legislation and by necessary changes in our navigation laws, to make it possible for our citizens, without discrimination, to buy and operate ships under American registry in foreign trade on equal competitive terms with all other maritime nations.

Resolved, That this conference deeply appreciates and earnestly and sympathetically responds to the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury in his opening address that the cooperation of the business interests of the country with the Government and its various departments should prevail, and in order that such may be effectively and most promptly accomplished; be it.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this conference that a standing committee should be appointed, composed of recognized experts in foreign exchange, marine and insurance problems, and in ocean transportation problems, in order that, if desired, in cooperation with the appropriate committee of Congress, bills may be immediately framed for consideration designed to promote the accomplishment of these greatly to be desired ends.

Mr. President, we heard nothing about socialism, we heard nothing about paternalism, we heard nothing last August about those objections that are raised to this legislation when these gentlemen were here in Washington proposing these extended activities of the Government. And when, in accordance with these resolutions, Mr. Low, as chairman, remained in Washington to confer with representatives of the Government as to the best means of solving these problems, these were the committees that were appointed:

War-risk insurance: Messrs. Hendon Chubb, of New York; J. Parker Kirlin, of New York; E. H. Outerbridge, of New York; F. G. Crowell, of Kansas City, Mo.

Transportation: Messrs. J. A. Farrell, of New York; P. A. S. Franklin, of New York; Robert Dollar, of San Francisco; Bernard N. Baker, of Baltimore.

Foreign exchange: Messrs. A. J. Hemphill, of New York; Festus J. Wade, of St. Louis; Henry R. Ickelheimer, of New York; John J. Arnold, of Chicago.

Here, then, was a situation which these experienced, farseeing business men sought to remedy. They proposed legislation by Congress; they proposed these extended activities of the Government in new fields, in new directions, to meet a condition which had not before arisen in this country; and when they asked it we heard no opposition on the ground of its being socialistic or paternalistic. Here was a case where these gentlemen favored legislation. There were reasons why the Government should go into the war-risk insurance business. Private enterprise failed at this juncture; individual effort offered no remedy. There was a field which the Government had to fill if it was to be filled at all, and it did fill it; and as to what has resulted from that, the reports from the Secretary of the Treasury will show, and I do not go into those details. Suffice it to say that the venture has been altogether satisfactory and in every way successful. What do we find to-day? With less than a million tons of American ships in foreign trade, with only four ships in the trans-Atlantic business flying the American flag, with our harbors filled with the products of our farms, with the warehouses at our ports crowded with the products of our factories and our mines, with the elevators filled at our seaports, with the concentrating yards of the railroads so jammed that they are absolutely laying embargoes upon further shipments—under these conditions, although the freight rates have gone up from 10 to 300 per cent and more, we are unable to move these products to the waiting markets over the seas. Why? Because conditions are unusual? Undoubtedly that may be generally the cause, but specifically it is, because, primarily, there are no ships flying the American flag to take these products, and you can not get foreign ships to do the service. It is utterly impossible to accommodate the needs of our commerce on the high seas; and an emergency, a necessity, exists in this country to-day never experienced in all its history in the past, and a great, strong, powerful Government and a patriotic, progressive people are told that we must submit in abject dependence on foreign ships, now inadequate, and let conditions alone for private enterprise to remedy in some way, somehow, some of these days in the distant future.

I say I think it is so absolutely contrary to the best interests of our people, it is so cowardly to surrender to conditions which we can remedy, if we will, that I hesitate to characterize the opposition of this measure which offers a means of certain relief.

Here are the facts, right from Pennsylvania:

Easton, Pa., February 5, 1915—

This letter came to me from the secretary of the board of trade—

EASTON, PA., February 5, 1915.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Permit me to thank you for our board of trade upon the receipt of the pamphlet "Increased ocean transportation rates." Something ought to be done.

It is a most villainous outrage the way the American people are now being treated by being held up by the throat to suit a few greedy shipowners who charge exorbitant rates because they now have an opportunity to do it. For years our Government has been trying to find a market for coal abroad. They have spent over $2,000,000, together with the coal miners, to find this market, and now, when the market is offered to us, we can not take advantage of the situation. I am connected with a firm of foreign exporters, Messrs. L. & E. Frenkel, 309 Broadway, New York City, and we have orders this minute for 130,000 tons of coal to go to Italy for purely domestic and industrial purposes, and we can not get the vessel bottoms to send it in, except at from 60 to 80 shillings per ton, whereas it was from 7 to 11 shillings per ton. It is a very sad commentary on the American people that such a condition is permitted to exist.

Very sincerely, yours,

THOMAS A. H. HAY, Secretary.

Here is one from the Mount Union (Pa.) Tanning & Extract Co., manufacturers of oak sole leather and tanning extract:

MOUNT UNION, PA., February 3, 1915.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We hope the shipping bill will pass. We have several cars of tanning extract for Rotterdam which we can not move for a couple of months on account of lack of cargo space. The sailings from the River Plate, Argentina, to New York, etc., are now so infrequent that we can not get hides. The war risks on both the above are also prohibitive.

These things have a tendency to shut down our production and lay off men just at a time when there is great industrial distress throughout the country. We are also held up on shipments of leather to England for the same reasons.

We are looking for great good to the country from the passage of the shipping bill, just as great good has come through the enactment of the new Federal banking law.

We appreciate the good efforts your department has already made in many directions.

Yours, truly,

MOUNT UNION TANNING & EXTRACT CO.,
EDWARD M. GREENE, President.

This is from the collector of customs at Boston to the Secretary of Commerce, dated February 8:

Interviews with steamship agents, principal shippers, and forwarders show great lack of vessels in export trade, those in service mostly slow and limited capacity. At present sailings are fixed and freight accepted only equal to the limited carrying capacity of vessels. Shippers are holding merchandise until booked. Bookings must be made from two to eight weeks in advance of sailing. This avoids the appearance of congestion in some instances. Many wharves filled to capacity with cargo awaiting shipment to Europe. Grain elevators filled with grain and cars of grain on sidetracks unable to be unloaded. Will be more congested unless relieved by increased service. Can give details if desired. Coastwise about normal.

BILLINGS, Collector of Customs.

Does that mean nothing to commerce? Does that mean nothing to the producers of grain and the producers of this country of other products that are seeking foreign markets and of which we have a surplus?

This is from the collector of the port of Philadelphia:

Investigation shows congestion in merchandise intended for export to foreign ports. Grain elevators all full. Unusual amount of export merchandise on piers. Exporters claim shortage in tonnage. Can not secure space for English ports until latter part of February or 1st of March. Later for large lots. Space for Glasgow can be had this month.

This is from the collector of the port of Tampa, Fla.:

Fernandina reports no congestion on merchandise, but phosphate, naval stores, and logwood congested on account of lack of steamship facilities covering foreign traffic only. Pensacola reports freight not brought to Pensacola until ships are available to forward it; lumber mills, naval stores, yards, and cotton warehouses in vicinity have large stocks on hand which could and would move were ships available. Can not say congestion exists at Pensacola, but exports would be double could neutral tonnage be obtained. At Jacksonville, Key West, and Tampa there is no congestion of merchandise on account of lack of steamship facilities.

GRIGGS, Collector of Customs.

I am reading the reports from the collectors of customs in these ports, made officially to the Secretary of the Treasury.

From Galveston, Tex., comes this word:

Your telegram this date, personal investigation confirms Saturday's telegram; conditions of wharves and warehouses crowded, with space for only about 8,000 additional bales cotton. Wheat on hand in cars, reduced from 2,300 cars 10 days ago to 1,523. Warehouses in cotton-concentration yards crowded. February arrivals and due to arrive, 78 steamers. Expect to export 799,200 bales cotton. Without docks at Texas City and Bolivar this port would now be congested to the limit.

And so, at Mobile, Ala., the collector reports the same condition, practically, as follows:

MOBILE, ALA., February 6, 1915.

SECRETARY TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.:

Congestion merchandise destined South American ports here account no steamship facilities. No congestion otherwise for reason agents refuse book freight either coastwise or foreign account scarcity steamers and high rates. No business solicited through canal to Pacific ports account of coastwise steamers and business already contracted for refused account high rates.

MAER, Collector of Customs.

February 6 the collector wired as follows from New Orleans:

Your telegram to-day. From best data obtainable on short notice no congestion merchandise awaiting coastwise shipment. Great congestion grain. On hand constantly in elevators about 3,000,000 bushels, with 4,000 cars on track awaiting elevator room. Nine steamers now loading for Europe, which will afford only temporary relief. First February 187,641 bales cotton in warehouses awaiting shipment; 43,385 bales in cars not delivered to ships or consignees on ships in ports; 106,890 bales, as compared with 25,128 bales this time last year, now on docks; 77,742 bales destination undetermined; elsewhere, 5,539 bales. Warehouses have stored all cotton for which they have room. No low-grade freight being moved, because goods can not stand high rates freight being asked to correspond with rates being exacted for cotton, grain, and foodstuffs. Those who engaged tonnage last summer now have preference, except to German ports, for which no ships are available. There are stated to be 30,000 bales awaiting steamers for Rotterdam and 25,000 to 30,000 bales for Genoa. Some exporters state congestion due not only to lack ships but to great delay in discharging cargoes in Europe, and vessels are behind from one to two months in their schedules. Cotton can not be put on wharf until ship is ready to receive it. The conditions recited have caused almost prohibitive freight rates. Exportations August 1, 1913, to January 31, 1914, 1,013,243 bales; August 1, 1914, to January 31, 1915, 599,067 bales.

FOSTER, Collector of Customs.

The Senator from North Dakota went on to speak about the excessive exportations of grain, and, of course, overlooks the consideration of what would have been the exportations if the shippers had been able to get the tonnage required and what would have been the rate as compared with the present if that had been possible.

But in the case of cotton, instead of the shipments from New Orleans increasing over those of last year, these are the facts: Exportations from August 1, 1913, to January 31, 1914, 1,013,243 bales; August 1, 1914, to January 31, 1915, 599,067 bales; in other words, about one-half, from August 1 to January 31 just passed, of what it was a year ago.

From Norfolk, Va., the collector reports:

As a result the freight is being piled in coastwise warehouses and lying in cars awaiting orders for the sending out of said freight on coastwise steamers to New York and Baltimore for final export.

Let us see about New York. Both Senators from New York find objections to this bill. The junior Senator from New York, in commenting to-day upon certain provisions with reference to ships built in our yards by the shipping board, if authorized under this act, said that they may be registered, or enrolled rather, for the coastwise trade, urging that somebody had some special regard for the coastwise monopoly, otherwise all the ships acquired should be admitted to the coastwise trade, overlooking the fact, which is a fact that no one can deny, that there are no complaints about a scarcity of ships engaged in coastwise trade. Our coastwise business is being taken care of in the ordinary fashion and in the usual way. There is no need for additional ships to do the business between the ports on our coasts. The great cry and demand is for ships to traverse the ocean for the over-seas business, for the foreign trade. That is the demand, and it is the purpose of the bill to provide, particularly, facilities for the taking care of that kind of commerce—foreign commerce. Against this, there is no necessity for providing that these ships—built or acquired or purchased or leased—should be admitted to the coastwise business enrolled and authorized to enter upon coastwise trade and commerce, because that transportation is taken care of now, and there is no necessity for additional ships. The great necessity for additional ships is not for our coastwise trade, and additions there will come in the natural development of trade, but the great need is for ships to do the foreign business, to take care of our foreign commerce.

The New York collector of customs, Mr. Dudley Field Malone, under date of February 6, wires the Secretary of the Treasury:

Replying department telegram concerning congestion at this port investigation discloses unusual congestion, particularly with respect to grain, the stock of this commodity on hand being triple normal conditions.

Notwithstanding the tremendous exportation of grain, as mentioned by the Senator from North Dakota, the stock on hand in New York to-day is triple that in normal conditions, and the same is true substantially as to exports at Baltimore, at Norfolk, and at other ports along the south Atlantic and the Gulf. He continues:

Explanation of this congestion is that export movements can not be effected due to shortage of tonnage.

That is the reason, given here under date of February 6. Can anyone have any doubt about a statement coming in that way, from the official of the Government at the port of New York to his superior officer, stating that the reason of the trouble is the shortage of tonnage? He continues:

Congestion applies to warehouse elevators as well as cars and lighters. No marked congestion of coastwise trade discernible.

As to the coastwise trade there is no marked congestion, but as to the foreign trade the story is different.

From Baltimore comes this:

FEBRUARY 6, 1915.

Baltimore & Ohio Railroad has about 400 cars and Pennsylvania Railroad about 300 cars general export freight on hand, which is normal. Embargo is in force by Pennsylvania Railroad against receipt of grain on all their lines for export. Elevators loaded to full capacity with stock. On hand to-day, 4,260,000 bushels, and cars on tracks awaiting unloading. Grain embargo by Baltimore & Ohio Railroad raised about one week ago. No congestion coastwise traffic. No lack of steamship facilities for handling general export merchandise, which is cared for by regular lines, but lack of grain-carrying vessels does exist.

WILLIAM P. RYAN, Collector.

What does that mean? Is that a good thing for the producer of grain in this country? Is that a good thing for anybody in this country? Is not that a condition that ought to be relieved against if it is in the power of the Government to do it, and especially when private enterprise has failed, and not only has failed but absolutely refuses to do it?

Our patriotic American citizens of the International Mercantile Marine put $100,000,000 in ships, but they fly a foreign flag. Does that help us any? Did they not testify before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives that, give them free ships, give them what you would, they would never transfer those ships to the American flag? Imagine American money in ships flying foreign flags, and imagine American citizens testifying on the stand that it made no difference if you permitted them to buy them where they would, or build them where they might, they would never place them under the flag of their country; and the reason they gave was because of the difference in the cost of labor, increasing the cost of operating the vessels. That difference is estimated to be 10 to 15 per cent. That is the actual condition. Why should we ignore that, and why tell the people, from this place or anywhere else, that it is the business of Congress to leave this field to private initiative and individual enterprise, in the face of the sworn statements of the owners of these ships that, no matter if you changed the law and let them buy them where they could get them cheapest or build them where they would cost least, they would never let them fly the American flag? And, asked the reason, they confessed frankly that the sole reason was that it cost a little more to operate them under the American flag than under a foreign flag.

So that there is no hope of ever having an American merchant marine if you depend upon private enterprise to create it. You can never regenerate the American merchant marine by leaving that field entirely to individual effort, and you can never accomplish it by any reasonable sort of subvention or subsidy. Not one-tenth of the ships of the world, carrying the commerce of the world to-day, are the subjects of subsidy of any kind. No nation on the earth subsidizes the great cargo carrier, the tramp. The ideal cargo carrier is not subsidized by any country, anywhere. That is the kind of ship we want. What do we want with a 56,000-ton passenger ship? We want a 7,000 or 8,000 or 10,000 ton cargo carrier. That is the kind we want to take care of the commodities and products of our country that are weighing down the warehouses and wharves and docks and elevators at every port on the Atlantic and the Gulf, and largely on the Pacific, too, I take it. I have no returns from the Pacific coast.

At Baltimore the railroad company is absolutely refusing to take shipments of grain over that road for export, because it can not move. The elevators are loaded to full capacity with stock on hand, 4,260,000 bushels, and cars on tracks awaiting unloading. There was a grain embargo by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad raised only a week ago. That information came from William P. Ryan, collector of customs.

It was said here that these rates are high, these conditions are not satisfactory, because you can not unload the vessels on the other side, you can not get labor, there are delays, vessels going to ports will wait weeks and weeks and days and days for the reason that there are not men and means to discharge the cargo. Here is an article from the New York Times of February 7, which gives the latest information on that phase of the subject:

SHIP CONGESTION ABATED—LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PREPARED TO UNLOAD CARGOES PROMPTLY.

WASHINGTON, February 6.

The British Embassy to-day issued this statement:

"You may make public the fact that congestion at and in the port of London has now greatly abated, and only a very few ships are now at Gravesend awaiting berth and delays to which vessels have formerly been subjected need no longer be expected. Labor is sufficient for necessities of the port. At Liverpool delays are less than they were, and they will be further reduced owing to arrangements being made by a committee representing the principal port authorities of Great Britain."

Mr. President, we read something in the papers, also, regarding the recent situation in that part of the waters surrounding England and Ireland, and the New York American very appropriately heads an editorial of the 6th: "A clinching argument for more ships," which I desire to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks:

A CLINCHING ARGUMENT FOR MORE SHIPS.

The German submarine raid on the west coast of England, and the subsequent warning that British merchant vessels were subject to submarine attack, ought to be a final argument in favor of our immediate acquisition of an American merchant marine, for it shows that we can no longer depend upon British shipping as a means of safe and adequate transportation for our trans-Atlantic commerce to North European ports. And it ought to show us that we should give up the weak policy of depending upon any other nation for that service at a time when any day may bring further belligerents into the conflict and further reduce the already limited tonnage at our disposal.

It has been our clear duty ever since the war broke out six months ago to prepare for just such a situation as now seems to confront us, for it is no proper course for us as a great Nation with an enormous foreign commerce to depend upon the strength or the good will of nations fighting for their lives for the maintenance of our oversea trade. That is safe only in our own keeping even in times of peace, and in times of war is hardly safe even there.

So long as England was clearly able to hold command of the high seas she could afford us tonnage for our needs. And our clear duty was not our urgent necessity. There was an excuse, if not a justification for our dilatory procrastination.

But now the German submarines off the port of Liverpool have shown us that we can no longer depend upon the countless merchant fleet of England to carry our merchandise. Our own ships under our own flag, protected by our Government despite the German threats, which it is unwise to take too seriously, are necessary to our trade.

That solicitude for the American workman which seems to be felt by our legislators of both Houses at Washington ought to come into active operation in the face of the warning of the German submarines. For a stagnation of our export trade just now, when thousands of men and women are out of employment here, would be a calamity to working America hard to estimate as to its extent and tragic severity.

In other words, ships flying our flag may do business in safety in those waters, whereas the only ships which are available to us to-day, namely, ships flying foreign flags, and especially the flag of any of these belligerents, might not be undisturbed in those waters. That is a condition which emphasizes the significance, the importance, the necessity of the United States providing in some way for taking care of our commerce. I hold that to be a duty of this Government, not by way merely of taking advantage of conditions in the Old World in order that we may be benefited, but because there are people who will need the foodstuffs of this country, which they can get nowhere else, in order to survive. By way of illustration, England buys over the ship's side four out of five loaves of the bread she consumes. She imports more than one-half of her butter, cheese, and eggs; about two-fifths of her meat; £250,000,000 annually is the value of her importations of food, drink, and tobacco.

We ought to be in position to serve the crying needs of the people who are confronted with starving conditions. You can not do it in any other way than by creating a merchant marine under the flag of this country which will have access to every sea on every portion of this globe. It is our duty to put ourselves in position to supply the wants of the people of the earth who must have food and who must wear clothes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is touching upon a very interesting phase of the problem. He says that American ships will go into any waters of the world and into any port. One of the chief objects is to carry American grain to foreign markets. Does the Senator from Florida propose that a Government ship, if this act is passed, loaded with grain destined to Hamburg, should undertake to make that voyage in defiance of the efforts of other belligerents to prevent food from reaching their enemies' armies? What would be the situation under those circumstances?

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, Mr. President, I do not mean to claim that because a vessel flies the American flag she can enter war zones, that she can pass through mined seas, that she can do things that, of course, conditions of war would not permit. I am not speaking with reference to ports like Hamburg, except that she may be escorted there; I do not know what arrangements may be made with reference to that. I understand neutral ships go to Bremen. Certainly, however, as to Rotterdam, as to Italian ports, as to South American ports, as to ports that are not absolutely blockaded, where there is no prohibition——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I can not see any objection to going to South American ports. That is the proposition that was first proposed by the President in his message. But suppose a Government ship were loaded with a cargo of copper, which is one of the important commodities and about the shipment of which there has recently been some discussion, consigned to a neutral port in Europe, and it was charged by one of the belligerents that its ultimate destination was the enemy's country?

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course I do not mean to say, Senator, that because a vessel flies our flag she has any business to violate any of the conditions of neutrality or any of the provisions of international law.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there is another phase of the matter. Germany, for instance, has announced that it proposes to prevent foodstuffs from going to England. Does the Senator suppose that she is going to modify that attitude because foodstuffs are carried upon a ship of the Government of the United States under this act?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think unquestionably, Mr. President, that a vessel flying our flag is in a much safer position in those waters surrounding England and Ireland than would be the vessels which carry our commodities to-day flying even the English flag, perhaps.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator in that regard. There is no doubt that it could be safer and still not be very safe. If this great nation, engaged in the struggle for very existence, not merely making talk, means what she says—that she proposes to prevent food from going to England—I see no reason why she would modify that decree because the food comes upon a neutral ship or a ship owned by some neutral Government. She might hesitate to involve herself in difficulties with a great power like the United States; but in order to carry out the plan which the Senator from Florida has outlined the United States would have to be prepared to back up its commerce with the power of its Navy. Is that what the Senator proposes to do?

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, I have not gone into that at all, Mr. President. I do not mean to go into that feature. In fact, I had no idea when I arose that I would talk five minutes; but I simply mean, if the Senator will permit me, that merchant vessels carrying our flag will be able to go and come, with reference to all those ports, on a much safer basis, and I do not mean to say that it would be necessary to accompany the vessel with a cruiser or anything of that sort. I do not think that would be necessary. I think that that sort of a vessel would be protected in a way that would make the conditions such that there would be practically no embarrassment regarding the shipment of products even into those waters or those ports.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator seems to be proceeding on the theory, then, if I understand him, that because the ship is a United States ship, owned by the Government of the United States and flying its flag, that very fact would modify these conditions caused by the war in Europe. I fail to understand how that magical effect is going to take place.

Mr. FLETCHER. Simply because——

Mr. POINDEXTER. With the conditions of trade with those countries that the Senator from Florida has mentioned caused by a war that is now in a very acute stage, I fail to understand how merely transferring the ownership of the ship is going to modify——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state his point of order.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator yield for a speech or a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; of course, I do not mean to lose the floor, nor to take up the time of the Senate with subsidiary or imaginary matters.

Mr. STONE. I desire to have the rule enforced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida desire to yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I do not wish to yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield further.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not desire to yield the floor; no, sir.

Now, the Senator, of course, will excuse me from going into that question as to the legal situation, because that has been thoroughly thrashed out before. I want to inquire, Mr. President, the situation as to the pending question. As I understand it, the motion was made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to recommit the bill, with all amendments, to the Committee on Commerce. I offered as an amendment to that to recommit the bill with instructions. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] insisted that that subject should be divided, as I recall the proceedings, and that is the reading of the RECORD as I have it before me. The Vice President at that time agreed to that demand by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the present incumbent of the chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] for giving me this recess of a few moments. I will be as brief as I can and finish the address, which has already lasted some hours. I was saying, Mr. President, that following this special advantage to foreign-built ships came the demand in this country which in due time crystallized into legislation for better and consequently more expensive conditions of operation of our vessels. The result was that we were unable to compete with foreign-built ships conducted under less onerous conditions than those which pertained to the American ships. We lost the ascendency which we had gained. The supremacy of the sea passed into other hands. We have since been attempting to regain it by subsidy.

Mr. President, if we want an American merchant marine we may just as well face the real question, the real difficulty that must be overcome. How can we regain our American marine, our old comparative standing in the tonnage of the world? Undoubtedly we can do it by a ship subsidy which will tax all of the people and make good our deficiency in building and operation.

Second, we can do it by Government ownership; that is, by taxing all of the people a still greater price for building, a still greater price for purchasing, and a still greater price for operation of Government-owned vessels. That is ship subsidy also.

It differs from the former only in the fact that it is a bigger subsidy than any that has yet been contemplated.

The third method that has been suggested is that in our port regulations we can fix the conditions under which the foreign ships may obtain clearance, and, of course, we can compel the foreign ships, in order to depart from our ports—and so far as that is concerned even to enter our ports—to submit themselves to regulations that will correspond with our own. No one doubts our power to do this.

We have the authority to pass regulations that will keep every foreign ship out of our ports, but I assume, without going into an argument, that this could hardly be made workable. Nations have treaties and treaty rights with us. Of course we can modify or break our treaties, but we can not prevent retaliation, and as we are just as much interested in getting our ships into the ports of other countries as they are in passing theirs into our ports, I assume that they would be able to take care of their own shipping interests as against our port regulations.

Hence, if we fail or neglect to adopt either of the first two suggestions we are compelled, if we are to have a merchant marine, to modify the many restrictions and conditions under which ships flying the American flag are allowed to enter the commerce of the world. With the development of our steel industry, the perfection of economic apparatus and machinery, I think we are very rapidly wiping out the difference between the cost of building at home and abroad. If our merchant ships are allowed a more liberal rule of operation they may be able to compete successfully in the carrying trade of the world. That, to my mind, is the only solution, outside of subsidy, of the whole question.

But, Mr. President, if I understood the argument of the Senator from Florida a short time ago, he seemed to think that that was the only remedy; that that was the only process by which we could build up our merchant marine—by the Government purchasing and operating the vessels. I agree with the Senator from Florida that that probably is the only available remedy; that the Government should go into the foreign-trade business of this country; that the Government should operate all of the vessels engaged in the foreign commerce. There is no question about the influence of every line of business upon the Congress of the United States which would be called upon to pay freight charges on the Government-owned vessels. We would be responsive to their demands, and being responsive to their demands the result would undoubtedly be that we would operate those vessels at a loss. If we operated them at a loss, we would drive the other American private-owned vessels out of the carrying trade or compel them to be sold to the Government of the United States. Then the Government must conduct all the foreign commerce of this country, with all its ramifications, with all its complications, with all its competition. It must become embroiled in all the rules that affect or govern trade. Mr. President, there is but one final result; when we get in we will have to stay there. There is no way of getting out. One of the strange features pertaining to the support of this bill is that there are some on this side of the Chamber who are attempting to support it upon the ground that it will result in complete Government ownership and Government operation of the transportation lines of the country. Others are supporting it upon exactly the opposite theory, that the Government will be out of it as soon as the war emergency ends.

Mr. President, I know of no man in the United States who has made a closer study of both American and international transportation and navigation than Mr. J. J. Hill. Few men in the United States have been as studious as he has been for more than 40 years in the investigation of this great problem and the practical application of it in his own business as president of one of the greatest railway systems in the world. He is one who always speaks after great deliberation, and what he may say is worth the attention of any man who desires to increase his knowledge of the problem.

I take from the Journal of Commerce of January 23 extracts from his address at the annual National Foreign Trade Convention on the day previous. Mr. President, I wish to call attention of the Senate to this little excerpt from the address of Mr. J. J. Hill. This is in the Journal of Commerce of January 23, 1915:

ST. LOUIS, January 22.

James J. Hill, chairman of the board of directors of the Great Northern Railway, addressed to-day the second annual National Foreign Trade Convention. Taking for his topic, "Freedom for our foreign trade," Mr. Hill discussed the question of restoring the American merchant marine. He said:

"The one indispensable condition of the restoration, extension, and maintenance of our foreign trade is the provision from some source of adequate ocean carriage. All other difficulties are in process of solution. But merchant ships must be had; our need of them is almost as great as that of other nations for munitions of war.

"In the month of November the exports from the port of New York were $12,000,000 more than the year before. There was an increase of about 300 per cent in exports of food products."

I wish especially to call attention to this, Mr. President, that in the month of November the exports from the port of New York were $12,000,000 more than the year before—I presume it means from the November of the year before—and that there was an increase of 300 per cent in the exports of food products. In other words, the food-product exports of that year were three times as much as they were in the corresponding month of the previous years. Mr. Hill proceeds:

The foreign demand must increase in direct ratio with the exhaustion of supplies in the warring nations. How are these goods, which we desire to sell and others are anxious to buy, to be carried to the oversea markets?

Such slight relief as was afforded by the wise removal of the prohibition of registry for foreign-built vessels has been given. It is hardly a drop in the bucket. Up to the week ended December 26, 1914, American registry had been granted to 105 vessels heretofore operated under foreign control, aggregating 373,840 gross tons. This is not enough to prevent present congestion, and holds out little hope for the supply of future needs.

I know the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] was much exercised concerning the congestion in food products at these terminals, but the table which I read to the Senate shows very clearly that we are exporting during this war, in October, November, December, and January, from two to three times as many bushels of all the different cereals as we exported during the corresponding months of the previous year. That is not all it shows. It shows further, to anyone who knows anything about our surplus, that at the present rate of exportation, if we continue it right along, month after month, we will have exported every bushel of our surplus before the next crop comes in. Therefore there is no emergency, so far as the crop is concerned, and, as I indicated before, we are getting better prices for our products the longer we hold them at those congested ports; and while the benefit of these higher prices will not inure to the farmers, as they have parted, for the most part, with their grain, it will nevertheless be a benefit to American citizens, and those higher prices and that advantage in profit will naturally percolate through the country in some form, so that we will only get the benefit of it.

At the beginning of this year—

Says Mr. Hill—

all charters at New York had been taken for January, and February engagements were not easy to make. Rates had advanced from 40 per cent to 200 per cent above those prevailing before the declaration of war. Many ships are idle because of the risk and high rates of insurance.

Right here I want to pause long enough to say that the insurance rates, which are extremely heavy to those ships passing through a zone that is filled with floating mines—vessels that are liable to go to the bottom of the sea in any voyage they may make—must necessarily very materially increase the cost of freight. It is one of the elements that must be taken into consideration in fixing rates.

I was in hopes when I had brought to the attention of the Senator from Florida the fact that neither of the Secretaries had given us any statement, any evidential fact whatever bearing upon the cost of carrying this freight and the reason for the increased cost, and we ought to have these figures, that he would answer that part of my argument and would give me the basic facts to indicate wherein these freight rates were exorbitant.

The mere fact that they are more than they were two years ago, the mere fact that they seemed excessive as compared with previous years, is no indication whatever that they are greater than they ought to be during these perilous times and under the conditions which I mentioned.

This article goes on to say:

But, aside from this, it is true that American cost of ship construction is from 50 to 100 per cent higher than that abroad; and according to a reported statement of Capt. Robert Dollar, who operates ships in both domestic and foreign trade, it costs about $17,236 more a year to operate a ship of 3,000 tons under the American than under the British flag.

Mr. President, if that is true, and I certainly have no reason to doubt it, and if there is any man in the United States who could speak with authority through investigation on this subject it is Mr. Hill—if that is true, all of that added cost would have to be borne by the Government if it proceeded to purchase vessels. If these foreign-built ships are receiving such exorbitant rates, they will demand exorbitant prices for those ships.

These are the disadvantages under which our foreign trade labors. They must be removed before this country can hope to realize the great opportunities now before it, which are not likely to occur again if now permitted to escape.

The only practical, the only desirable policy for this country is the provision of a sufficient American merchant marine. To buy this by big subsidies is a losing, and in the long run, an unsuccessful game. We can not and we do not want to rely hereafter, as we have so long, upon foreign ships to carry American trade and thus control not only its profits but also its direction and its volume. There are but two recourses; one a merchant marine owned and operated by the Government, the other a merchant marine provided by and for the people.

The former, just now urgently advocated, is an unwise and would certainly be a disastrous experiment. Aside from the complications almost certain to drag us sooner or later into the European conflict, owing to the uncertain and conflicting claims of national neutrality, this policy would be followed by the total destruction of the private shipping interest.

If there is any one thing that it seems to me is apparent to us it is that if the Government-owned ship is to bring back the old rates under the new war conditions, it must necessarily operate at such loss as will drive the other private-owned vessels out of the trade of the United States and compel them to seek a Norwegian or a Danish or a Swedish or a Holland nationality.

Private enterprise can not possibly compete with a Government which pays no interest on the cost of its ships and throws aside considerations of profit and loss. As Lincoln said that the Nation could not continue to exist half slave and half free, so our merchant marine, if once this precedent is set, must inevitably become a Government monopoly.

What is the prospect in this case of economical management and of those lower rates which the advocates of the plan hold out as a bait for its adoption? We have an exact measure of the facts in some compartive railroad statistics. The Panama Railway is entirely owned and operated by the United States. Like most affairs on the Isthmus, it has been handled by honest and competent men in their several lines. We have its official report for the year ended June 30, 1913, to be compared with the statistics of all the railways of the United States for the same period.

The average length of haul was 41-ton miles. There is, therefore, little but through business. But the rate on the Panama line was 3.48 cents per ton per mile as against 0.7268 of a cent for all the railways of the United States. That is, the Government rate was almost five times the rate made by private enterprise over the entire country. The average expenses per mile of road were $44,696, as against $8,939, or five times as great. Aside from the higher cost of coal this line presents few, if any, greater difficulties in operation than other managements have to overcome.

If the entire rate charged to American shippers were handed over to the Panama management to cover the cost of handling their freight at terminals, they would still receive almost four times as much as the railways of the country get. If the Panama rate were established in the United States it would wreck the country. There is not enough money in it to pay such enormous amounts. If the rate charged by the Government on the Panama Railroad were applied to the entire railway ton mileage in the United States, our shippers would have had to pay in 1913 more than $8,000,000,000 additional freight charges. Yet this is what the country would have to do, either directly in rates or indirectly in taxes, to meet the expenses of Government operation.

What is proved true for railways holds good for Government owned and operated ships. The purchase price is nothing as compared to the cost of operation, increased by the necessary weakness of political management, and loaded down at every session of Congress by new laws for the lowering of rates, the raising of wages, and the reduction of hours of labor for employees. Either the people would presently stagger under their new burden or our foreign trade would fall beneath the weight of rates such as those imposed on rail traffic across the Isthmus of Panama.

This method of relief ought to be dismissed by every right-thinking man as a chimera and a menace. There remains, then, only the recourse, as old as human experience and as unfailing, of dependence on private initiative. Give it a chance. It has seemed inadequate only because it has been bound hand and foot by restrictions and regulations unworthy of this enlightened age. The American merchant marine needs just one thing, but that it must have if it is to revive. Put it on an exact equality with the other shipping systems of the world. Let the American citizen be authorized to procure and to operate vessels on the same terms as the citizen of any other country is under its laws, and his ability and enterprise will do the rest.

A firm declaration for a merchant marine subject to no other restrictions than are imposed by the nations which have done the carrying trade of the world is the only demand worthy of this important body and of our country, which stands once more to-day, as to its foreign trade, at a dividing of the ways.

During the delivery of Mr. McCUMBER's speech,

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. For a question, so that I do not lose the floor; that is all.

Mr. REED. That is understood. I ask to have read to the Senate, to go into the RECORD, what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the United States Senate:

Pursuant to the provisions of rule 40 of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice that I propose the following amendment to the Standing Rules of the Senate. Add at the end of rule 22, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the following:

"Not later than the hour of 2 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day, February 19, 1915, all debate upon Senate bill No. 6856 shall cease, and at the time aforesaid, the Senate shall proceed to vote upon said bill and all amendments thereto without further debate. The final vote upon said bill shall be taken not later than 5 o'clock p. m. of said date.

"The foregoing proceedings shall have precedence over all other motions whatsoever."

I will move the adoption of said amendment as soon as permitted by the rules of the Senate so to do.

The purpose of said proposed amendment is to terminate the obstructive tactics now being pursued with reference to the above-named bill, and to cause a vote to be had thereupon at the time above specified.

JAMES A. REED.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I raise the point of order that that can not be received under existing circumstances.

Mr. REED. I will amend by inserting, after "February 19," the figures "1915."

Mr. GALLINGER. I raise the point of order against its reception, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from North Dakota yielded to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GALLINGER. But it is after 2 o'clock.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yielded for nothing that would take me off the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. No business can be received under existing conditions, and I desire to say it is the duty of the Chair, under the rule, to enforce it without attention being called to it. It is after 2 o'clock of the legislative day of February 5, and neither a notice nor any other business can be received or transacted by the Senate without unanimous consent. I call attention——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had in mind whether unanimous consent was given or not when the Senator from Missouri presented it.

Mr. GALLINGER. There was no evidence given of the notice and he knew nothing as to what it was.

Mr. REED. It is merely a question of notice which is now presented to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. REED. The question whether it is legally or properly a notice is to be settled when we come to a consideration of the rule.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the rule provides that a Senator shall not be interrupted for any such purpose, and it is the duty of the Chair, without any Senator calling it to the attention of the Chair, to enforce the rule.

Mr. REED. I have not yielded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor. The Chair had a right to ask if unanimous consent was given.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. Did the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota yielded on condition that he was not yielding the floor.

Mr. STONE. I raise the question of order that the Senator can not yield the floor for the introduction of new business on any condition.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have raised the same point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the very point I made.

Mr. STONE. I now ask for the recognition of the Chair to take the floor in my own right.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not yielded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair said the Senator from North Dakota did not yield the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not yield, and I stated that I would not yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the Official Reporter to read what transpired at the time the junior Senator from Missouri made the request of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. STONE. I do not press it further. I withdraw it.

Mr. REED. I want to say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a moment. The Official Reporter will read.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is withdrawn.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand it is withdrawn, and it is not necessary for the reporter to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the junior Senator from Missouri withdrawn his request?

Mr. REED. I did not withdraw my notice but my colleague withdrew his request, because I stated to him what I had said to the Senator from North Dakota that I would not take him off his feet.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right. Now, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The notice has been read, and it will go into the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has not a right to give the notice, and I make the point of order that it is not in order to present it at the present time.

After the conclusion of Mr. McCUMBER's speech,

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it is pertinent at this point to call attention to what occurred three or four days ago, when a Senator on that side, criticizing some statement or lack of statement in the RECORD, said that no Senator was entitled to the floor until he had first addressed the Chair and been recognized by the Chair; and it was insisted that the fact of the Senator addressing the Chair and of the Chair recognizing him should be stated in the RECORD. Since that time that rule of procedure has been followed.

There is another rule of procedure, in addition to the one referred to, which has been now formally established, namely, that one Senator can not interrupt another Senator who has the floor for the purpose of making a speech, and that if a Senator having the floor yields to another to do more than ask a question and permits him to make extended remarks, he thereby loses the floor. I regard that as a proper rule, for otherwise a Senator in possession of the floor could farm out his time and hold the floor indefinitely. Now, applying that rule to what has just occurred, we find the facts to be that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], having the floor in his own right, yielded, as he said, to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] to ask a question. Thereupon the Senator from Illinois, without objection on the part of the Senator from North Dakota, launched into what promised to be an interminable dissertation. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] made a point of order that inasmuch as the Senator from North Dakota had permitted an interruption of that extended character, he had in fact surrendered the floor. The Chair sustained the point of order, and I then immediately addressed the Chair, desiring to take the floor in my own right; and, being recognized, I now hold the floor in my own right. Because of the confusion incident to this proceeding, I have made this explanation, that the RECORD may show the facts. So much for that.

THE FLAG.

Mr. President, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has spoken of the protection the American flag affords to ships above which it flies. Referring to the German proclamation establishing what is called a "war zone" around the British Islands, the Senator said that the American flag at the masthead of American vessels would be of the greatest value. Undoubtedly that should be true, and undoubtedly it would be true if only American vessels carry our flag. But if other nations are permitted to carry it—if it can be indiscriminately used by vessels of all nations—then the value of the flag, if not entirely lost, is greatly diminished, and especially is that true in the circumstances of the present time. Only the other day a British ship lowered her own flag and lifted that of the United States. Why was that done? Is it not proof that the Stars and Stripes afford some special protection to whatever ship the flag is over?

Mr. President, I wonder if there are Senators who are oversensitive about American citizens purchasing a ship owned by the citizens or subjects of a belligerent, fearing that such a purchase might involve us in war, who do not feel their sensitive natures shrink when the ships of a foreign country—particularly those of a certain country—fly our flag for their protection. Yes; there are Senators who overflow with apprehension that we may find ourselves in serious international complications if we permit our flag to fly above ships purchased by Americans—purchased in good faith and for a valuable consideration—and yet take no alarm if we permit a foreign Government or shipowner to fly the flag for their protection.

Mr. President, if the Stars and Stripes can protect a British or German or French ship from some of the hazards of war, would not the flag still better protect a ship owned by American citizens or by a corporation organized under the authority of this Congress? Is it possible we have in this country those who think it is all right for a foreign country to fly the American flag over its ships for their protection and yet have a "conniption fit" when we talk about flying our own flag over our own ships? An argument on this line in favor of such a misuse of our flag would at least sound less offensive in my ears if made in the British Parliament or German Reichstag or in the newspapers of foreign countries than when it is made anywhere in America. For one, I am woefully tired of this perennial proforeign propaganda. I am for America—our America—above all the world. The kind of men we need now and always need are men who stand uncompromisingly for America and American rights. I look with profound disdain upon those who are forever talking about things and looking out for things more in the interest of another country than of our own. Such men—God! I can not properly express myself about them in parliamentary terms.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. I decline to yield. When I stand here and see on the faces of Senators, as I now do, a smile half of shame and half resentment, I am not surprised; but I shall not be deterred or pooh-poohed into silence. I care little for the opinions of American citizens who are not first and always really, truly, bravely American. Are you really afraid that we are going to get into trouble with somebody?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. STONE. I do not. Mr. President, is it possible that we have in this country a large number of men who are actuated more by their sympathies for foreign nations—some for one, some for another—than by the impulse of American patriotism? It does look too much that way. We have men so afraid of international complications that they are unwilling, even though we remain within our rights as a neutral under international law, to put our flag over ships honestly owned by our own people and send them on the high seas to serve the commercial needs and promote the commercial opportunities of our people. Instead of voicing a courageous patriotism we find them manufacturing appeals to alarm the timid and create a public sentiment against a great progressive movement of the Government to restore our shipping industries and revitalize our moribund merchant marine. I believe every thoroughbred American feels as I do about this, whatever men of weak hearts or foreign sympathies may think about it.

Mr. President, I hold in my hands the Des Moines Register and Leader, perhaps the most influential Republican paper in the State of Iowa. I want to read an editorial from that journal of date February 1, 1915:

The Philadelphia Inquirer, speaking for staunch old-time Republicanism and cheering the Republican Senate leaders to filibuster against a Government-owned merchant marine, says—

This Inquirer is a paper quite familiar to the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

Mr. PENROSE. I know it very well.

Mr. STONE. He knows it very well, and he has reason to feel a very affectionate interest in it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a good paper.

Mr. STONE. It is a good paper of its kind. [Laughter.] But let me go on with the editorial:

"Very well, let the Republican Senators who are fighting against Government monopoly, against Government ownership, against dangerous international complications accept the term of reproach and wear it as a badge of honor. For they are filibustering in a good cause."

This last, may I say to the Senator from Pennsylvania, is quoted from his chief organ, the Inquirer. Then the Register and Leader proceeds—and I commend this to the senior Senator from Iowa:

All of which may be very magnificent as a demonstration of physical endurance; but is it political war?

When, if ever, has a filibuster done anything but emphasize the eventual victory of the other side? The very desperation of a filibuster is notice to the country at large of the straits in which the filibusterers find themselves.

What must be the inevitable outcome of the filibuster? If the President has the votes, there is time enough to wear out any opposition; an extra session can be called if it is needed.

All that is being accomplished is to force the merchant marine to the front as the test issue of present-day politics and to give the President the advantage of standing for something his Republican opponents have talked the country into believing we ought to have,

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me a passing remark?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STONE. In a moment.

His Republican opponents meanwhile grabbing the hot end of the poker in their own hands with a fight for a subsidized private ownership, while leaving to him the popular plea of Government ownership.

What does the Senator from Pennsylvania wish?

Mr. PENROSE. I only want to say, Mr. President, that I am filled with unspeakable astonishment——

Mr. STONE. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. PENROSE (continuing). That the Senator from Missouri——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. PENROSE (continuing). Who was the most notorious filibusterer in the United States Senate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri declines to yield, and the Senator from Pennsylvania will take his seat.

Mr. STONE. I thought the Senator arose to ask a question.

Mr. PENROSE. Only to express my feelings in a few words.

Mr. STONE. The Senator having expressed them he can take his seat. The article continues:

If the Inquirer can convince itself that the cry of "Government monopoly" can be made into a popular cry in the coming campaign because of a Government-owned merchant marine, the Inquirer has much to learn of the general trend of public opinion.

If the Inquirer can convince itself that the cry of "international complications"—

That is the cry of my distinguished friend the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] imitated in a minor key by divers other Senators who follow his flag. The article goes on:

If the Inquirer can convince itself that the cry of "international complications" is going to scare the American people, it has been giving but little heed to the growing impatience with which foreign interference with our commerce had been received.

The people are not opposed to Government monopoly of a great public service, they are much more fearful of private monopoly subsidized from the United States Treasury; they are not afraid of Government ownership, on the contrary they would welcome the experiment; they are not scared of foreign complications, on the contrary they are ready to risk the venture and invade the markets of the world in any boats they can get.

Now, think of this coming from one of the great Republican journals of the Central West:

If the President and his friends were to choose the situation to their own liking, they could not ask for anything better than for an entirely new issue removed from all that has gone before, themselves appearing before the country in the rolê of promoters of a larger commerce, in American-owned vessels.

In the play for position what have the Republican leaders to hope for if they give the President this escape from the embarrassments of his tariff and other trade legislation? What have the Republican leaders to gain by getting before the country as filibusters against a merchant marine, or against public ownership, or both?

Every word of this editorial is true, and I believe it voices the real American public sentiment, without regard to party. I can not, indeed, understand what you Republicans hope to gain for your party as a whole by your filibuster. I agree with this editorial; and, so far as Democrats are concerned, if we should lower the issue to one of mere partisan politics, I would welcome such an issue with you. My only regret would be that you would subordinate and sacrifice a great public interest to a mistaken belief that you would thereby secure some party advantage—a belief which will bring you only disappointment. I would rejoice in your disappointment, but I do not want to play politics in a matter of such great national concern as this.

Again I say, highly esteeming you Republicans, as I do personally, your intense, uncompromising partisanship makes me ashamed that great men can be so influenced by such a spirit. For the last three or four weeks you have done nothing to help the merchant marine, although you have had every inducement to do your best. You have talked, talked, talked. There is apparently no end to your vocabulary. You talk, but you propose nothing and do nothing. For years you were in power in both Houses of Congress and in control of the Presidency. You saw our merchant marine wasting away year after year, and you did not like it. You regretted it almost as much as we did. You were sorry to see it. I know you were. You said so, and I believed you. But, Senators—and I will come across the aisle as close to you as I can to talk to you—you could not help yourselves.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Democrats would not let us.

Mr. STONE. You were so environed that it was impossible for you to move out independently. You could not do it without crossing a boundary that you were forbidden to cross. You were so hampered by the special interests that surrounded you and held you in bondage that you could not move if you wanted to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. SHERMAN. The term "special interest" has an especially offensive signification in American politics, and it is language, when it is imputed to a Senator, that is unworthy. The Senator says we are held in the bondage of special interests. I do not know, in the State of Missouri, which is across the river from my State, what the definition is, but I do know what it is in many of the Western States, and I think I know what it is in the public press. It indicates that the interests are corrupt that surround the Senators to whom he refers; it would indicate that there is a corrupt influence about Senators by special interests. If that is not true, I ask that the Senator disavow any such purpose.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to state, further, before I get through the question of personal privilege, that if the Senator means by that that any improper motives actuate the Senators on this side of the Chamber, or the junior Senator from Illinois, I resent it as being utterly and boundlessly away from the truth, of which the Senator appears to have very slight acquaintance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have to call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the second paragraph of Rule XIX.

Mr. STONE. What does the Senator say?

Mr. SHERMAN. Shall I restate it?

Mr. STONE. No; I have heard enough of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair made an observation to the junior Senator from Illinois, that the language he used toward the Senator from Missouri is a violation of clause 2 of Rule XIX.

Mr. STONE. Then the Chair did not hold that I violated the rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair means that he is not aware there is any meaning to special interests, as implied by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. STONE. I absolve the Senator entirely. I had no individual reference to him or any other particular Senator. I could not have done that without violating the proprieties. I was speaking of his party as it is organized and managed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I accept the explanation. It was an unfortunate combination of words that happened to fall in the Senator's way.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. STONE. For a question.

Mr. PENROSE. There are all kind of painful stories about special interests that own the boats that the Government is called on to buy. There are all kinds of very painful stories about a prominent banking firm in close contact with the Treasury Department which has an interest in these vessels. Those stories daily gain definite, crystallized form. I hope the Senator pays no attention to them. I certainly do not.

Mr. STONE. Is the Senator asking me a question?

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senator whether he pays any attention to these well-defined rumors regarding the ownership of vessels the Government is called upon to buy?

Mr. STONE. I do not pay the least attention to them, for I know they are not true.

Mr. PENROSE. I know the Senator's colleagues over in the House are already greatly worried about the character of those rumors—the Democratic Members of the House, many of them.

Mr. STONE. Am I to understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania is in close confidential relations with Democratic Members of the House of Representatives?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; I am in the sense that to-day I have learned that many of the Senator's party in the House of Representatives fear that these stories may be a matter of serious party embarrassment in the campaigns to come.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will not ask the Senator to say what Democratic Representatives were so embarrassed.

Mr. PENROSE. Of course, it would be improper for me at this time to indicate the names of the gentlemen with whom I have talked.

Mr. STONE. And imprudent.

Mr. PENROSE. And imprudent, perhaps, because it might prevent me from getting further information. But I state the fact that there are Democratic Representatives to-day worried by the possibility of possible scandal in connection with the extraordinary efforts to press this bill to final passage.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it is impossible for me to believe, notwithstanding the assertion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that Democratic Members of the House of Representatives have come to him and laid their heads upon his expansive bosom and unfolded their secret fears to him.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me, perhaps I ought to correct——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. STONE. For a question.

Mr. PENROSE. I ought to have said that they did not come to me personally. The information was brought to me to-day——

Mr. STONE. Then we have it——

Mr. PENROSE. On reliable authority——

Mr. STONE. We have it now as coming in a different way——

Mr. PENROSE. By Members of the House of Representatives that it was current talk to-day that such stories were calculated to embarrass the Democratic Party in the future.

Mr. STONE. At first we were informed and given to believe that Democratic Representatives had come to the Senator from Pennsylvania and selected him as the receptacle of their confidences, but now he says he got it in some other way and from some other source. It came circling round about until it finally got to the ears of somebody, who told it to somebody else, and then it finally got to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. It was thoroughly reliable.

Mr. STONE. The Senator says it was thoroughly reliable; that is, he means to say it was thoroughly satisfactory to him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me?

Mr. STONE. Oh, I will yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not from Pennsylvania, but from Illinois.

Mr. STONE. The Senator is from a somewhat better State politically.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the editorial, Mr. President, I wish to inquire what the Senator from Missouri thinks of this sentence, which he quoted with considerable unction and with manifest signs of pleasure: "The President has the votes"; are you one of them?

Mr. STONE. I am. I am for this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. STONE. I am for this bill from start to finish, because I think it is a right move in the right direction. I am for it, and I am glad the President of the United States favors it.

Will the Chair indulge me a moment—the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] desires to speak to me.

Mr. President, when I took the floor I expected to hold it for a few minutes only, having a purpose in mind. After this brief conversation with the Senator from Florida, in charge of the bill, I do not care to proceed further at this time.

[Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

WATER-POWER SITES ON PUBLIC LAND.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senate for a few minutes. My primary object is to have incorporated in the RECORD a letter from the honorable Secretary of the Interior, for which I bespeak very serious consideration. I wish to say that I very deeply deplore the useless and senseless killing of time that has been going on here for several weeks past in the form of an avowed filibuster. I think it is very deplorable and detrimental to the public interest, and no good purpose is being attained by it. I believe that our friends on the other side, the Republican Senators, ought to let the pending measure come to a vote on its merits, and let it pass or not pass, as the vote may result. I believe the American people and the interests of the country demand it, for the reason that there is other important legislation awaiting the attention of the Senate at this session of Congress, which, while not minimizing the importance of the pending bill, is of equally great importance to the people. You are making a mistake, on the other side, in conducting this filibuster.

There is a measure pending before this body—House bill 16673, the water-power bill—which is of very great importance to the material welfare of the great Western States of this country. It is of equally as great importance to the West as the shipping bill or any other legislation pending at this session can possibly be, and I believe, in the interest of fairness and justice, those Senators who are opposed to the pending measure ought to let it come to a vote, in order that we can take up other legislation which is of equally great and vital importance.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the Senator to say that he intends to move to substitute the bill he refers to for the pending bill?

Mr. MYERS. No; when I say that I will say it loud enough for the Senator to understand me. He will hear it when I say it.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not quite catch what the Senator meant.

Mr. MYERS. I do not favor the abandonment of the consideration of the bill that is now before this body; I am heartily in favor of it; but I do urge that it ought to receive consideration on its merits and that it should be allowed to come to a vote on its final passage and disposition in order that other pressing matters may receive attention.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. LIPPITT. I was just wondering if the Senator from Montana felt that way last week when quite clearly the Senators on the other side were filibustering against the bill coming to a vote. It seems to me it is a very recent conversion of the Senator if he thinks a vote should be taken on the bill, when he and his friends prevented a vote from being taken for nearly a week.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator may wonder about a great many things; but a great many people are wondering a great deal about his conduct, and they have cause for it.

I send to the desk and ask to have read by the Secretary a letter from the honorable Secretary of the Interior, which I commend to the careful consideration of our friends, the opposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 25, 1915.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have this morning had an interview with one of the most prominent hydroelectric engineers in the country, who came to me stating that he was prepared immediately to put $10,000,000 into hydroelectric development in the West, and that this would be followed by an additional $30,000,000 within the next two years, provided the public lands power bill was passed immediately by Congress. I am satisfied that this man speaks the truth. He has told me of two western Senators who have knowledge of the facts as he presented them to me.

Within a week another engineer has come to me saying that he was prepared, in the event of the passage of this bill, to make a similar investment of approximately $15,000,000.

In view of these facts, I make bold to urge upon you that an appeal be made to your colleagues in the Senate to permit a limited time for debate upon the measure which you have already reported out of committee, so that the development of the West may not be retarded.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of the importance of this matter and the Senator's personal interest, is he not prepared to move to take up the bill?

Mr. MYERS. No; I will make a counterproposition by asking unanimous consent now that the pending measure and all amendments thereto be voted on upon the 27th day of this month.

Mr. GALLINGER. That would necessitate another roll call, and I shall have to object.

Mr. MYERS. I withdraw the request, then, because I do not want any more dilatory tactics from the other side. We have had enough of them.

Mr. President, I want the people of the country, and especially the people of the West, to understand what this filibuster is keeping them out of in the way of wholesome and substantial legislation. I want them to understand what the Senate could be doing for their benefit if the opposition would allow the measure which has now been before the Senate for weeks past to come to vote in an orderly way, that we might then take up other legislation of vital interest to the country, for which the great West is crying, and which is full of potential possibilities for great development and untold good. This filibuster is standing in the way, and those who conduct it are responsible.

In this connection I ask to have read and printed in the RECORD an editorial on the same subject from the Great Falls Daily Tribune, of Great Falls, Mont., the leading newspaper of northern Montana and one of the leading newspapers of the great Northwest, an able exponent of the best thought of the West.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE WATER-POWER BILL.

The water-power conservation bill and the coal-land conservation bill, formulated by Secretary Lane and the Interior Department, passed by the House and amended by the Senate committee, are among the administration measures which it was hoped would be passed at this session. They are both good measures, well thought out, and framed in the interest of western development. The Tribune has had occasion to speak in approval of these bills heretofore. We believe they deserve the support of broad-minded western Congressmen and Senators. We are therefore sorry to note that there is considerable opposition to both of them in the Senate; but this opposition is more emphatic in the case of the water-power bill. The impression at Washington is that the water-power bill can not pass at this session, and the opposition to the bill comes from large power interests which are particularly opposed to that clause of the bill which provides that at the end of a 50-year period all rights granted by the Government to power sites on the Government lands revert to the United States. We see no reasonable objection to such a clause. Fifty years is certainly a long enough time for any power company to recover its capital investment and a good profit besides. In half a century most of us will be dead. If the citizenship of the future wish to operate such public utilities for themselves they will no doubt find a way to do it. If they prefer to continue private ownership at the end of the 50 years, there is nothing to prevent them extending the period of the franchise on such terms as are deemed mutually satisfactory between the public and the franchise holder.

There are a number of other features in this bill that appeal to us very strongly. One is that during the first years of the 50-year lease, which the Government offers to capitalists desirous of obtaining power sites on the Government domain for the purpose of developing and using power, the Government makes only a nominal charge in the way of rental or royalty. These initial charges are only enough to pay the cost of supervision. Later they increase as the power company becomes better able to pay them. Moreover, these charges decline as the company reduces its price to the public for electric current. Finally the State in which the water power is located gets a considerable share of the rentals for the purpose of making new development of its resources.

As the matter stands at present it is not possible to get private capital to interest itself in power sites on public lands. There is a deadlock between the Government and private capital. The latter will not take the chances involved in such improvements. The proposed water-power bill is in the nature of a compromise between those who argue that the Government should divest itself of all rights in such water-power sites by a sale in perpetuity and those who wish the Government to take the position that they will only lease for short-term periods such power sites, with frequent readjustments of rentals. The present bill seems to us to be fair enough to capital, so that it may be willing to invest, with a surety as to just what conditions it must meet in the next 50 years, and yet it preserves to the public an option of ownership after that period if it then desires to exercise such option.

We hope that this water-power bill as amended by the Senate, which has added some valuable features, while not changing the principles of the bill, will receive the united support of the Montana delegation in Congress. This State is particularly interested in the bill, because it has a large amount of undeveloped water power in its forest reserves and on the public domain. We also desire to congratulate Secretary Lane on his part in drafting a practical working compromise between conflicting views on this question that seems to us to merit the approval of all candid, broad-minded citizens of the West who desire to see this section of the country developed during their lifetime. We feel sure that we are safe in stating that the bill has the approval of a majority of the citizens of Montana who have studied its provisions and understand the present situation, which amounts to a dog-in-the-manger attitude on the part of the Government, that will neither develop these water powers itself or permit private capital to do it.

Mr. MYERS. I submit these things for the consideration of our friends on the other side of the Chamber. I favor keeping the shipping bill before the Senate until a vote is had upon its final disposition, and will insist upon it, but if its opponents will let us come to a vote upon it there might possibly still be time to pass the appropriation bills and to give consideration to the great measure I have mentioned. If they do not do it, the responsibility is theirs.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the yeas and nays have been ordered for the vote, and I ask that the roll be called.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16673) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move to lay the motion on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 16673 and the Senator from Florida moves to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is this subject debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to lay on the table is not debatable. The Secretary will call the roll.

The question was taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). As the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] has not voted, I withdraw my vote, having a pair with that Senator.

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—49.

Ashurst	La Follette	Ransdell	Stone

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 5295) to amend existing legislation providing for the acquisition of a site and the construction of a building thereon for the accommodation of the post office, United States courts, customhouse, and other governmental offices at Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CLARK of Florida, Mr. BURNETT, and Mr. AUSTIN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

Joint resolution No. 48, of the City Council of Providence, approved February 5, 1915.

Resolved, That whereas the progress of mechanical invention, the practical application of scientific discoveries, the marvelous growth of commerce, the facilities of transportation, and the intimate relation of banking interests have made the nations of the earth so dependent for their prosperity one upon the other that, like the human body, disease or disorders in one part vitally affects other parts.

That therefore, when certain nations have carried on for months a fierce, relentless, and indecisive warfare, whose sole fruits have been untold suffering to noncombatants, a serious impairment of the capital and industry of all nations, and a waste that it will take a long time to repair, a decent regard for the opinion of mankind would indicate that those nations might, if proposed to them in a respectful and dignified manner, consider as neither impertinent nor improper recommendations of the neutral nations of the earth looking to the settlement of controversies now existing and to the restoration of peace: Be it therefore

Resolved by the City Council of Providence, as the representative of a community intensely interested in the welfare of humanity, a community whose bountiful charity has been bestowed for the alleviation of sufferers by disasters in many lands, whose citizens, by reason of its great manufacturing business enterprises have felt, as have thousands of other communities throughout the world, the blighting effects due to the conditions in Europe and the general lack of business confidence due to the war, hereby requests the Senators and Representatives from this State in the Congress of the United States to urge, if they do not deem such a course inconsistent with their public duties, upon the President of the United States the advisability of using his influence with the other nations of the earth not now at war to unite with this Nation in the making of such recommendations to the belligerents as may, under the blessing of God, bring back to the world peace and industrial prosperity and end the ruin and waste of war.

W. C. PELKEY, City Clerk.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I think I understand something of the spectacle that the conduct of the United States Senate during the last month presents to the American people. The outsider who casually looks upon the Senate or reads its proceedings, not understanding the motives or the influences which are at work here, would necessarily feel that the business of the country was being delayed by our procedure. The administration program is being delayed, but the good of the country is being conserved. Personally, I have never been exceedingly favorable to a filibuster. I have felt that the rules of every deliberative body should be such that there could come a time when every matter upon which a majority of the Senate desired to act could be reached. I realize, however, that all questions that are brought before the Congress are finally discussed in the United States Senate. The very fact of the large number of Members of the House of Representatives precludes the possibility of true deliberation. The history of the United States justifies the procedure of the Senate. At times this procedure has seemed unwarranted, in that it has delayed the vote after what has seemed too long consideration, but the record of legislation shows that good has finally resulted.

I think the history of the United States Senate under its rules has justified those rules, and whatever occasions like this have arisen in our history have been referred to in after years as matters not necessarily nor usually to be regretted, but they have been looked back upon as times when great questions were settled correctly.

I realize that there are Senators in this body who are exceedingly impatient with what seems to be a prevention of a vote on this question. I know that many of them have expressed themselves on the floor as being entirely out of patience with those Senators who have seen fit to address themselves to the Senate.

It is unfortunate that night sessions have been held, and that the majority saw fit at the very outset of this discussion to announce a policy which made it absolutely necessary for the minority to exercise to the limit its parliamentary powers and privileges. At the beginning I was not in favor of a filibuster, but I was in favor of the widest, freest, and fairest legitimate discussion of this great question.

When, however, notice was served upon this side that this bill was to be put through without regard to the opposition, when it was determined that the rules of discussion should be changed, and the debate was to be limited by the arbitrary decision of the Chair to the effect that if a Senator yielded for a question such as had been asked in all of our history—if he had yielded to that character of debate which has been most productive of good, because it brought out points in the controversy that would not have been brought out in any other way—if he did that, he had yielded the floor and would be charged with having made a speech; and where the rule was invoked that a Senator could speak but twice on one legislative day, and that day was prolonged by the recess for days—calendar day after calendar day—the whole object being to wear the Senate out, and that before there was the slightest demonstration of any desire or intention to delay action upon the bill, when these tactics were employed by the majority then the minority was justified in resisting to the very limit of its ability.

Mr. President, I regard this bill as a matter of the most supreme importance to the United States. I can not quite understand the thought which must actuate some Senators when they would force a measure through as though it were a trivial thing, force it through on the assumption that they have the votes to do so, which it appears they do not have, but which they claim to have, and force it through, too, without due deliberation.

I am prepared, I think, to state that not since I have been a Member of Congress has there been a more intelligent, a more necessary, and more desirable discussion of any measure than that which has been presented on this subject during the last four weeks. I realize that it is almost like a farce for a man to be obliged to stand here all night, or even during the daytime, and speak to empty seats; but I submit, Mr. President, that, outside of the night sessions, there has not been an hour during the last four weeks that has not been well spent in discussion. The night session has been forced upon the Senate, and then Senators upon that side complain because of long speeches. This debate might have ended at this session of Congress, a vote might have been obtained, if the ordinary methods had been followed and the business of the Senate been confined to those hours when a man can and ought properly to work.

But, Mr. President, it does not become some Senators, who have become most impatient and who have said most about changing the rules with an idea of compelling Senators to attend all meetings of the Senate, when we understand that a great number of those Senators will be found to have spent during the last two years fewer days on the floor of the Senate than any other like number of its Members. I myself believe it would be a good thing for Senators to come and remain here during the reasonable hours of labor, show some attention to the business of the Senate, and thus demonstrate that they are in fact in earnest in their declarations of requiring attention to the deliberations of the Senate.

I said, Mr. President, that this was an important bill. I think it is one of the most important bills that has come or that can come before Congress. I recognize that there is an honest difference of opinion as to whether the United States Government should engage in the over-seas trade as a proprietor, as an individual would engage. Some men have felt and do feel, honestly, that we are embarking upon a dangerous enterprise when we start out in that business. The history of the Democratic Party would indicate that it, at least as a party, should be slow in getting into this particular kind of business, in doing the things which ought, according to Democratic doctrines, to be done by the people themselves.

But, Mr. President, I would not feel like making a persistent effort, in season and out, to resist that proposition if I felt certain that the time had arrived when a majority of this Senate wanted to vote on that particular question. There is, however, something more involved than Government ownership. At this time, when all Europe is disturbed by war, when the seas of the world are covered with the wrecks of war, for us to embark a ship or a number of ships out into that troubled sea is to me a most unwise, a most improper, thing to do.

Why, we have been insisting, sir, that we are for peace. If the President of the United States has obtained any favor with the people—and he has—it has been upon the theory that he has been safe in regard to our foreign relations, so far as keeping us out of war is concerned. In Mexico he has gone upon the assumption that every dollar's worth of property owned by American citizens had better be sacrificed than for the United States to take any chances in that troubled country. He has said to Americans, "Go home; we can not protect you there." The President has said that he shall not send the troops to Mexico, although he did send them, because he wants to keep out of trouble. He does not want to become complicated in Mexican affairs. Mexicans may shed their blood; they may destroy the property of American citizens; but he will not offer resistance or protection. He is going to keep out of trouble.

That is in substance what he has been saying. Here, with a much more difficult problem before us, with an international strife that makes the Mexican affair dwarf into absolute insignificance, the President of the United States is trying to get permission from Congress to send ships out in the midst of that conflict, as he says, for the benefit of American shipping.

Mr. President, I think this matter is so great and so grave that it should be considered, and it should be considered in its discussion by more Senators than attend the meetings of this Senate at any time. I can not vote for this measure, and I feel that I am justified in resisting its passage until at least I am satisfied that a majority of this Senate honestly, fairly, and intelligently desire to vote upon it.

There have been several bills before this Senate, and any one of them would have been signed by the President if it had been passed by the two Houses, and yet we are now in the third edition, which is radically different from either of its predecessors. Mr. President, I have not as much confidence in the business judgment of the President and his advisors as I ought to have before I can rely upon it; as I must have before I can rely upon it in a matter affecting the vital interests of our country.

I recall the experience we have had with bills presented in this Congress. I know how they have been affected, I remember how they have been considered; and never in our history, I believe, not excepting the administration of Andrew Jackson, has there been such a partisan administration as the present one. Every measure, practically, has been made a party measure and enacted through an Executive-dominated caucus. There has been the assumption that the Republican side of this Senate is composed of men such as were described by Mr. Wilson in his speech at Indianapolis—ignorant and unpatriotic—and that all wisdom is in the Democratic Party and on the other side of this aisle. Mr. President, I think a comparison of the men themselves, Senator with Senator, an understanding of the men themselves, would dispel that argument. That aisle does not divide the intelligence nor the patriotism of this body. But proceedings have been had upon the theory that the Republicans are ignorant and not entitled to the confidence of the majority.

But that is not all, Mr. President. The majority side of this Senate has assumed that only a few of those—a majority of themselves—have sufficient intelligence to control the legislation of the Congress. So we find a majority of the majority conspiring in a caucus, passing resolutions favoring legislation, at which caucus not all of their own members were present, yet those resolutions were intended to bind the whole of the majority to support this measure.

Democratic Senators have been showing a great deal of feeling because certain Democratic Senators have seen fit to declare their independence and say that they proposed to follow the dictates of their own consciences in reference to legislation. Those men practically have been read out of the party; they have been condemned as traitors to the cause, yet even before that occurred these Senators were negotiating and holding conferences with certain Senators on this side. What arguments were used, what consideration offered, for the purpose of getting these few Republicans to go over to them I do not know, but the majority seems to have been willing to sacrifice every principle of the first two bills in order to secure the support of two or three Senators sitting with Republicans. If that is high principle, then I can not quite understand it.

Mr. President, I said that I had no confidence, or little confidence, in the business ability of the President and his advisers. I might have confidence in Senators on that side if those Senators would speak and vote their own convictions on this floor, but in the terrible arraignment of Democratic Senators yesterday by Democrats who had associated with their fellows—and who knew them well, knew them as we know them and as we talk with them personally—when in that arraignment they said to their colleagues that not 12 Democratic Senators are in favor of this bill, and it undoubtedly is true, when this charge is admitted by the silence of the defendants, can we say that a majority is for the bill? Mr. President, is it not a serious thing to have this matter decided by Senators with such convictions?

This bill did not originate in any party platform. The people have not expressed themselves on it anywhere and at any time. There are certain matters, however, upon which they have expressed themselves, but which evidently are to receive no consideration at this time.

But, Mr. President, before I forget it I wish to advert to what I said a moment ago, namely, that I have been willing to come to a vote on this bill at any time when I have felt that a majority of the Senate honestly desired to vote.

This filibuster has resulted in one thing, at least; that is, in demonstrating that when the Senator from Missouri said he had votes enough to pass this bill at the beginning he did not have them. It did result in determining where the majority lay. That was a week ago last Friday. From that time on until Monday afternoon the Democratic Senators filibustered against a vote. They were not ready to vote, and if anything should happen to a Democratic Senator now which would detain him from the Senate the filibuster would at once be transferred to the other side. For more than a week the effort was to put off a vote, because a majority of the Senate during that period would have decided the contest adversely to those Senators who allow the President to control the legislation of the Senate. Therefore for a week we could get no vote, but they did not propose night sessions then; they were content to adjourn from day to day; indeed, they adjourned a day at a time, and thus kept the Senate from considering important measures which could have been hurried. This was done to give time to get their absentees here and in order to obtain votes from this side.

Mr. President, I repeat, what other Senators have charged without denial, that a majority of this Senate are not in favor of this bill. They do not believe in its principles; they believe it is possibly a dangerous experiment to try at this time. Who is asking for it? The President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury. Perhaps I should reverse the names and place the more importunate first.

It appears that the senior Senator from Florida last night read some statements from various collectors of customs, evidently prepared at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that there was a congestion of business at certain ports in the United States. Oh, yes, Mr. President; there have been times during our whole history when there have been congestions of business at our ports. Business congestion in these days sounds good. We ought to be thankful that there is something doing somewhere. That such congestion is temporary already is being demonstrated, because the condition now is not so bad as it was a few weeks ago, and is growing better; but when before did this Government ever undertake to relieve a temporary condition by such proceedings as this?

It is proposed that we shall expend $40,000,000 in the purchase of ships to be used in our over-seas trade. That money, in my judgment, could be better expended for something else the results of which would be surer and more beneficial. Has the Government now so much money that it can take out of the Treasury $40,000,000 and put it into this kind of a venture? Is it wise to add to our already too large indebtedness another bond issue? It finally is paid by the people, and it is a question as to whether we have any right, with the present state of the Treasury, to use this money until the people have had time to consider it and to express themselves upon it. Should this be done by less than a majority sentiment of the Senate?

Who is asking for it, I repeat? Principally the Secretary of the Treasury.

I am amazed sometimes when I hear proponents of this measure say on this floor, or intimate at least, that there are unworthy motives which actuate the opponents of this bill. Why, Mr. President, it is common rumor that the activity of Government officials in reference to this matter is difficult to explain.

I remember that some months ago when the Munsey Trust Co. was formed here in the city of Washington, and a Government official of the Treasury Department was unusually active in its organization and in the deposit of Government funds; I remember that when a national bank in this city had displeased this same Government official, that the funds of the Government were taken out of that bank because there had been an exposition of the methods that had been followed in depositing Government funds in this Munsey Trust Co. I recall that. I recall that at that time, or shortly after that time, deposits of Government money with Kuhn, Loeb & Co. were made. When I recall that Kuhn, Loeb & Co. may be interested in this shipping bill, I am surprised that Senators should intimate that Senators, who, heretofore at least, have had the confidence and respect of their colleagues, should be charged as being influenced by the special efforts of what is known as the Shipping Trust.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield. Mr. President, I want it understood that I do not lose the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Only for an interrogatory.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Just a moment. I remember, last night, on the ruling of the Chair, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] was taken from the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from Michigan that the Senator from North Dakota was taken from the floor upon a statement which appears in the notes of the stenographer, now on the desk of the Presiding Officer:

"Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I yield," and there are the words "the floor," which are stricken out in ink in the transcript before the Chair, "to the Senator from Illinois," and, of course, under that statement he yielded the floor. He was not taken from the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me ask the Chair, did the Chair know that at the time he ruled?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did, and so stated.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I beg pardon. I do not want to dispute the matter with the Chair, but that part was not brought to our attention last evening where the Senator said he "yielded the floor." The claim of the Senator from Missouri was that the Senator from North Dakota had no business to yield the floor for a question or anything else that was not pertinent to the bill, and the Senator from North Dakota was taken from the floor, and another Senator got it. So I want to take no chances on this proposition, if that ruling is to be maintained.

I want to be courteous to the Senator from Illinois and to any other Senator, and I am perfectly willing to yield as far as I can yield without being taken from the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair feels constrained to make the statement that there was no such ruling by the present occupant of the chair, and the RECORD is on the desk here and shows that there was no such ruling. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a question.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire merely to submit an interrogatory to the able junior Senator from Michigan. Upon what information does my able friend base the statement now made from the eminence of his position that Kuhn, Loeb & Co. are interested in the present shipping bill; and, second, upon what information does he base his statement or belief that Kuhn, Loeb & Co., a banking firm of New York, is exercising influence in order to have the bill passed? I confess I did not know the fact, and I would be exceedingly interested, if the Senator has it, to have the information.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The only information I have—and I spoke about this simply because of the charges that have been made—is the common rumor that is circulated throughout the city and throughout the country. I know about the money transactions to which I did refer. Those are matters that have been brought out on this floor. I do know that a member of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. was placed at the head of the Reserve Board; I do know that a brother of a member of that board is interested in ships; I have heard that those ships are for sale. I do know that it will require money to conduct this business on the part of the Government, and I think I know that Kuhn, Loeb & Co. is the friend and favorite of this administration. It has been favored by the Secretary of the Treasury, when compared with the treatment which has been shown to other banks which have not been inclined to truckle to the administration. I am saying this now, Mr. President, not that I know anything will occur—I am simply using it as an answer to those Senators who delight to dwell on suspicions and who assign unworthy motives to those Senators who are opposing this bill. So I am saying, with these rumors afloat, you should be very careful before you charge indirection or improper motives.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no purpose to take the Senator off the floor, but I do not think the Senator wants a false impression to be carried by his remark. He refers to a member of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. as being a member of the reserve board. Does not the Senator know that Mr. Warburg, the gentleman to whom he refers, gave out publicly, over his own signature, a positive declaration that he had dissolved all connection, had no money interests in connection with Kuhn, Loeb & Co.? Now, that being the fact, and I feel that we must take the gentleman's statement, is it fair to endeavor to circulate a statement calculated to bring into disrepute not only Mr. Warburg but the whole administration, by spreading a report that has been utterly and flatly contradicted?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator for calling my attention to the fact that Mr. Warburg had separated or stated that he had separated himself from the company. That, I think, is the fact; I think, at least, it has been so advertised.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a question.

Mr. THOMAS. I was much interested in the Senator's statement about the increase of deposits with the banking house of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. Does the Senator mean that the increase has been due to the transfer to that banking house of Government money?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There has been some increase; the Red Cross money was transferred there, that fund which was in the Treasury and belonged in the Treasury.

Mr. THOMAS. My reason for making the inquiry was due to the fact that I was somewhat surprised if Government funds had been transferred to a private banking institution, inasmuch as money of that sort, Government money, is by law confined in its distribution to national banking institutions.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; I am informed that the Red Cross fund was transferred from the Treasury Department to Kuhn, Loeb & Co.

Mr. THOMAS. Is the Senator able to state what the amount of that fund is?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I am not; but it is considerable.

Mr. THOMAS. Is it a fund under the control of the Treasury Department or the War Department?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. I wish to inquire if the Senator had not heard that Mr. Paul Warburg transferred his interest in Kuhn, Loeb & Co. to a member of his family, and that that was the transfer made which has been heralded abroad with acclaim?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have heard that, too; I did not mention it. I was simply referring to well-defined rumors that are afloat based on circumstances not altogether free from suspicion.

The President, in presenting this matter to the Congress, called it an emergency measure. His idea clearly was to relieve a temporary situation.

If it is true that this was proposed as an emergency measure, or that an emergency exists which requires immediate relief, what can we say as to the possibility or probability of this measure accomplishing that result? It is proposed to either buy or build ships. If we buy them, we must purchase them of somebody who owns them, of course, and that somebody will either have those ships now in operation or they will be idle. Those are very axiomatic propositions.

If they are in operation and the profit from their carriage is so very great, their owners will not readily part with them.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator yields for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I know that the Senator from Michigan is fair above all things. I have the greatest admiration for and confidence in him.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Thank you.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I just wanted to read this in connection with the statement just made——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would like to permit that, but I am very much afraid I would lose the floor.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I did not want to do anything unfair——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I know that, and if the Senator will bring it to me and I find it ought to be presented to the Senate, in order to be fair, I will read it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will hand it to the Senator. It is just a statement in the hearings by Mr. Warburg that I think should be read to the Senate and will immediately set that at naught.

Mr. TOWNSEND. At the request of the senior Senator from New Jersey I refer to a document marked "Confidential. Nomination of Paul M. Warburg." I take it the ban of secrecy has been removed so that it can be made public?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, without question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is a hearing before the Committee on Banking and Currency, United States Senate, Sixty-third Congress, second session. On page 7 the Senator from New Jersey calls my attention to certain language. Mr. Warburg, the gentleman about whom we are talking, was evidently a witness before that committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TOWNSEND. For a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desired the Senator to yield to me so I could ask a question of the Chair without taking the Senator from Michigan off the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota for unanimous consent to address a question to the Chair? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I shall object if the Chair rules that it will take the Senator from Michigan off the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair made the statement that it would be done by unanimous consent if there was no objection.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Rather than have any doubt about it, I will withdraw the paper.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not object to reading the paper. I simply did not desire to have the Senator from Michigan in the position of being taken off the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is that the Senator from North Dakota desires to ask the Chair a question without taking the Senator from Michigan off the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This is an examination conducted by the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] of Mr. Warburg:

Senator BRISTOW. Do you do a mercantile—a checking business?
Mr. WARBURG. No.
Senator BRISTOW. That is, you do not handle accounts?
Mr. WARBURG. No, sir; except for our customers; I mean those corporations whose securities we buy—our customers, and even there we hardly ever do that.
Senator BRISTOW. Yes; you only buy securities and sell them?
Mr. WARBURG. May I say this to you, Senator BRISTOW, before we proceed any further? I am perfectly willing to answer general questions concerning my firm. So far I have not seen any objection to answering your questions.
But, as I wrote in my letter, in answer to Senator POMERENE'S questions which were forwarded to me, I can not discuss the affairs of my firm nor my partners, nor be asked to criticize acts of my partners, either to approve them or in any other way.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The item I refer to is opposite the mark.

Mr. TOWNSEND. A little below that, I see. The mark was above that?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND (reading)—

I am going to leave that firm, as I wrote and informed this committee, although the law does not require me to do so; and I am going to leave my Hamburg firm, although the law does not require me to do so; and I am going to leave every single corporation with which I am connected. More than that, I am going to leave every educational and philanthropic association with which I have been connected, because I think a man who is on that Federal Reserve Board ought to be like Cæsar's wife—he ought to be above suspicion, he ought to be without any entangling alliances.
So you have got to take me as an individual, free from everything, if I become a member of that board. If I should be confirmed, I will be as free of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. as I am of any other firm. The firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. will go on in its business as it has done in the past and as it did a great many years before I became a partner in 1902.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is what I referred to. I thought it was fair to the gentleman who said it that it should be read.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am very glad, indeed, to put in what Mr. Warburg said, which does not alter the situation as far as any statement I have made is concerned. I have not charged Mr. Warburg with any corrupt action.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Not by name.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have simply stated the conditions, and that quotation makes even clearer my statement that a member of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. was nominated by the President for membership on the Reserve Board. Therefore, I am glad to have that gentleman's admission in the RECORD.

This shows one of the dangers of hasty and premature action at this time. We are proposing to embark upon a doubtful enterprise. It is to be embarked upon war-swept seas and under conditions which should cause the Senate to consider carefully, lest our Government be scandalized.

A speech was made in this body the other day which was worthy of more than the casual attention that was given to it. I refer to the speech of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. He called attention to some of the complications that are bound to grow out of Government ownership and control as proposed in the bill. His great wisdom and many years' experience as a Federal judge entitle his opinions on legal and constitutional questions to more than passing attention. He maintains that the duties and powers of sovereign and subject are widely different. What would be proper for the subject to do would be most improper for the sovereign in relation to international matters. He convinced me that what the individual shipowner might do in reference to belligerent countries, what he might do without offending another nation, can not wisely or safely be done by the United States as a shipowner and operator. Sure it is the distinguished Senator's views show most intelligent consideration of this great question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Referring again to the Warburg matter, if Mr. Warburg has transferred his interest in Kuhn, Loeb & Co. to a member of his family, if the remaining members of that firm are his intimate friends and relatives, if he has a brother who is one of the supervising financiers of the Hamburg-American Ship Line, if it appears that Kuhn, Loeb & Co. handle the securities of this line, and if it should appear that this line has 24 ships that were interned in New York and Boston and that they are paying more than $6,000 a day in cash to take care of them, does that make a strong presumption that they would be vitally interested in selling to the United States Government those ships?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It certainly is a suspicious circumstance that the United States at this time ought not to ignore. If ships are to be purchased, as I said a moment ago, they must be purchased of somebody who has them to sell, and nobody will want to sell a ship that is making the amount of money which Senators on that side claim it is making now; at least, they will not sell at a price that the United States can afford to pay.

If the Government is to purchase ships that are not now in commission because of war risks and dangers, if such ships are useless for such cause to their present owners, is it wise for the Government to assume such hazards and against the protest of belligerent nations? Why, sir, I can conceive of no more reckless step which Congress could take. The President professes peace, but this measure invites trouble which may lead to war.

I want my country to be the instrument at the earliest possible moment of adjusting, in the interest of all nations involved, the awful strife now waging in Europe. This measure will not only destroy such possibility, but it may involve our Nation in the conflict.

There has been an effort made to amend this bill so as to catch some votes on this side, but the bait is artificial. How unsubstantial and insincere is the attempt to allay the fears and objections of those who oppose the purchase of ships owned by the subjects of belligerent nations. It proposes that no ships which will involve us in trouble shall be purchased. Who is going to determine that? When is the trouble to be experienced—before we purchase them or after? If it is after, of what value has this provision been? To me the suggestion is worse than folly. It is almost tantamount to reckless, if not worse, disregard of public duty.

Mr. President, I am in profound sympathy with all sane efforts for peace. It is because I am so, for one reason, that I oppose this bill. I want to do everything that is honorable to preserve peace, but I have become very "tired," if I may use the slang expression, of the subserviency of this administration. I have felt the humiliation, as every American citizen has felt it, of our attitude to and relations with the Republic of Mexico. We have not only forfeited her friendship and respect, but we have incurred her hatred and contempt. Instead of composing her difficulties we have augmented them. We have sat idly by, almost without protest, while she has murdered American citizens, outraged American women, stolen and destroyed American property. This administration, in its efforts to destroy the President of Mexico, has given aid and comfort to his enemies. Our flag has been insulted, and while the President declared war upon Mexico for the insult and sent the Atlantic Squadron to Vera Cruz to demand reparation, yet aside from killing 19 American boys and a few score of Mexicans the expedition accomplished nothing and the fleet came back, our flag tarnished, the rights of our citizens in Mexico less secure, and our reputation before the world lowered. I can not trust the judgment nor the ability of the administration to deal with unusual foreign affairs.

The people of the United States will insist, and I believe they ought to insist, that if these boats are put upon the sea, owned and operated by the United States and flying the American flag, they shall be respected; they shall not be insulted. Even at the cost of war our Nation's rights and honor must be preserved. Let us not unwisely invite insult.

What a foolish venture this is. Admittedly it will not pay. Admittedly the Government will lose money. If the advocates of the bill are sincere, it is intended only to relieve a temporary condition at a few congested ports. Has anybody given us an estimate of how much loss in profits, for instance, has occurred to date by reason of any undue congestion caused by the war? If so, has it amounted to as much as the $40,000,000 that this bill authorizes the President to expend for ships?

There are things the Government can do with its money that will bring more certain and greater relief to our people than this measure. Suppose we take the $40,000,000 and invest it in good roads. Such an investment would be infinitely wiser than the pending one. It would meet a popular demand. There would not be any question as to who would get the benefit. It has been stated upon what seems good authority that practically all the products which are now crowding our ports have necessarily passed out of the hands of the farmers and the producers of the country, and are in the possession of the exporters. Who gets the benefit? Not the farmers, not the manufacturers, and yet if perchance this shall result in trouble with another nation, it is the farmers' boys, the sons of American fathers and mothers, who have got to make the awful sacrifice demanded by war which this reckless act may bring to pass.

I would prefer to keep our products at home rather than incur the risk of being involved in war. Why, even under present conditions, it appears that our farm products except cotton are bringing the best price that they have brought for years, and the cotton condition is improving. I would rather that the Government buy those crops with this money and use them to clothe and feed cold and hungry American citizens. I would rather invest the money in internal improvements at home. Swamp lands could be drained and deserts irrigated. American labor would be given employment and these wage earners would thus furnish a market quite equal to the foreign market. Oh, Mr. President, if to-day the millions of idle men throughout the country, and the other millions who are working on half time and therefore receiving half wages—if those people were earning wages as they were two years ago, not our ports but our manufacturing centers would be the market places. Our products would be consumed at home. There are wiser uses to which we can put the money of the people than in this doubtful venture.

I said a moment ago that I had little faith in the business judgment of this administration. It has been in charge of national affairs for two years, and if a single piece of its legislation has justified the predictions of the administration, I do not know what it is. It revised the tariff to cheapen the cost of living and encourage domestic enterprise. It passed a currency law as an immediate crying necessity, but more than a year elapsed after the passage of the law before the system was installed, and if such reports as we have are reliable the expenses of the system exceed the profits. An emergency Trade Commission was created, and the year is passing and the members of the commission have not been appointed. An income-tax law was passed with the prediction that it would offset the loss of customs duties, but experience shows it a dismal failure. Living costs as much or more than before the tariff revision, while the purchasing power of the people has been greatly diminished. Government expenses have increased, Government revenues have diminished. The President admits that he is the President of a party, and neither he nor his party have business or practical governmental genius. He is a theorist. He knows nothing of the details of the measures he proposes. He demands the party label on all legislation. It is enough for him that the laws are enacted at his command. Recur again to the currency bill.

The President would have signed it as it passed the House. I do not think there is a thoughtful man in the United States to-day who will not admit that the House bill was a most unwise one. It was not considered by House Republicans. It came over here, and because two Senators—Democrats—had sufficient independence to think for themselves, and who insisted that Republican members of the Banking and Currency Committee should sit at the council board, 600 amendments were made to the bill before it passed the Senate.

Take all of these measures; take your rivers and harbors bill last year. Though the same Senators that are trying to put this measure through tried to force that through, Republican opposition saved the people some $30,000,000.

I think opposition to a bill which brings out the facts, which shows it to the country, is not injurious. Mr. President, on our opposition to this measure we will have to stand or fall before the country. I am willing to assume and meet that responsibility, and yet I am for a Government-assisted merchant marine. I have never been so greatly in favor of a subsidy, although I recognize that such is the method which has been employed by other nations, and it seems to have worked well. When I was in the House I voted for a proposition to establish a line of boats between the United States and South America, and that is what the President originally proposed. Forty million dollars might be of practical good in establishing boat lines between the United States and South America; but what will $50,000,000 do in the building of ships and in their operation between the ports of the United States and all the other ports of the world? Absolutely nothing worth while.

It was suggested the other day that this proposed line of boats is to be established between certain definite ports of the United States and other ports in foreign countries. I want to ask a question that constitutional lawyers may think trivial, but it is a point that has occurred to me several times. Section 9 of the first article of the Constitution of the United States prohibits discrimination in regulations of commerce or revenue against the ports of one State and in favor of those of another. This is the article:

> No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another, nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

Mr. President, if this boat line is established by the Government, for instance, between New York and Liverpool, and if it is true, as the proponents of the measure say it will be true, that these ships are going to reduce the rates—are going to furnish cheaper rates of transportation than the competing boats—how can it be other than a preference to the port of New York? What an opportunity this gives for preference, for partiality. The boats are to be operated by a political board—officers of the Government and political appointees. Where are they going to establish the line? Between what ports are these boats to run? I think it is of the greatest importance that we should know something about these things in advance of passing the bill.

It has been suggested that potash from Florida and cotton from the Southern States are two particular items which require immediate help. I think the proposition of our southern friends last year to appropriate $250,000,000 with which to purchase cotton was much wiser than this scheme, but that was defeated by the Senate after a Democratic filibuster; and it was well that this was done, for cotton has gone up. It needs no special aid from Congress, although I fear that some Senators may be looking for special favors for cotton through this measure.

A friendly board can say, "These boats are so few; there are only thirty or forty million dollars worth of them. That their number will be insignificant compared with all the ships on the sea; we will run them between favored ports in the South, for instance, or in the cotton belt." They will argue that wheat, even though it is congested in our markets, "brings so good a price that we will not spend any time in making its price higher, but we will go down into the country whose representatives have not hesitated to demand of the Congress that we take money out of the Treasury to buy their products and hold them in a corner until the prices advance to the proper height."

That is a dangerous power, Mr. President, to place in the hands of any political board. We are not warranted in doing it. A broader view of our country should be taken.

These ships are to be purchased, as I said, from somebody who has them to sell, and they are now out of commission. It will be worth something, of course, to a man who has an unprofitable ship on his hands to sell it and get rid of it, turn it over to the Government, or to anybody who would buy it; but after this emergency passes who is going to buy the ship from us? It has been suggested that some men may go into this corporation and will become stockholders in it, knowing that it will be an unprofitable venture, but also knowing that by and by they can buy it back again at a reduced cost and put it upon the sea after its troubled waters have been calmed at the close of the war. The United States Government ought not to be an instrument in the hands of possible designing men to accomplish by indirection an injury to the people of the United States.

Are we warranted in taking money out of the Treasury to the extent of $40,000,000 and giving it to importers, without any permanency in the investment or any hope that our merchant marine will be permanently enlarged? We have got to answer these questions. The time will come soon when an answer will be expected.

It is charged that while Republicans profess to favor the construction of a merchant marine, yet they oppose this bill and offer no substitute. Of course this statement is contradicted by the record. For years the Republican Party, against the solid opposition of Democratic Congressmen, and by a few Republicans, have tried to do something for the upbuilding of American ships, and several Republicans have offered substitutes for this bill only to have them tabled by Democratic Senators. The Democratic caucus has ordained that no other than the President's bill shall be considered. This is not the only attempt this administration has made to encourage American ships.

The Underwood-Simmons tariff law contains a provision which was loudly proclaimed as an American merchant-marine builder. It was alleged to be in accordance with the Baltimore platform. That provision is as follows:

> That a discount of 5 per cent on all commodities imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be imported in vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this subsection shall be so construed as to abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of the treaty concluded between the United States and any foreign nation.

As was predicted by Republican Senators, this provision was offered as a benefit to American shipping. It was considered as most Democratic legislation has been considered, viz, hastily, superficially, and partisanly. It has been the subject of domestic and international controversy, and its validity is at this time being determined in the courts. As another reason for my lack of faith in the legislative and diplomatic wisdom and ability of this administration I will quote from a brief on the provision in the Underwood tariff, allowing a discount on all importations into the United States shipped in American boats. It at once shows the uselessness of the measure as a relief to American shipping and the lack of legislative ability in its authors:

The Treasury Department on November 8, 1913 (T. D. 33847), instructed collectors of customs to make no allowance of discount on duties under the subsection in question. The legal question involved in this construction of paragraph J was brought before the Board of United States General Appraisers, and the board in essence held that the 5 per cent discount should be allowed where merchandise was imported in American vessels, but that it should not be allowed on the cargoes of foreign vessels. Appeals covering the various cases raised are now pending in the Customs Court of Appeals, and the Government brief outlining the attitude of the Department of Justice in these cases has been filed, and hereafter when mention is made of the Government brief reference will be had to the brief filed before the Customs Court of Appeals in cases Nos. 1391, 1393, and 1394.

The treaty of commerce and navigation of 1815 with Great Britain provides as follows:

Incidentally, I call attention to the proposition I suggested a moment ago that this bill in fact will prefer the ports of one State over those of another, and therefore might be declared unconstitutional.

ART. 11. No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, than are or shall be payable on the like articles, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country; nor shall any higher or other duties or charges be imposed in either of the two countries on the exportation of any articles to the United States, or to His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country; or shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States or of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, to or from the said territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, or to or from the said United States, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States; or in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

The same duties shall be paid on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, whether such importations shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels, and the same duties shall be paid on the importation into the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, whether such importations shall be in British vessels or in vessels of the United States.

The same duties shall be paid and the same bounties allowed on the exportation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe to the United States, whether such exportation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels, and the same duties shall be paid and the same bounties allowed on the exportation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States to His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, whether such exportation shall be in British vessels or in vessels of the United States.

It is further agreed that in all cases where drawbacks are or may be allowed upon the reexportation of any goods the growth, produce, or manufacture of either country, respectively, the amount of the said drawbacks shall be the same, whether the said goods shall have been originally imported in a British or an American vessel; but when such reexportation shall take place from the United States in a British vessel, or from the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe in an American vessel, to any other foreign nation the two contracting parties reserve to themselves, respectively, the right of regulating or diminishing in such case the amount of the said drawback.

The intercourse between the United States and His Britannic Majesty's possessions in the West Indies and on the continent of North America shall not be affected by any of the provisions of this article, but each party shall remain in the complete possession of its rights with respect to such intercourse.

The treaty with France of 1822 provides as follows:

"ART. 2. Articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of France imported into the United States in French vessels shall pay an additional duty, not exceeding $3.75 per ton of merchandise, over and above the duties collected upon the like articles also of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France when imported in vessels of the United States.

"ART. 3. No discriminating duty shall be levied upon the productions of the soil or industry of France imported in French bottoms into the ports of the United States for transit or reexportation; nor shall any such duties be levied upon the products of the soil or industry of the United States imported in vessels of the United States into the ports of France for transit or reexportation.

"ART. 7. The present temporary convention shall be in force for two years from the 1st day of October next, and even after the expiration of that term until the conclusion of a definite treaty, or until one of the parties shall have declared its intention to renounce it, which declaration shall be made at least six months beforehand.

"And in case the present arrangement should remain without such declaration of its discontinuance by either party, the extra duties specified in the first and second articles shall, from the expiration of the said two years, be, on both sides, diminished by one-fourth of their whole amount, and afterwards by one-fourth of the said amount from year to year, so long as neither party shall have declared the intention of renouncing it as above stated."

The treaty with France of 1803, under and by virtue of which Louisiana was ceded to the United States, contains a provision to the effect that the vessels of the French Nation shall have the right to enter the ports of said territory forever thereafter on the same terms of equality with respect to such vessels and their cargoes as are enjoyed by vessels of the United States entering such ports.

The Constitution of the United States provides that duties shall be uniform throughout the United States, and it is therefore arguable that under the Constitution French vessels should enjoy the same ameliorations and benefits when coming into other United States ports that they enjoy or should enjoy when coming into the ports of the Louisiana territory.

The legislative history of subsection 7, paragraph J—

That is the section in the tariff bill known as the Underwood bill—shows that the real intent of Congress was to recognize the treaties of commerce and navigation made by the United States with foreign nations. (See report of the Senate Finance Committee, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 50, pt. 3, p. 2151; see also pt. 5, p. 4494, and the Government brief, p. 5):

Your committee—

I am now quoting from the tariff committee's report—

Your committee struck out subsection 7 of paragraph J, page 263, giving a discount of 5 per cent on all duties upon goods imported in American bottoms. The provision was in contravention of some 19 or 20 treaties of the United States, without having been preceded by the courtesy of a notice of revocation, and was very properly protested against by the high contracting parties with whom we had the treaties.

In our opinion, it would have led to no good result, as every other country could have retaliated, and all the countries at the end would have been just about where they started. Moreover, the country which could use that principle with most force and effect in injuring other countries would be the country with the largest merchant marine, and the country which could least effectively use it would be the country with the smallest merchant marine. We were therefore not only inviting an endless retaliation, but a retaliation where our opponents would have had in nearly every case the better of it, and in many cases infinitely the better.

This is a report of a Senate conference committee. The bill had passed the House, if you remember, containing the favored clause, but the Senate conference committee struck it out. On September 8, 1913, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], as I recall it, offered as a substitute for this a provision directing the President to cause the treaties in question to be abrogated. That provision of the Democratic Congress granting a 5 per cent rebate on all foreign goods shipped in American bottoms was clearly in conflict with the treaties; therefore Senator JONES offered the proposition to abrogate those treaties. This amendment was rejected; but while the bill was before the Senate, the Secretary of the Treasury wrote to the Secretary of State requesting information as to whether subsection 7 as it passed the House would be in violation of any existing American treaty rights, and thereupon Mr. John Bassett Moore—John Bassett Moore, who was a most valuable man in the Department of State and kept all matters of that great department in some sort of order while he was there, as long as he could remain there—John Bassett Moore, who is considered as an expert and authority on matters of foreign relations, wrote this in answer to the request of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the meaning and interpretation of the provisions of the House bill:

"The various stipulations above quoted suffice to show the purport of the treaty provisions with which the proposed subsection is alleged to conflict. This allegation appears to be well founded, if, as seems to be the case, it is intended by the subsection to allow the discount on duties only on merchandise imported in American registered vessels. Governments having treaty stipulations with the United States such as those above quoted probably would not object to the discount if it were extended in conformity with those stipulations to merchandise imported into the United States in their respective vessels; but they would not acquiesce in a discriminatory levy of lower duties on goods imported into the United States in American-registered vessels, because it was called a discount. It is the fact that a lower duty is charged, and not the terms by which the reduction is described, with which the department is obliged to deal."

The conference committee added the proviso as it now appears in the act, and the resulting legislation was a compromise in which the Senate conceded the discount to American vessels and the House agreed to the saving of treaty obligations, apparently this action being adopted for two reasons: First, because it would savor of bad faith to abrogate the treaties; and secondly, because the policy of discrimination was unwise in itself.

The United States Government, by its Assistant Attorney General, admits that the Board of General Appraisers erred in holding that the treaties were unconstitutional; and that it erred in holding that the board was without power to determine whether the treaties are in force. Furthermore, in this brief it is claimed and admitted that it is no longer material whether the treaties were originally executory or self-executing, inasmuch as the Congress has long since enacted legislation which executed all of the treaties which were merely executory, and by the proviso to subsection 7 expressly stated its intent to respect all the treaties. Furthermore, the United States Government in its brief represents to the court that the decision of the Board of General Appraisers allowing a discount to American vessels is flatly at odds with the intent of Congress as shown by the legislative history of subsection 7. It is stated in that brief:

"There is a noteworthy similarity between the proviso to subsection 7 and the qualifying clauses of subsections 1 and 2. Each one of these last-named enactments is intended to confer some benefit upon American shipping, and each contains a clause saving and excepting all cases which are covered by treaties with foreign nations. They are old provisions of law, going back many years, but reappearing in every tariff act. They have been entirely effectual for the preservation of the treaty rights to which they refer, and yet their words are not a whit stronger than is the language of the proviso to subsection 7. If the treaties have been duly conserved and effectuated by subsections 1 and 2, why should they not be equally so by subsection 7?"

It is respectfully represented that apparently the case as presented by the counsel for the United States Government concedes the binding obligation of the treaties in question, but sets forth the fact that the Board of General Appraisers erred in its decision in granting the 5 per cent discount to American bottoms, for the reasons that if the 5 per cent is to be allowed to American bottoms it must likewise be allowed to the vessels of foreign nations having treaties of commerce and navigation with the United States.

Think of it! A law passed by Congress, and the department itself taking a position to set it aside because it is so unwise, so inconsistent with our relations with foreign countries as indicated by our treaties, so inefficient to bring the results that might be expected of them.

In other words, that the proviso renders the body of the act nugatory, at least until the treaties are denounced, at which time the law will become effective. This argument is tantamount to claiming that whereas Congress expressly refused to adopt the legislation as proposed by the House, and expressly refused to adopt the Jones amendment, and expressly legislated to the effect that no construction should be adopted which would in any manner abrogate, impair, or affect the treaty, the 5 per cent is not to be allowed to American bottoms until these treaties are in fact denounced.

The attitude of the American Government with respect to retaliatory legislation and the reciprocal treatment of vessels and their cargoes from a date as early as 1785 has been to demand and accord an equality of treatment, as is very clearly set forth in the case of Oldfield v. Marriott (10 How., 146, 159). The attitude of the Secretary of the Treasury, the attitude of the State Department, as evinced by its counselor, Mr. John Bassett Moore, and the attitude of the United States Senate all clearly indicate a disposition and desire to recognize the obligatory character of the treaties of commerce and navigation into which the United States Government has entered. The Board of General Appraisers has, however, decided that this discount should be allowed to American vessels exclusively; and in the brief filed by the Assistant Attorney General in the cases now pending before the Customs Court of Appeals, although maintaining that the 5 per cent should not be allowed to American vessels, because at the present time it would also have to be allowed to foreign vessels, in its final analysis the argument inevitably carries with it the implication that this 5 per cent will be allowed to American bottoms as soon as the treaties now in force can be denounced and abrogated.

In the interest of the comity of nations, it is respectfully submitted that the United States Government should not insist upon or contend for an interpretation of the law which would either abrogate or impair the treaties or invite and induce their denouncement.

This case has been argued before the Customs Court of Appeals, but no decision has been handed down by the court up to the present time. It is quite probable that any decision rendered by the court will in essence leave the question in which the State Department is interested either undetermined or embarrassing, and if the decision of the court of appeals is carried to the Supreme Court of the United States it will be a year or more before these questions can be finally adjudicated. If the Supreme Court should adopt the views of the Attorney General, as expressed in his brief before the Customs Court of Appeals, it would be necessary to denounce the treaties in order to let the act take effect. If the Supreme Court upheld the decision of the Board of General Appraisers with respect to American bottoms only enjoying 5 per cent amelioration, then all of the treaties would have to be denounced, still leaving open the question of the claims of foreign nations under these treaties up to the time such denouncement would take effect.

Alternatively, if the Supreme Court should decide that 5 per cent refund should be allowed to both American and foreign vessels, an extremely embarrassing situation would be entailed if the decision limited the application of the British treaty to merchandise the growth, product, or manufacture of his Britannic Majesty's territory in Europe, whereby the indirect trade which was the subject matter of correspondence in 1846, as outlined in the decision of Oldfield against Marriott, would not enjoy this benefit, and the English Government would in all probability conceive that it was warranted in applying the doctrine of lex talionis.

Moreover, a situation would be created whereby countries like the Netherlands or Japan would enjoy the full benefit of the 5 per cent reduction, whereas other countries would be partially discriminated against. Germany, by virtue of express statutory provision, would enjoy the full benefits, whereas France and England would only secure a portion of these benefits. It is hardly conceivable that England and France would regard our action in this behalf as the act of a friendly nation. It is quite obvious, therefore, that whatever might be the decision of the Supreme Court in this case, it is inevitably coupled with difficulties and embarrassments.

The shipping bill is now before the United States Senate and is being pressed for passage at this session of Congress. The purpose and intent of the shipping bill is to increase the commerce of the United States and build up its merchant marine. Such a plan can not possibly enjoy the full opportunity to test out its merits if, by virtue of the 5 per cent clause in the Underwood tariff bill and a decision of the Customs Court of Appeals or the Supreme Court of the United States, there results an assessment of discriminating or retaliatory duties upon the merchandise which we export.

The language of the shipping bill is sufficiently broad to permit of an amendment being included therein, Paragraph J of the tariff act, and there is no doubt that such an amendment would be germane to the bill.

I repeat, however, we have not been permitted to make amendments. It would seem that Senators who have been induced to indulge in this experiment, those who have so little experience of matters of legislation of this kind, would be very anxious indeed to learn what can be presented in good faith, and that they would make no effort to defeat the efforts that have been made to present facts to the Senate, the consideration of which might lead to a better measure.

Upon the repeal of the 5 per cent clause in the manner outlined above, then the decision of the Customs Court of Appeals could not be acquiesced in without carrying it to the Supreme Court, and some departmental adjustment made whereby any and all discriminations are avoided.

To summarize the situation, it is respectfully submitted:

1. That the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of 1815 and the treaties between the United States and France of 1803 and 1822 conferred and do confer upon vessels of these nations the right to enter the ports of the United States on the payment of the same duties as are charged on goods imported in American vessels.

2. The history of the adoption of the treaties and a consideration of the acts of Congress, procedure of the executive department, and the judicial decisions would all show that the treaties have been construed and treated as relieving British and French vessels from the imposition of discriminatory duties, and as entitling them to admission to ports of the United States on terms of equality with American vessels.

3. The treaties in question are self-executing.

4. The enacting clause or subsection 7 is not nullified by the proviso.

5. These facts are admitted in the Government's brief in the case before the Customs Court of Appeals, and therefore the litigation should cease and determine; and

6. The repeal of section J and the settlement of the case in the manner outlined above would obviate many embarrassments and disputes which would otherwise have to be met through diplomatic channels, and would likewise recognize the obligation and sanctity of the various treaties of commerce and navigation made by the United States.

Mr. President, I have presented this, as I said, to show the inefficient, unreliable methods of legislation employed by the Democratic Party in its dealings with the affairs of government. If it has taken so long to determine an apparently simple provision in the tariff bill relating to the 5 per cent discount on goods imported on American bottoms, what may we expect of a measure of so doubtful meaning as the one now before us? The advocates of the bill have not entirely agreed upon it. They have changed their minds frequently. I am positive they have not given the careful consideration to all of its possible results that ought to be given to them.

I mentioned a little while ago that the charge had been made that no provision had been offered by the Republican Party to take the place of this measure and looking to the upbuilding of a merchant marine. I have shown that such charge is without foundation of fact. I know that Republican Senators are, with practical unanimity, in favor of doing something safe and practical.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] yesterday gave the names of various commercial organizations which have asked that this measure should not be passed. He spoke of the Chamber of Commerce of his own State, which had met and passed resolutions after careful consideration through subcommittees of this particular bill, and gave the summary, namely, that out of something like 294 members present at the meeting on January 28, 290 opposed the bill which President Wilson demands shall be passed as a partisan Democratic measure.

This great chamber of commerce, composed, I assume, of experienced, intelligent, honest men, not only protested against the pending bill, but it recommended a measure which to me seems so fundamentally right that I am going to give it to the Senate. This debate is not likely to terminate immediately, and this provision may so appeal to Democratic Senators that they may be willing to present it to the President, and mayhap he will permit it to be considered. I think I will include some of the report relating to the bill before us. The committee said in part:

It has given earnest consideration to the emergency features of the present situation—

Referring to the bill and the conditions of the country—and is aware that rates of freight so high as to seem exorbitant were charged in many trades, and yet is compelled to report its belief that the emergency difficulties are of such a character that temporary relief can be provided only through the operation of forces beyond the control of this country. As has already been pointed out, the mere transfer of flag from vessels now in operation under foreign colors can not bring new tonnage to our service. Every available vessel, except those belonging to belligerents interned in neutral ports, is at work. The interned vessels can be placed in service under private operation the moment the consent of the belligerents is obtained. Except with such consent, they can not be placed in service without involving this country in dangers much worse than the temporary lack of ocean tonnage. Another present difficulty, the importance of which is not generally appreciated, is the fact that many vessels now engaged in foreign trade are detained in foreign ports for weeks at a time awaiting an opportunity to discharge their cargoes. These ports are congested partly by Government operations and partly by huge imports of food products from this and other countries. The congestion is increased by the inability in many cases to secure adequate labor for the prompt unloading and handling of vessel cargoes.

I am reading now from the report of the business men who, through their committee, have investigated this matter as only business men can investigate a question of the kind. These business men were not from the city of New York alone, although undoubtedly very many of them were, but the chamber of commerce is a State organization. These men are anxious to know what is best for the country. There could be no desire in their minds antagonistic to general business prosperity. If they could obtain lower freight rates from the Government, they would not hesitate to accept them unless they saw in the project danger to the country. If the plan actually meant better and cheaper ocean transportation, I feel sure they would have indorsed it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to ask the Senator if he does not believe that, notwithstanding that of which he has just spoken, the Chamber of Commerce of the City of New York is very largely dominated by the shipping interests of the port of New York? It has been my privilege on one or two occasions to have been a guest there. I know many of those gentlemen by name, and I say they are interested in the shipping interests of New York, and I say, in answer to the general thought advanced that there is no organized effort in favor of this bill, that at the same time the Senator will admit there is a very decided and organized effort upon the part of the shipping interests against this bill, and their methods are akin to the methods of the great railroad interests that were used in their case to get the 5 per cent increase. It was the most domineering, brow-beating method of every man in authority in every way to bring about an increase of rates for them. The members of the New York Chamber of Commerce, while an elegant set of gentleman, are wonderfully human in all their business, their individual ideas, and their aims. They are made of no better grade than the rest of humanity, open to the same foibles, the same follies, the same self-interests, and the same aims and ambitions as the rest of the world.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] that they are perhaps no better than the rest of us, but I am equally unwilling to concede that they are any worse than the rest of us. I have at various times in my public career visited business organizations which are now found all through the United States. I have one in my home city that includes the very best men and practically all the very best men in the city. These men are interested in the welfare of the country. There can be no question about that. The business interests of this country are interested in the general welfare. I can not conceive that these men are so involved in ship ownership, as the Senator intimated, that they would report against this measure while believing that it was safe and generally beneficial. I do not know one of them who would do that. I do know they are men of wide business interests, and that as a rule they are honest men.

I think, Mr. President, we have now reached the time when we can afford to admit that success in business is not prima facie a crime. I think we have reached the point when we can afford to assume at least that great business organizations are actuated by high purposes and high ideals, quite as much so as are other men. Business men are not politicians. I sometimes think it would be better for the country if they were; if the business interests of the country would take a greater interest in politics, at least a sufficient interest to attend the primaries and the elections, government might be better. I do not believe that a successful business man is, simply because he is a business man and successful, disqualified to speak on this great business question. His testimony ought to be entitled to as much weight as that of theorists without business experience. So I say that this organization, composed of business men from all over the great State of New York, is expressing its opinion after careful investigation and due deliberation upon this particular measure.

The committee says, further:

> While these factors, together with an enormous shrinkage in vessel tonnage due to withdrawal from service of a large percentage of the world's ocean carriers, captured, sunk, or interned vessels owned by the nations at war, have caused freight rates to be demanded which in many cases seem beyond reason, it is the opinion of your committee that it is utterly impossible to remedy these regrettable conditions by any provision in the Alexander bill. The extent to which these conditions hamper present commerce is not widely appreciated in this country outside of steamship circles, and it is not possible for the people of the United States to remedy these conditions. Meanwhile the Alexander bill is being pressed, and business men in the interior find it impossible to ship merchandise which they can sell. Vessels in sufficient number to carry the freight across the Atlantic are not available, and it is useless for the railroads to haul it east unless their cars are relieved at the seaboard. Seaport communities understand this situation, but an insistent demand continues to grow in the West that some relief be provided, and there is grave danger that unless a plan can be suggested which will point the way to a solution of this problem along economic lines the Alexander bill will be passed, which will embark the Government in the unknown and hazardous field of Government ownership and operation. It must be recognized that this situation is not a theory, but a fact.
>
> Believing, therefore, that progress can be made only along permanent lines, your committee has again addressed itself to the attempt to propose a plan which, if put in operation, it can indorse with the statement that it will permanently restore the merchant marine of this country on an adequate scale. It has approached the problem with the light thrown upon the subject by the discussion at the special meeting of the chamber on January 14, 1915, when the first report of your committee was submitted and recommitted for further consideration. It is evident that our shipping industry can not be permanently placed upon a successful basis unless the cost of constructing vessels in American yards and of operating them on American standards be placed upon an equality with vessels built abroad when manned and maintained in accordance with European standards. The steamship industry is a business proposition, and while it may flourish on a false basis during an emergency like the present European war, it can be permanently maintained and operated under the American flag only if building and operating costs are made equal.
> There is a large school of opinion at the present time which believes that if desirable modifications of the navigation laws were to be made, that alone would be sufficient to bring about a restoration of an American foreign mercantile marine. In the opinion of your committee this is a mistaken view. Under the emergency legislation of 1914, which has permitted the transfer of foreign-built ships to the American flag, and under which the President has suspended for seven years the operation of the most serious handicaps embodied in the navigation laws, the increase in wages still about 40 per cent, and the experience of different companies who have transferred fleets of ships to the American flag, shows that the actual increase of total operating cost, when sailing the same ships in the same trade under the American flag, varies from 5 per cent to 10 per cent. This applies to freight vessels only. With passenger and mail ships the percentage of increase would be much larger because of their larger crews. This increase has taken place, notwithstanding the fact that by virtue of the exemptions to the navigations laws as they exist the vessels are permitted to retain the same officers, to carry only the same crews as before, and generally to operate upon the European standards. Your committee believes that the overwhelming sentiment of the American people is that in restoring an American merchant marine to the sea it wishes to secure a marine upon which the American standards of life can be maintained as regards wages, hours of labor, cubic feet of air, quality of food, and provisions of safety.

Mr. President, I pause to state that no man in this Senate, I assume, who is advocating this measure expects that the United States will operate these ships at a less cost than the American-owned ships under the American flag are now being operated. No one will suggest that we are going to lower the standards of living, that we are going to reduce the wages, that we are going to make things less tolerable for our seamen on these boats, than we enforce by law upon privately owned boats. Therefore when the Senators argue that we are going to reduce the rates by the use of these Government ships they contend they are going to do what they think best for the public service. The tendency will be to an increase in cost. It has been the history of our Government in all its departments that where it has embarked upon any proposition it pays higher wages and invites a greater cost than is maintained in private enterprise. With these ships in our possession the cost of operation, the cost of living, the wages, and everything that applies to it is not going to be reduced. It is going to be increased. This cost must come out of the public, must be paid by the people, and for the benefit of a comparatively few exporters. In answer to the question that was asked of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] last evening, transportation rates may come out of both the producer and the consumer. Such things have been known to occur. The exporter who purchases always uses the freight rate as an excuse for decreasing the purchase price, and he may use it as an argument for the increased price which he receives from his customers.

But I continue:

> In this war emergency these conditions have been waived; but as a permanency it is believed to be impossible, even were it desirable to waive them.

He is referring now to certain conditions existing on boats which are manned with European officers and crews largely, and the conditions of living that maintain on the foreign boats. We can not permit that condition in this country. The American people will not consent to it, and organized labor will be protesting, and properly so, against the foreign standard of wage and living.

> This being so, it is evident that changes in the navigation laws, even if they could be given permanent application, will not alone make possible the restoration of a mercantile marine.
> Your committee believes that once the shipping industry is reestablished the present inequality in construction cost can be overcome by American ability and ingenuity. During the development period the difference in cost must be borne by Government subvention. At the present time the European shipbuilding yards are crowded with work, and the cost of constructing vessel property has increased. This has greatly reduced the disadvantage under which American shipbuilders have labored in competing with their foreign rivals and makes it a particularly advantageous time for the Government to undertake to foster our shipbuilding industry.
> Your committee believes also, once our shipping is placed upon a permanently successful basis, that the ability of our shipbuilders to command a supply of steel and coal will enable them ultimately to construct standardized vessels upon an equality with European yards.
>
> Within five years American ingenuity and energy has standardized the automobile, and we are now exporting large numbers of automobiles to the countries from which we formerly imported them.
> During the development period, while a Government subvention is necessary, the degree of Government aid required will fluctuate with construction costs in this country and Europe. If Government aid is to be extended, it is necessary to create some method by which the amount of assistance necessary can be exactly determined. Your committee therefore reaffirms its belief in the necessity of a Government board to foster the development of our shipping. Many reasons for the establishment of such a board were advanced in our first report, and we submit that the necessity of determining from time to time the exact amount of Government aid which it may be necessary to extend in order to equalize the cost of constructing vessels in American yards and operating them upon American standards is an added reason for the creation of such a board. It is also our belief that it is important that this board be composed partly of men experienced in shipping matters, who will devote all of their time to the problem. A board of some kind has been suggested in many quarters. The Alexander bill carries with it provision for a board composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Postmaster General. These officials are already burdened with great responsibility. It is impossible that they give the necessary time to the details of solving this problem. The result of creating such a board will be that the work would devolve upon underofficials. This is not desirable.

That seems a reasonable proposition, does it not, that men who know something about this business, who have their heart in it, rather than politicians who never earned a dollar in their lives, who never had a dollar except what they drew as a salary—that experienced men be asked to take charge of the gigantic interests of our foreign shipping instead of placing them in charge of men who are more interested in furnishing jobs for the faithful than in business success?

Another suggestion has been that a shipping board be attached to the Department of Commerce. Your committee again believes that such a course will be undesirable. The problem is difficult and its successful solution will require men of broad views and a knowledge not only of the shipping trade, but of the requirements necessary to develop our own country in international competition. The board should be made equal in dignity with the Federal Reserve Board—

I should say so, and I should say it should have less of political power and less of the political qualities than the reserve board—which has been placed at the head of our national banking system, and a sufficient compensation should be paid to attract men of the highest standard and the broadest experience. As it is proposed to ask the Government to place within the control of this board large power it is believed that a majority of the members should be Government officials, and with this in view your committee suggests that a board of seven be created, of which four shall be the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, the Postmaster General, and a naval constructor. The remaining three to be appointed by the President, and to be men experienced in the ocean carrying trade as vessel operators or shippers.

This board should be placed in supreme authority over shipping matters. It should recommend from time to time such additional legislation as may be necessary to place us more nearly upon a competitive basis with European nations in shipping matters, and yet retain American standards of living and compensation. It should be charged with the responsibility of determining what lines of ocean-carrying trade it is wise to develop in the interest of public welfare, and what classes of vessels it is desirable to have constructed.

That seems to be a reasonable proposition, does it not, that the character of the vessels shall be determined by some competent authority? You are turning over here to the Secretary of the Treasury practically the determination not only of the routes which these boats are to travel—thus giving him all the power to use partiality in the routes these vessels shall sail—but you also are giving him the power to determine the character and the nature of the vessel itself. I appeal to the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], who has had distinguished service not only in this Senate, but on the seas as an experienced seaman, whether it is not of the highest importance that men who are building ships to sail the seas should know exactly what water they are to sail and what purpose they are to serve? The type of boat is of highest importance. It seems to me to be such a common-sense view of it that it would have suggested itself even to a man of theory alone.

It should be empowered to enter into contracts with steamship owners during a period of 10 years from the creation of the board, by which the Government will undertake to pay the difference between the cost of constructing such vessels in American yards and European yards, as it may be deemed wise from the standpoint of the welfare of this country to place in foreign trade under the American flag, and further to contract that for a period of 20 years, which is deemed to be the ordinary life of vessel property, the Government will pay what is ascertained to be the difference between the cost of operating under the European and the American standards.

I have never been able to understand why there should be a different rule of protection applied to the shipping business than is applied to the manufacturing or other business of the country. If the merchant marine is a good thing, and it now seems to be the universal opinion of both the Democrats and Republicans that it is a good thing—but I have never heard it discussed before by the Democrats—if it seems now to be a good thing then we should proceed along business lines to obtain it.

I think our friends on the other side are convinced, even though they may not admit it, that the Republican notion of a protective tariff, a tariff which measures the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, is a good thing, and if they could do it without embarrassment or without stultifying themselves I imagine that they would return to it to-day in order to relieve the country from the financial stress which is upon it.

If a merchant marine is a good thing, then, to my mind, it is most important that we should take into consideration the difference in the cost of operation and construction according to the laws which we have passed ourselves. When we have taken that into consideration and it is carried into effect there is no question but what there will be a return to the sea of American-owned and operated boats.

In order to establish what the payments will be—

That is what the Government should pay as the difference in cost of construction and cost of operation of these boats—

it is necessary for the Government board to compile exact data and to be in a position to determine with exactness and justice the amount to be paid. It is important to point out that although this suggestion involves direct Government aid, it differs radically from all usual forms of subsidy. Every bill proposing a subsidy for the encouragement of shipping which the committee can recall involved a payment either of a lump sum or of so much per ton of measurement or of so much for mile traveled. In this form the subsidy gave to the operating company the opportunity to adapt both its ships and its business to securing the largest possible subsidy payment in return for the least possible service rendered. The proposal now made by your committee is vitally different in principle. It is possible for a competent board to ascertain, within a very few dollars, the exact difference in cost, ship by ship and voyage by voyage, between the operation of a vessel under the American flag and on American standards as distinguished from the cost under any selected foreign flag with its standards. This difference in cost, and this only, it is proposed that the Government should make good, because it is the result of national policies and national conditions which private citizens can not control. It should be pointed out also that under this policy every risk of the business will be borne by private capital. The Government is not invited to risk one dollar on the success of the management or the profits of the voyage. It is simply asked to make good the uncontrollable factor of additional expense which private citizens can not control. It is suggested that this power be given to the board for a period of 10 years, because it is the belief of your committee that this is a sufficient length of time to arrange for the construction of a large tonnage in American shipyards. The committee suggests that the contracts be for 20 years, so that anyone undertaking the construction of American vessels for foreign trade can look forward to equitable operating conditions during the ordinary life of the vessel. As the shipping industry develops it is believed that construction costs in this country will be reduced and the Government burden thus lessened. In any event, the subvention paid by the Government to equalize the construction cost will be limited to a period of 10 years, and the last contract under which the Government will pay a subvention to cover the difference in operating cost will expire within 30 years. This gives a definite limitation to the Government's responsibility and yet enables those who engage in operating and constructing vessel property to see their way clear to meet foreign competition upon an equal basis during the life of vessels constructed under Government contracts. It secures private operation of the vessels, and it does no more than equalize building and operating costs, which it will be necessary to do if American standards are to be maintained, even though the Government owns and operates the vessels. The contracts with the Government should provide for the ability to take over the vessels under equitable conditions in case they are needed for Government service.

In its former report your committee pointed out that among other items which should receive the consideration of the shipping board is the maintenance of standards for the personnel of the officers and men of the merchant marine. The school ships maintained by Massachusetts and New York are educating officers for the merchant marine. They are doing a most useful and necessary work. Thousands of young men throughout the country are ready for the call of the sea and are animated by the same spirit which filled the forecastle and quarterdecks of the American vessels 50 years ago. Other ships of this character should be established and the course of training amplified to make the graduates fit both for the merchant marine and the Navy. There are discharged from the Navy each year about 4,000 young men who have enlisted from all parts of the country. These men have had a most valuable training in the Navy, and should be encouraged to go into the merchant-marine service. Many foreign nations encourage the creation of such a naval reserve by paying a small additional wage to men honorably discharged from the Navy who continue a seafaring life and hold themselves in readiness as naval reservists. This practice is worthy of serious consideration.

It must, of course, be provided by law that any ships which receive benefits under the foregoing provisions must be either owned by American citizens or owned by American corporations a majority of whose stock is in bona fide ownership of citizens of this country.

It may be asked if it is necessary to have Government aid in so many directions in order to secure an American foreign merchant marine. What has become of American enterprise and American courage? The answer is that the old American merchant marine did not disappear in a day. It disappeared slowly by the substitution of iron for wood in construction and of steam for sail in operation. As it disappeared slowly it can be rebuilt only slowly, for in being rebuilt it has to fight its way into a position of successful competition against fleets which now control the business of the world. The initial effort will be the greatest; and much as this committee would like to believe that our American merchant marine can be reinstated with a smaller amount of Government aid than this report proposes, as men of experience and looking all the facts in the face, the committee is bound to say that, in its opinion, nothing substantially less than is contemplated by this plan can be expected with any sort of confidence to bring about satisfactory results on an adequate scale. If the Government will cooperate with private enterprise upon the lines suggested by this plan, the committee believes that the result will be satisfactory to the Nation. To do less than is proposed or to do it for a shorter time, in the opinion of the committee, would be likely to be disappointing. The question may then arise in the minds of some whether it is not better to do without an American foreign mercantile marine than to attempt to restore it by so much effort and with so much Government aid.

Prior to the outbreak of the European war the answer to this question always was, and probably would have continued to be, that if foreigners would carry our trade more cheaply than we can carry it ourselves it is an economic advantage to have them do so. Our experience as a great neutral nation since the outbreak of this war has changed all that. We find our foreign commerce to-day, though we are a nation at peace with all the world, as absolutely dependent upon the navies of the belligerents as the commerce of those belligerents themselves. Anything that should destroy, even for a few weeks, the belligerents' command of the sea between the United States and Europe, would jeopardize our trade carried on under belligerent flags precisely as though we were at war ourselves. This is a situation, in the opinion of the committee, which the American people will not permanently endure. If we are able as a nation to maintain peaceful relations with all the world, no matter how often the rest of the world may be at war, we also wish to maintain all of the shipping privileges of neutrals; and these can only be maintained when our merchandise is carried under our own flag. Your committee believes that the United States must have a foreign mercantile marine of its own on a scale reasonably commensurate with the foreign trade which the nation does.

If the foregoing plan is adopted, a shipping board to foster American commerce will be created, and the cost of constructing vessels for foreign trade in American yards, and operating them under the American flag, will be equalized for a reasonable development period.

There yet remains to be considered the disadvantage under which American steamship men will labor in securing capital for steamship enterprise, because of the lack of familiarity of American investors with steamship securities and the higher rate of interest paid upon other investments in the field of American enterprise, and also the question of compensation to be paid by the National Government for a definite mail-carrying service under the mail act. In treating the latter problem your committee reaffirms its opinion that the present mail requirements in the South American trade do not demand a speed of 20 knots, and an even less speed will be satisfactory for lines to South Africa, Australia, and the Orient. Your committee, therefore, recommends that the shipping board be given authority to reduce the speed requirements of the mail act of 1891 for first-class vessels from 20 to 16 knots trial speed, and for second-class vessels from 16 to 12 knots, leaving all other provisions of the act as they now stand.

In treating the problem of how to enable the steamship man to secure the necessary capital to develop the shipping industry, we have been persuaded that many objections will be advanced to any plan which does not definitely limit the Government's responsibility both as to the extent and period of the guaranty. The Alexander bill provides for the ultimate expenditure by the Government of $40,000,000 in vessel property and working capital. We suggest that the Government authorize the board, during the period of 10 years from its formation, to contract with approved steamship enterprises to guarantee bonds representing 50 per cent of the cost to the owners of such vessels as have been approved by the board for a service which the board believes to be desirable, from the standpoint of public welfare, the total amount of such guaranty not to exceed $40,000,000 and the bonds to run for not longer than 20 years, with appropriate provision for the amortization within that period, the Government to receive an annual payment of one-half of 1 per cent upon the bonds guaranteed. Included in the act authorizing such a guaranty should be a provision making the mortgages guaranteed a first lien upon the vessels except for tort.

Your committee would point out that if the provisions of the Alexander bill be followed, it will be necessary actually to spend $40,000,000 of Government money for vessel property subject to rapid deterioration and for which the Government will have responsibility for 100 per cent of the cost, without the assurance of any return.

If the plan outlined by your committee is followed, Government credit to the extent of $40,000,000 will be pledged, but vessel property representing $80,000,000 value will be produced, and the Government will receive a definite annual compensation for its guaranty.

Your committee considers this guarantee measure in the light of emergency relief, which is necessary to enable the steamship man to secure the money needed during a period when the finances of the world are in great stress, to enable him to take advantage of the other inducements offered by the Government, and to bring about shipbuilding on a scale which will permit of more economical construction.

You are reminded that no one of the provisions herein outlined embark the Government in any enterprise not approved by a Government board a majority of whom are Government officials, and definitely limits the payments and responsibility to a fixed development period.

While the European war continues, the subvention to equalize European and American steamship operating conditions and the guaranty of bonds secured by vessel property should include vessels constructed abroad, but with the return of normal conditions, the shipping board should be empowered to limit these provisions to vessels built in American yards, should such a course appear to it to be desirable. Appropriate action should also be taken to insure the retention under the American flag of all vessels covered by guaranteed bonds.

Your committee affirms its belief that the foregoing plan, equalizing as it does the cost of constructing vessels in American shipyards for a period of 10 years, the cost of operating vessels under the American flag in foreign trade for a total period of 30 years, and enabling the steamship man to secure during a period of 10 years by Government guaranty money at a moderate rate of interest to pay half of the cost of building vessels will result in the permanent reestablishment of the merchant marine of the United States in foreign trade.

The dangers connected with the Government ownership and operation of merchant vessels will be avoided, a much greater number of vessels created, and the relation of encouragement by the Government, instead of competition, be established with a legitimate field for private effort.

Your committee therefore asks the chamber to approve the foregoing plan for the creation of an American merchant marine in the foreign trade, based upon the principle of private ownership and operation, but with the encouragement of Government aid, and under the direction of a shipping board appointed to safeguard the interests of the public, and, further, that the chamber authorizes the committee to adopt such measures as it may deem desirable to secure favorable action by Congress.

Your committee moves the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York approves these recommendations, and authorizes the special committee on the American merchant marine in the foreign trade to urge upon Congress the enactment of legislation in accordance with the principles and methods outlined in the foregoing report."

Mr. President, I mentioned a moment ago the fact that the great trade organizations throughout the country were unfavorable to the bill. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] reminded me that the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York might be interested in the shipping interests or in the ships themselves, and that might have warped their judgments. I do not believe it did, but I have another authority which I want to quote, and which, to me, means a great deal, in the light of present conditions.

There is in my State the great university at Ann Arbor. I have thought that most of the faculty of that institution had a sort of fellow feeling for the President of the United States, because he, too, at one time was a schoolmaster. It has seemed so to me because it has been difficult for me to do anything that really pleased that faculty if I was in opposition to President Wilson. They have insisted that I should follow the President's advice and leadership on certain matters; so I was somewhat surprised the other day when I received a letter from a man who speaks, I believe with some authority, for the faculty. I will read it:

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN,
DEPARTMENT OF GEOLOGY,
Ann Arbor, Mich., January 25, 1915.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am glad to see that general opposition is being developed to the administration's shipping bill, and I sincerely hope that it will meet with defeat. I can only explain the President's action on the assumption that he has fallen into the trap laid for him by German sympathizers. In my opinion, and that of every one of my colleagues that has been consulted, the bill is fraught with a serious menace to our peaceful or, at all events, friendly relations with Great Britain. To open up such a subject at this critical juncture I can only liken to playing with fire near a powder magazine. As you know, the people are very sensitive concerning the protection supposed to be afforded by the national flag, and deliberately to send out the Dacia, to say nothing of presenting Germany with millions of dollars for material worthless to her at the present time, is little less than preposterous. I sincerely hope that you and your colleagues will succeed at least in defeating the administration's bill.

I am, very sincerely, yours, WM. H. HOBBS.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I might contradict that, Mr. President, by offering the resolutions passed by the legislature of a great Commonwealth of this Union, the Commonwealth of Alabama, where they passed resolutions unanimously indorsing and urging action upon the part of their representatives in the Congress of the United States to pass this bill in the interest of the general welfare of the country. I ask now, in all reason, which should weight the most—this individual testimony of a professor of biology, or some other "ology," that is poor food for the stomachs of hungry men, or this appeal from the legislature of a great Commonwealth like that of Alabama?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I find it is going to be very difficult for me to satisfy the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I am hard to satisfy; but if there is any man under whose tutorship I would rather live than any other man I am willing to say it is the Senator from Michigan. He is a most delightful and genial gentleman; our offices are right across the hall from each other, and many, many times when I lack inspiration I appeal to him.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I appreciate the friendly expressions of the Senator from New Jersey, and he knows that I reciprocate the friendliness which he has expressed and shown for me; but, as I said a moment ago, I find it is difficult for me to bring forth just exactly the argument or the testimony that would satisfy the Senator from New Jersey that this bill, judged by men who are perhaps best able to determine, is bad.

I presented the resolutions of the chamber of commerce composed of business men. I have received many such petitions or statements from business organizations where I know positively no one of them has ever invested a dollar in a ship or has any interest whatever in the owners of a ship. These business men, however, look at this from a business standpoint. I think this is a business proposition.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from New York for a question.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Michigan whether the members of the commercial organizations who have taken the action to which he refers do not include a very large proportion of American citizens, who, without owning ships or having a direct interest in ships, are familiar with the business of exporting and importing goods, so that they would have been the proper and natural persons to call before the committee to inform Congress about this vast and profitable business? Are not the men who have been trying to give expression to their opinions through the resolutions of these chambers of commerce the men who ought to have been called before the committee of the Senate to enlighten the Senate in regard to the business about which we are proposing to legislate?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is absolutely correct. I have been trying to say that. It has seemed to me that these business men are the very people who, at least, ought to have been consulted.

But I was trying to answer the statement of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] when he criticized the letter offered just now. He having previously criticized the suggestions of the business men of the country, because they might possibly be interested, I, then, as I said, brought forward this letter from this professor, thinking that inasmuch as it was from a professor who had had little business experience it might appeal to my friend. I thought possibly if I brought such a man here, representing the professors of the country, his opinion might possibly have some weight with the followers of a President who sees prosperity all over the country once a month regularly when he receives his pay check.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Just a moment——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts for a question.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, last night, when it seemed to me the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] was filibustering, waiting for the Vice President to take the chair, he made a statement which referred to the same subject which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is now discussing, rather reflecting on chambers of commerce and business organizations which have appealed to Congress on this subject. It seems to me the best service which has been done during this debate is calling to the attention of the country the weaknesses and follies in this bill.

I am perfectly familiar with the action taken by the Boston Chamber of Commerce and the men who led in taking that action. There are no better posted men on the subject of ocean transportation than the men who prepared the very excellent report coming from the Boston Chamber of Commerce and which has been presented to the Senate. What I want to ask the Senator is this: Is it not a new policy and a new position for Congress to take to turn aside from the advice and judgment of men who are conversant with a subject, as these men are, and say that they are interested and therefore we must do something directly contrary, and for that reason throw aside the experience not only of every European country, but the experience of our own people, and undertake something that is directly contrary to the experience of mankind?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It seems to me the statement by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is unanswerable; we ought at least to know the opinion of men who have had practical business experience.

Mr. President, I might, on some matters, be governed largely by theories undemonstrated, and while I do not measure a man entirely by his ability to succeed in business, yet somehow I have never reached a point where I felt that success in business was a crime. I believe that our whole country has been built up by the genius of men who could see and who have the courage to undertake the things which to me would have been impossible. We have reached a point now where this country is realizing that it can not be satisfied with declarations. This administration has been telling of things, has been declaring things, which we have never found to exist, which we have never yet experienced. The President's oratorical remedies for business depression, his verbal balm for his legislative failures, his ability to invoke psychological relief for diseased physical conditions reminds me of the lines in Much Ado (or is it Macadoo?) About Nothing:

> Patch grief with proverbs. Men can counsel and speak comfort to that grief which they themselves do not feel. Charm ache with air and agony with words.

So does our great Executive; and if at any time he shall lack, his industrious Secretary of the Treasury makes good the need. Experiment has followed experiment since March 4, 1913, but their harmful effects have been borne by business. This experiment is fraught with direful possibilities, which dollars may not be able to compensate. When all Europe is drunk with blood, the United States should remain sane and sober.

Let not our country, even for the prospect of gaining trade from our rivals now engaged in war, embark upon war-stirred seas whose waves may overwhelm us. Better it is to improve our own markets and enjoy them in peace than run the gantlet of international complications, with the doubtful prospect of aiding a few exporters who are more interested in profit than in peace.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. I notice, Mr. President, that our friends on the other side of the Chamber are very willing to vote when they think they have a majority. When they are not as certain as they would like to be that they have a majority—and that uncertainty has happened frequently in the last two weeks—they either filibuster or substitute another bill. We are now, I believe, discussing bill No. 4.

Mr. President, my contribution to this discussion will be very brief, for two reasons: In the first place, I realize that I can not expect to present any thought in opposition to this measure that has not already been presented with great force and in great detail; and, in the second place, I realize that what I say must be said solely for the purpose of relieving my own mind, and not with any expectation that it will enlighten the minds or affect the opinions of others.

I had hoped that the unanswerable arguments of the Senators who have preceded me would lessen somewhat the haste with which this bill is being forced through the Senate. I do not question the right of the friends of this measure to hasten its progress by every means within their power, but I do not think it will avail them much to use dum-dum bullets in their eagerness to destroy the opposition.

If the President is right in his view that this bill will not violate any principle worth saving, and be a great benefit to the country, then the sooner the opposition is overcome by the exercise of the power of the majority the better. If, on the other hand, the President is wrong, the opposition is justified in talking against this bill until the 4th of March next. The President takes the responsibility on the one side and is willing to do so, and he must also take the consequences whether willing to do so or not.

I think it is a great mistake for the President to try to absorb the legislative functions of the Government. As a Republican I am not as anxious to save the Democratic Party from itself as are some of my colleagues; but when I believe that a measure which is proposed and urged by the President will work against the "general welfare" and "common good," then I must object to it, for in no other way can I perform my duty as a Member of this body.

I voted for the Alaskan railroad bill, so called, because I am not afraid of the two words "Government ownership" or the single word "socialism." I realize that whenever the Government can perform a given service cheaper and better than it can be done by an individual, and in the performance of that service will not compete with or discourage private enterprise, there may be no occasion to fear the results. In Alaska there was no other way in which her resources could be developed. It was a Government railroad or no railroad. Under existing laws private capital could not and would not provide the railroad lines necessary. There was little danger of unfair competition, and there was no possibility of loss to any treasury but that of the United States. I know it was insisted that Alaska was a frozen desert and the experiment a foolish one, but, Mr. President, I remember that when I went to school in the little red schoolhouse a large portion of the United States was designated on the map as the Great American Desert. We know what has happened to that desert in the last 45 years, and I did not feel justified in assuming that this great peninsula, with its gold and silver, copper and coal, and measureless hydroelectric possibilities, would not some day produce great wealth and support comfortable and happy homes for millions of people. And so I voted in favor of a railroad to be built and controlled by the Government, believing the experiment to be justified under all the circumstances.

But now I am asked to give my approval to another transportation scheme—a Government-owned merchant marine—a scheme so full of ugly dreams and ghastly sights that I do not see how any thoughtful man can support it. But, Mr. President, I realize that many thoughtful men are supporting it. I find a majority of this body, which is supposed to represent the best thought and the highest integrity of any deliberative body in the world, about to cast its vote in its favor, and so there is nothing for me to do but vote "no" and hope for the best. I can not add anything to what has been said by those who believe as I do, and I have no desire to repeat at length their prophecies as to what will happen if the pending measure should become a law.

The loss of money, the discouragement of individual activity and enterprise, the danger of unfair and ruinous competition, the complications with foreign powers—all these things seem to me to be possible and some of them inevitable. That the Government will lose money and that private enterprise in shipbuilding will be discouraged, if not stopped entirely, will be the direct and unavoidable effect of this legislation. Admitting that all this could be endured and survived, we are, nevertheless, establishing a precedent; we are forming a habit by this legislation which once acquired will be exceedingly vicious and destructive in its effect. That is the thing which concerns me. If we pass this bill, we go over the falls, down the rapids, and out into the sea of governmental ownership of the means of transportation and the sources of production. It must be evident to all that once we carry Government ownership to the extent proposed in this bill, we cross the dead line where the only alternative is unconditional surrender.

The socialist knows, and the modern economist concedes, that the shoe factory, the flour mill, or the cornfield, or the cotton plantation are just as distinctly public-service institutions as is a railroad or gas plant. It can not be contended for a moment that food and raiment are less necessary to the public welfare than is transportation or light. The service which the optician renders when he sells me a pair of glasses, or the tailor when he makes me a suit of clothes, administers to the public need just as clearly and distinctively as does the electric light company or the railroad when they furnish me with light or transportation.

Mr. President, Prof. Taussig, who has been quoted frequently on the other side of this Chamber as an eminent and accurate authority upon these questions, has expressed himself very forcefully with regard to the point which I now make, and I quote briefly from his work on Principles of Economics, page 397:

The doubtful industries are those commonly designated, especially in this country, as "public-service industries," such as railways, the telephone and telegraph, the supply of water, gas, and electricity. The phrase "public service" is a question-begging one, implying, as it does, that a clear and simple line of demarcation can be drawn between the operations that are and those that are not appropriate for public management and control. Such industries as have just been mentioned are "public" in two senses. The one is legal and comparatively easy to define. The other is economic and more important, but more difficult of precise application; it rests on the character of the industries as monopolies.

A railway can not be built unless there is legislation for acquiring its right of way. Without the right to take land at a valuation—the right of eminent domain—it could be blackmailed or blocked by any landowner on its route. A gas company, again, needs the right to dig up the streets, an electric company similar rights to use or cross the streets. A street car company ipso facto uses the public highways. Hence these are in special degree dependent on public authorization, and so subjected with comparative ease to public control.

But it does not follow from this characteristic alone that they should be managed by the public or even subjected in any special degree to public control. The real reason for treating them as "public service" industries, in the sense that they call for public control, is economic, not legal; and the fundamental economic reason is that they tend to be monopolies. If competition were effective in them, as it is in the supply of boots and clothing and flour, the fact that some use of the highways was necessary would not be thought to entail public regulation, any more than the fact that the streets are used by cabs and omnibuses, hawkers, and street venders brings these ipso facto within the public-service class. On the other hand, even though there be no need of specific authorization, no grant of special powers or "franchise," no obvious means of control, any industry which reaches the full-fledged monopoly stage calls for regulation and suggests at least the possibility of public ownership. If flour making or bread making were in the hands of a tight combination, we should soon hear it dubbed a public-service industry. It is a public-service industry in the sense of being of vast importance for all the public. But it does not call for regulation so long as competition is sufficiently effective in it. Water supply is a public industry in every sense; legislative authorization is indispensable, the industry is supremely important, it has monopoly character.

If we pass this bill we put the Government into the transportation business in competition with the American navigator and shipbuilder. If we do this we may with equal propriety establish Government ranches and cotton plantations and farms, in direct competition with private ranches, cotton plantations, and farms. We may also establish factories for the manufacture of tools and clothing, and we do it, not for the purpose of assisting and encouraging private enterprise and industry, but to compete with and possibly destroy them.

We do not build and buy these ships to foster and help our marine carriers and merchants; we build and buy these ships to compete with them and so destroy the value of their property without process of law or adequate compensation.

Some reactionary and benighted Member of this body may suggest that the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution is not broad enough to permit the Government to engage in the production of cotton or corn or shoes, and so forth. If so, let me allay his fears by calling his attention to the fact that the chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. OWEN], a profound student of constitutional law and a close friend and follower of the President, on February 21, 1914, introduced a bill with the following title:

A bill to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes.

The first section of which I quote:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after January 1, 1915, no person, partnership, association, or corporation, or any agent or employee thereof, manufacturing, producing, or dealing in the products of any mine or quarry in which children under 16 years of age are employed or permitted to work at any time; or of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment in which children under 14 years of age are employed or permitted to work at any time, or in which children between the ages of 14 and 16 years of age are employed or permitted to work more than eight hours in any day or more than six days in any week, or after the hour of 7 p. m. or before the hour of 7 a. m. of any day, shall ship or offer or deliver for shipment such products in interstate commerce.

It is not to be supposed that the learned Senator would give his name and support to a bill so far-reaching and revolutionary in its operation without first obtaining the views of the administration, and having done this, the Senate need concern itself no further on the subject of the Constitution. The simple declaration that the cotton or shoes to be produced or manufactured by the Government shall be sold outside the State in which they are manufactured, and for the purpose of preventing monopoly in restraint of trade in such articles shipped, or offered or delivered for shipment, in interstate commerce would relieve the Supreme Court of all difficulties in the matter, in the opinion of those responsible for this bill. If Congress can regulate the hours of labor on the farm and say who shall and who shall not be employed to raise wheat to be sold in interstate commerce, the friends of the people will demand that Congress regulate the price of wheat and be given any and all powers that may be necessary to that end.

Cotton is cheap this year; next year, we are told, the acreage is to be cut in half. It will be a sellers' market, and the sellers will set the price to suit their pleasure. We shall then have another emergency. A great public utility, and one of prime necessity, may be cornered, and those who do not raise cotton, but wear it, may be expected to come to Congress with the proposition that the Government buy $50,000,000 worth of land in the cotton States and raise cotton to meet the demands of the people at reasonable prices. Or, we will suppose that the steel men, by an unwritten and gentlemen's understanding, curtail the production of pig iron or steel rails or structural iron; then Congress will be asked to build a steel mill, costing perhaps $30,000,000, to produce steel at reasonable prices.

Wheat sells to-day at $1.45 or more a bushel. We are told that this administration has ordered an investigation to be made for the purpose of ascertaining and punishing, if possible, the men who are responsible for the high price of wheat. Bread is the "staff of life." Bread is a public utility. Bread is made of wheat, and if the price of wheat does not come down the price of bread must go up. Congress must prevent it by purchasing 10,000,000 acres of wheat lands and raising wheat to be sold at cost.

It will be insisted by the politico-economic school behind this bill that governmental visitation and regulation are failures. You can not compel a man to do business at a loss. If you leave him his freedom of contract, he will do business at a profit or not at all. Therefore the only way to secure social justice and the equal distribution of property is to take away the right of private property. We will not confiscate it; we will render it valueless by governmental competition. Then we can buy it at our own price.

It has been maintained with considerable force that the Government can and must fix railroad rates, and that municipalities can own light and water plants and supply the public without seriously interfering with the right of private property. A large measure of economic liberty will survive, because these things are limited in their territory and scope and are, in a measure, natural monopolies.

But when you buy or build ships and start them in the transportation business you are not regulating a natural monopoly—you are entering a field of the same size as the earth; you are competing with fifteen hundred millions of people. You can destroy the American merchant marine with $30,000,000; but to carry your experiment to its legitimate conclusion will cost a billion dollars, all of which you may lose if you expect to compete successfully with other nations.

A little more than a year ago we enacted a tariff law which lays bare the American producer to the unfair and ruinous competition of the world. Last summer we enacted a trade commission law which sends to jail the American producer if he competes too sharply with his neighbors—an astonishing exhibition of inconsistency and false economy, it seems to me. We imprison an American for doing to his American competitor that which we invite the foreigner to do, and now we propose to join forces with the foreigner in this wit-sharpening and destructive process. Not satisfied with the effect of free and unlimited foreign competition, we propose to help out the foreigner by adding our merchant navy to his. We do not want to spend money for battleships to defend our shores from invasion and conquest; we want to build Government merchantmen that will drive the American shipper out of business.

We know that our forefathers left the shores of the Baltic 1,500 years ago for a purpose; we know that they suffered and died through the medieval centuries for that which has always been dearer than life to the Anglo-Saxon, and without which no man can do the work that nature's God intended and commanded him to do.

I have no desire to indulge in heroics, however ripe may be the occasion; but when I see the Democratic Party in the Senate of the United States hurrying to vote for a measure the only effect of which will be to deprive the American citizen of his economic liberty, I am surprised and disheartened.

Eighteen months ago President Wilson announced that his purpose was to restore liberty to the American business man. The President said that his tariff rates would destroy monopoly and restore freedom to American industry, and the Democratic Senate voted accordingly. He said that his banking act would destroy monopoly and restore liberty to American finance, and the Democratic Senate voted accordingly. His tariff rates worked the other way, and his banking act has not worked at all as yet. Nobody questioned his honesty of purpose; but now, after having made several grave mistakes—he already suggests the wisdom of changing his tariff rates—he proposes to confiscate the property of the American sailor without process of law or compensation, and he proposes to do this with governmental machinery put in motion by a Democratic Congress.

A few weeks ago, when the cotton crisis was most acute, he declined to lend the kind of assistance requested, and said:

> The gravity of the situation is very manifest, and I want you to know that I have been giving a great deal of attention to it, with the earnest desire to see some way by which the difficulties could be solved without committing the Government, in principle, to any action which would plague us in the future. Because the danger of the present situation is that under the pressure of what appears to be necessity we should make some radical departures from sound economic practice which in the future years we would very much regret. We have got to make great sacrifices not to make fundamental mistakes.

The proposition then was to lend money from the United States Treasury to the cotton growers in order to raise the price of cotton. The proposition now is to transport cotton at the expense of the Treasury in order that the price of cotton may be raised. He declined to eat the forbidden fruit then, but now he not only partakes freely of it himself, but passes around the ripe red apple of socialism to his Democratic Congress. I do not object to his methods; that is, I do not question his right to do this if he can. He takes the responsibility, and so do you when you yield to the tempter, but the consequences must be borne by the American people.

The Senators from the cotton-growing States insisted that if Congress would permit the printing of plenty of emergency currency, that currency would be used at once to raise the price of cotton. The money was printed, but it did not take the advocates of this plan long to see that what they needed for their cotton was a customer and not paper money. These customers could not be furnished by the Government printing press. They could be furnished only by a restoration of confidence in the market for cotton—confidence that the use of American cotton could and would be continued in foreign countries. If all doubt of this use could be removed to-day, cotton would sell for 12 cents a pound before to-morrow night. It was not the medium of exchange that was lacking; it was fear that the necessity for the exchange would be interfered with by the war.

Now, the supporters of this bill believe that a few more ships would raise the price of cotton. That this belief is not well founded is illustrated by the fact that while the price of cotton is still below normal, the price of wheat is abnormally high. It will be admitted that this fact is entirely due to the war. Bread is a prime necessity, and men will and must take every chance in obtaining it. Cotton is a secondary necessity, and men will hesitate and wait before committing themselves to large investments in that product. The scarcity of ships, if that is a fact, certainly has not affected the price of wheat, unless it be to raise that price. Why should the scarcity of ships depress the price of cotton if there was an urgent demand for cotton. The need of cotton is uncertain, and therefore customers are uncertain. If you double the number of ships it would not help the situation a particle. The same situation exists with regard to copper outside of Germany, and the demand in Germany is due to the fact that the allies, controlling the sea, will not permit its delivery.

The market for cotton is as extensive as the market for wheat. The minor obstacles in the delivery of both cotton and wheat are such as abnormal delays in loading and unloading, destruction of ships by mines, seizure and search under suspicion, seizure and possible confiscation, but the controlling factor in both articles, as demonstrated by the price, is the condition of mind of the possible customer. The consumption of wheat must continue at a certain rate, the consumption of cotton may go far below its normal rate. For these reasons it seems to me the proposed law will not in its operation affect the market price of cotton in this country.

The cotton growers of the South, I deeply regret to say, still need a customer for their product. More ships will not create that customer. Confidence in the future demand is the only thing that will raise the price of cotton, and certainty of consumption is the only thing that will restore that confidence. It is the only thing that will materially affect the price of American goods seeking markets in Europe to-day, and the consumption of the secondary necessities like cotton is and will be precisely as uncertain as the date of the termination of the present war.

When I say that the price of cotton would rise rapidly if it was known that the war would end next month, I state the situation accurately, I think; and when I state that the price of cotton will lag until something develops that will clearly indicate the quantity that will be consumed during the continuation of the war, I think I am equally accurate. The pending legislation will utterly fail to secure the results expected by its advocates. The Democratic Party, in its advocacy of this measure, abandons the vital principle of Jeffersonian Democracy—that is, the vital principle which we were brought up to believe and which history tells us was the faith of the Jeffersonian Democrats.

I could read every public utterance of Thomas Jefferson without finding a syllable in support of this measure, and I could quote pages of emphatic and sound warning against legislation of this kind. Economic independence was the text of every politico-economic sermon that Jefferson preached. Economic liberty and individual liberty were to him one and the same thing. You could not deprive a man of the former without taking away the latter.

Nobody doubts that President Wilson is a good modern Democrat, but nobody can prove that he is a Jeffersonian Democrat. President Wilson in his prophecies, to be sure, promises freedom of opportunity to the American business man, and, above all, equality of opportunity to compete fairly in all manner of industrial enterprise, and especially he promises freedom from all manner of governmental interference and competition. Nobody can express the Jeffersonian gospel of democracy better than did Mr. Wilson when he said:

> The reason that America was set up was that she might be different from all the nations of the world in this: That the strong could not put the weak to the wall; that the strong could not prevent the weak from entering the race. America stands for opportunity; America stands for a free field and no favor. * * * And until America recovers those ideals in practice, she will not have the right to hold her head high again amidst the nations as she used to hold it. (New Freedom, p. 220.)

This language expresses the faith and desire of every patriotic American, and yet the President in this bill is insisting that the sovereignty itself—the Government—with its vast resources shall own and operate a merchant marine to compete with the man whose entire fortune may consist of a tramp sailing vessel. I do not think this is protecting the weak against the strong, and I do not think this is giving the weak equality of opportunity. No one will contend, I think, that this proposition would have received the approval of Thomas Jefferson.

Let us follow the President a little further and consider a remedy for this lamentable situation, a remedy pointed out by President Wilson himself; that is, a way of escape which will always be applicable to both sides of this Chamber, and to each and every Member thereof when he goes astray. President Wilson, as you may remember, was bitterly opposed to the trade-commission idea as a regulator of big business when that idea was proposed by ex-President Roosevelt. He did not believe in the regulation of trusts by a commission until after his tariff rates failed to work as expected; and before I read the President's prescription for the prevention of the unwise and dangerous legislation now pending, I want to quote his description of the symptoms which necessitate the treatment recommended. Speaking of the Trade Commission, as proposed by Mr. Roosevelt and as approved in the Republican platform of 1912, he said:

From New Freedom, page 194:

> It did not anywhere condemn monopoly, except in words; its essential meaning was that the trusts have been bad and must be made to be good. You know that Mr. Roosevelt long ago classified trusts for us as good and bad, and he said that he was afraid only of the bad ones. Now, he does not desire that there should be any more bad ones, but proposes that they should all be made good by discipline, directly applied by a commission of executive appointment.

On page 195:

> Again, I absolutely protest against being put into the hands of trustees.

On page 204:

> And I warn every progressive Republican that by lending his assistance to this program he is playing false to the very cause in which he enlisted.

On page 206:

The Roosevelt plan is that there shall be an industrial commission charged with the supervision of the great monopolistic combinations which have been formed under the protection of the tariff, and that the Government of the United States shall see to it that these gentlemen who have conquered labor shall be kind to labor.

And, Mr. President, now we come to the remedy, and I quote from page 220 of the New Freedom. President Wilson is still dealing with the Trade Commission and Mr. Roosevelt's attitude toward it:

We ought not to permit passion to enter into our thoughts or our hearts in this great matter; we ought not to allow ourselves to be governed by resentment or any kind of evil feeling, but we ought, nevertheless, to realize the seriousness of our situation. That seriousness consists, singularly enough, not in the malevolence of the men who preside over our industrial life, but in their genius and in their honest thinking. These men believe that the prosperity of the United States is not safe unless it is in their keeping. If they were dishonest, we might put them out of business by law; since most of them are honest, we can put them out of business only by making it impossible for them to realize their genuine convictions. I am not afraid of a knave. I am not afraid of a rascal. I am afraid of a strong man who is wrong, and whose wrong thinking can be impressed upon other persons by his own force of character and force of speech. If God had only arranged it that all the men who are wrong were rascals, we could put them out of business very easily, because they would give themselves away sooner or later; but God has made our task heavier than that—he has made some good men who think wrong. We can not fight them because they are bad, but because they are wrong. We must overcome them by a better force, the genial, the splendid, the permanent force of a better reason.

If there should ever come a time when an able, honest, strong, but wrong-thinking, President should try to impress upon Congress his erroneous thoughts "by his own force of character and force of speech," "we must overcome them by a better force, the genial, the splendid, the permanent force of a better reason."

Mr. President, I assume that this sound position taken by the President of the United States will not be questioned by any Member of this body.

I assume that one of the reasons why the legislative and executive functions of the Government were not combined in one person or department was due to the fact that all honest, forceful men think wrong sometimes; that no man is or can be expected to be infallible. The execution of the law was left to the President, a single person, provided always that it must be executed as interpreted by the courts of justice. The humblest citizen may stay the voice and hand of a wrong-thinking Executive in the administration of the law. If he mistakes the meaning of the law, there is every precaution given by the judicial department for the rectification of such mistake. In the making of laws he has the advisory and veto power, but if there is one thing that is absolutely essential in the establishment of social formulas and rules of conduct involving the lives and liberties of a people, that thing is a multitude of counselors. As the elder Winthrop put it, "In matters that concern the common good a general council chosen by all to transact the business of all I conceive to be the wisest for all and the safest for the protection of all."

Experience has taught us that there is quite risk enough in the expressed will of the majority of a multitude of councilors. There is danger enough in the laws enacted by large bodies of skilled and honest and forceful men, but what may we expect when Members of the law making body vote against their convictions at the request of a single Executive? This sort of conduct involves the assumption that skilled and honest and forceful men are wrong in their conclusions as a rule. Therefore we must pick out one man and follow him, vote him infallible, and take our chances.

I voted twice against my convictions and in favor of legislation which passed the Senate during the first year I was a Member of this body. Fortunately neither of these measures has as yet been written into the Federal statute books. I shall vote my convictions with regard to them the next time an opportunity offers itself.

I do not assume to sit in judgment over my colleagues on this or the other side of this Chamber. The time may come when I shall again violate my judgment for the sake of party solidarity, or for other reasons. I do not think it is the safe way to do things, however, or the best way, and when a vital principle is involved it is always the wrong way. It is bad enough when we go into a party caucus and agree to abide by the result, when we honestly think that the decision of that caucus will not violate a fundamental principle, but even then, when the majority of that caucus is controlled by the Executive, the legislative department of the Government might as well be abolished in fact as it will be in effect.

I think I may say without being questioned that if the Senators who argued against free sugar had declined to vote for it, free sugar would have failed, and the Treasury would have been much richer and the price of sugar to the consumer would have been the same as it is now.

Again, if the Senators who believed in 4 regional banks, and did not believe in 12 regional banks and voted as they argued the law would have been finally written with but 4 regional banks.

It was, I think, the honest opinion of a majority of this body that free sugar and 12 regional banks were unwise; that the President thought wrong with regard to both of these provisions, and I know of no way to keep the erroneous thoughts of the Executive out of the statute books other than that which has been pointed out by President Wilson, and which I have read to you. When we have an honest, forceful, and very eloquent President who thinks wrong, as is clearly the case to-day, the only way to control him is by "better reasoning," and when we present that "better reasoning," the only way to make it effective is to vote in harmony with it.

As I have said before, either Thomas Jefferson has been misprinted, either he did not hold the views that have been accredited to him by his party and his own pen for more than a century, or he is now to be betrayed and the vital principle of his political philosophy is to be debauched and abandoned by his political successors.

It ought not to be necessary for a Republican to call attention to this fact, and I should not do it were it not also true that Thomas Jefferson was a Republican; he called himself a Republican, I believe, and he stood in his day where the Republican Party stands to-day. Protection to American industries and economic liberty were wise and absolutely vital to the progress and preservation of his ideal Republic.

About the time Jefferson died—July 4, 1826—King Cotton stole the heart of Miss Democracy away from protection, and after that she enjoyed the companionship of any good-looking tempter that happened to come along, including Free Silver, and now she is giving her heart and hand in holy matrimony to Paternalism. The Democratic Party to-day has ideas, but none of them Jeffersonian. They are the ideas of William Jennings Bryan, Richard Cobden, Eugene Debs, Carl Marks, and others.

The fact is that the Republican Party in 1860 restored to this country the ideals and political philosophy of Thomas Jefferson. Lincoln and Jefferson, if they were alive to-day, would vote the same ticket, and they would not vote the Democratic ticket. Certainly, they would not vote for this bill, because if they did they would stultify themselves, and they were not in the habit of doing that sort of thing. The same may be said of Madison, an ardent protectionist and an ardent antipaternalist.

The Democratic Party to-day preaches Jeffersonian Democracy, and practices anything that it thinks will be popular. The great trouble with us all is that voting—that is, party voting—is largely a habit, sometimes acquired, but generally inherited. It has been my observation that nearly all questions that are not made party questions are wisely disposed of, but when one party assumes infallibility and throws down the gauge of battle it is very apt to adopt Mr. Franklin's definition of "reason," to wit:

Reason is that precious faculty with which we convince ourselves that what we want to do is right.

And we are driven to this dangerous expedient because of an inherited habit of voting for and trying to perpetuate a name instead of a principle.

A few years ago nearly 6,000,000 supposedly intelligent American citizens voted for free silver—voted for it twice under the leadership of Mr. Bryan. Not one Democrat in ten who voted for Mr. Bryan believed in the 50-cent dollar, but he could not forsake his party. There are millions of Democrats who believe in protection and yet vote the Democratic ticket because their grandfathers and great-grandfathers voted that ticket. If these gentlemen would study their history, they would find that their progenitors voted the Democratic ticket because the Democratic Party then stood stoutly for protection. You will find no more forceful arguments in favor of protection to American industries than in President Madison's message to Congress in 1816.

As for Mr. Jefferson, I am going to let him speak for himself a minute or two, or, rather, I am going to let the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] tell what he thought of this sort of legislation when he wrote that best of all books about his idol, Mr. Jefferson.

First, I will call the attention of the Senate to my text, which was freely used by Senator WILLIAMS. It is found in Jefferson's first annual message, page 13, Works of Thomas Jefferson, volume 8:

Agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation, the four pillars of our prosperity—

I repeat that, Mr. President—

Agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation, the four pillars of our prosperity, are the most thriving when left most free to individual enterprise.

Now I will turn to Senator WILLIAMS's book on Thomas Jefferson. I read first from page 49, quoting Senator WILLIAMS:

My reading of history convinces me that most bad government has grown out of too much government. It is a sort of inherent characteristic of all government, as of all conscious organisms, yearly and almost daily to take to itself more and more jurisdiction, to increase the force and weight and numbers of officialdom, until after a while the structure becomes top-heavy and must fall by its own weight or else, upon the other hand, remaining administratively efficient, it holds the people in servile subjection. I know of no government which has ever once been strong and then fallen—except where it has been conquered by outside force—that did not go to its ruin because it had become gradually, even insidiously, cumbersome, top-heavy, unwieldly, complicated, almost incomprehensible—in a word, had assumed to itself more powers than could possibly be wisely administered by fallible men. Tom Jefferson did not attach a particle too much importance to the simplification of official life and governmental machinery. In him, as has been well said, was "crystallized the common American sentiment."

Again, on page 53, Senator WILLIAMS, in ecstasy over his idol Thomas Jefferson, continues as follows:

Some of the latter-day political "scientists" seem to want the world governed by experts. One of them speaks of a "central academy of science, which shall stand in the same relation to the control of men in which a polytechnic institute stands to the control of nature." In other words, individual rights and liberties are to count for nothing in comparison with scientific efficiency of bureaucratic administration. One of them does admit that "social interference"—that is, governmental interference—"should not be so paternal as to check the self-extinction of the morally ill constituted; * * * nor should it so limit the struggle for existence as to nullify the selective process." Thank God for small favors! The right of self-extinguishment at least is still left us by college governmental scientists.

What a service to his country the Senator from Mississippi could render if he would act now as he thought when he wrote this book. He could bring consolation and courage to those who agree with him and consternation to those who are blindly, yet honestly, following a college governmental scientist, who is rapidly leading his country to a scaffold of her own construction.

Again, on page 163, Senator WILLIAMS goes on to say:

Jefferson objected that the Constitution did not sufficiently guarantee the preservation of individual rights—"the inherent and inalienable rights of the people"—which had been protected in Great Britain by a Bill of Rights, and that a bill of rights ought to be embodied in our Constitution. This was done. Jefferson also desired to have engrafted upon the Constitution a provision declaring that the Federal Government had no powers except those granted it, either expressly or by necessary implication, and that all other powers were "reserved." This was done. Now, the chief business of a bill of rights is to protect the individual against unjust governmental action. The authors of the Federalist do not seem to have realized very intensely the importance of that, and yet, in so far as the judiciary has found in the Constitution a bulwark of protection for the people against the despotism of the Government or of popular majorities, as in the case of the civil-rights bill and some other reconstruction legislation, and many other enactments violative of natural or property or labor rights, this bulwark has consisted mainly in the amendments to the instrument, secured by Jefferson and others of his school, and not in the original instrument, as presented for adoption in the first instance.

In passing, Mr. President, and bearing upon the obligation of neutrals, a subject so directly involved in this legislation and of great importance, I will read Mr. Jefferson's opinion on this subject, quoted by Senator WILLIAMS in his Life of Jefferson, page 122. In introducing this quotation from Mr. Jefferson, Senator WILLIAMS says:

It will be noted that Jefferson, to whom the real credit is due for setting forth, in the ablest state paper ever written—in a way so masterly that it has never been improved on—the whole doctrine of neutrality and its special advantages to us is not given the credit by Mr. Foster. The truth is that, as far as our foreign relations under Washington are concerned, they were, for the most part, an expression of Jefferson's policies.

In proof of what I say here, read the unequaled statement by Mr. Jefferson as President of the duties of a neutral:

I now quote Mr. Jefferson:

Let it be our endeavor, as it is our interest and desire, to cultivate the friendship of the belligerent nations by every act of justice and of innocent kindness; to receive their armed vessels with hospitality from the distresses of the sea, but to administer the means of annoyance to none; to establish in our harbors such a police as may maintain law and order; to restrain our citizens from embarking individually in a war in which their country takes no part; to punish severely those persons, citizens and aliens, who shall usurp the cover of our flag for vessels not entitled to it, infecting thereby with suspicion those of real Americans and committing us into controversies for the redress of wrongs not our own; to exact from every nation the observance toward our vessels and citizens of those principles and practices which all civilized nations acknowledge; to merit the character of a just nation and maintain that of an independent one, preferring every consequence to insult and habitual wrong.

And these further lines, where he tells how neutral conduct especially redounds to the interest of this country and its people:

Separated by a wide ocean from the nations of Europe and from the political interests which entangle them together, with productions and wants which render our commerce and friendship useful to them and theirs to us, it can not be the interest of any to assail us nor ours to disturb them. We should be most unwise, indeed, were we to cast away the singular blessings of the position in which nature has placed us, the opportunity she has endowed us with, of pursuing at a distance from foreign contentions the paths of industry, peace, and happiness, of cultivating general friendship, and of bringing collisions of interest to the umpirage of reason rather than of force. How desirable, then, must it be in a Government like ours to see its citizens adopt individually the views, the interests, and the conduct which their country should pursue, divesting themselves of those passions and partialities which tend to lessen useful friendships and to embarrass and embroil us in the calamitous scenes of Europe.

How anyone can read this advice given by Mr. Jefferson more than a hundred years ago and vote for this bill is inexplicable to me.

I continue:

I am confident, fellow citizens, that you will duly estimate the importance of neutral dispositions toward the observance of neutral conduct, that you will be sensible how much it is our duty to look on the bloody arena spread before us with commiseration, indeed, but with no other wish than to see it closed. I am persuaded that you will certainly cherish those dispositions in all discussions among yourselves and in all communications with your constituents.

And yet "history writers," as the children call them, of the federalistic type, represent him as having been "forced to a system of neutrality by the President." The truth is that, although the bulk of Jefferson's party were carried off their feet temporarily by sympathy with France, and though her people had his heartfelt good wishes, he never permitted his gaze to be deflected from the interests of his own country.

The fact that the pending measure is offensive not only to the letter of the Constitution but to the one principle of right and fair play recognized as essential to the "general welfare," has been presented and urged with great force and clearness by the Senators who have preceded me. I believe that this bill is not only bad in principle, but that it will in no measure accomplish the temporary relief sought.

Now, let us see if we can tell what will happen if this bill becomes a law; that is, what it seems to be conceded will happen by those in favor as well as those who oppose this measure. It is always well to bet on a sure thing when you can. This debate has proceeded long enough and far enough to enable any impartial observer to arrive at certain and sure conclusions as to the advantages and disadvantages that will result from this bill if it is passed.

It is understood that the preservation of the basic principles of this bill will destroy the right of private property in ocean transportation.

If there is any doubt about that question, and in order that there may be no doubt, I will quote from the fountain of pure and ultimate wisdom upon this subject, the latest letter received from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitted to the Senate January 27, 1915, page 17:

The Bureau of Navigation of the Department of Commerce estimates the total value of all our ships in the foreign and domestic trade and on the Great Lakes, including sail vessels, steam vessels, motor boats, canal boats, barges, etc., to be about $600,000,000. The Bureau of Navigation states that the approximate value of American ships engaged in the foreign trade, including steam and sail tonnage, is only $69,000,000.

It is argued by some that the Government should not do anything for the relief of our foreign commerce that will cause competition with this $69,000,000 of private capital invested in ships engaged in the foreign trade, but that it is a paramount duty of the Government to protect this shipping interest against competition even though by so doing we leave our foreign trade entirely at the mercy of foreign ship interests and the relatively small amount of American capital invested in ships engaged in the foreign trade.

In order to protect this $69,000,000 against competition, as suggested by the arguments of the opponents of the shipping bill, the Government would have to permit the owners of American vessels, as well as the owners of foreign vessels, which do the great bulk of our ocean-carrying trade, to continue to levy such taxes in the form of increased freight charges upon the $2,047,755,872 of our export trade, as these foreign and American steamship owners may determine.

Here the Secretary plainly says that there is no objection to the destruction of our foreign merchant marine. If that same philosophy had been adopted 100 years ago with regard to our coastwise trade, we would probably have from ten to fifty million dollars invested in our coastwise trade instead of $650,000,000.

The result is, as the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] stated and so vividly illustrated yesterday, that it is becoming a habit for any section of the country, any association of men, or any man who is in trouble to come to the Government for help. There is no reason why the Government should consider the interests of a minority or consider investments already made by individuals, notwithstanding those investments are to be rendered valueless without compensation or without process of law in order that some other set of individuals may be temporarily helped.

The second item of importance is the measure of profit or loss that will follow and result to the people in the application of the proposed effort on the part of the Government to engage in transportation in competition with individuals. Upon this second item the speech of the Senator from Montana is, I think, conclusive, and I quote from his speech because it fairly and fully represents the views of the majority upon this all-important point. If we are to violate the principle which for centuries has been deemed by the American people to be most vital, we certainly ought to be sure that it will pay us in dollars. The technical part of Senator WALSH's argument, which insists that the allies can not under the existing rules of international law legally seize the interned German and Austrian vessels, if put into commission after purchase by Americans, may be sound and it may not. His argument is historically interesting and able, and, perhaps, sound until he arrives at the vital question, Will the transfer of interned ships to Americans for a fair price, under the circumstances now existing, be made to avoid the consequences of war and therefore illegal? As the Senator's answer to this question is most intimately connected with his conclusions as to what will actually happen, whether his view be finally sustained or not, I will quote them first. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 28, page 2667:

> The ships to be acquired will, accordingly, be amenable in any court in any country under circumstances which would subject merchant ships held in private ownership to their jurisdiction. They may be seized if they carry contraband and divested of it. They may themselves be haled before a prize court that their right to fly the American flag may be inquired into. In short, they will be subject to just such treatment by foreign powers as merchant ships must undergo under the rules of international law. There will, accordingly, be no more risk of international complications than are likely to arise in connection with ships held in private ownership. Indeed, there will not be so much, for the latter may lend themselves to efforts clandestinely to introduce contraband into a belligerent country. The Government-owned ship will scarcely be subject to the suspicion of such conduct.
> There may be valid arguments against the pending bill founded upon considerations of domestic policy.

The Senator admits that there may be valid arguments against this bill founded on considerations of our domestic policy. Then he goes on to say:

> There are no evils attendant upon it, assuming it becomes a law, so far as our foreign relations are concerned, that have thus far been pointed out, even if the shipping board should conclude to test, by the purchase of one or more of the belligerent ships in our ports, the question as to whether the Declaration of London has forever foreclosed us from further maintaining our historic attitude concerning the rights of neutrals to purchase vessels of nations at war.

The Senate will note that the whole argument of the senior Senator from Montana was directed to the claim that the Government had the right to purchase these interned ships; that by doing so no possible hazard could result through their operation; and yet, Mr. President, since he delivered that speech that position has been abandoned by the other side of this Chamber, and an amendment has been introduced and is now pending which provides that these interned ships can not be purchased without first obtaining permission from all of the warring nations.

It seems to be conceded now that the purchaser of one of these interned ships will buy a lawsuit, and a lawsuit long enough to defeat entirely the purpose sought to be accomplished by this act. The Senator from Montana admits that there may be "valid arguments against this bill founded upon constructions of domestic policy." Again, there is no doubt in his mind, of course, and there can be no doubt in anyone's mind, that the warring nations will have the right to seize every one of those vessels, take it home, and hold it until its own courts have decided the question as to whether it or its cargo, or both, can be lawfully held.

Now let us use our common sense for a minute. There are 60 or more of these interned ships. If they were sold to this new and nameless creature of the "New Freedom" it might take the allies a week to remove them from the seas and into court with their cargoes, tackle, and so forth. If we were in the position which they occupy, the law of self-preservation would be as vital and its decrees as pressing upon us as it is now upon them.

The last word in international law is as well known and has been as strictly respected by us as by them—namely, "Right or wrong, my country." The appeal to the national spirit, so plausibly and attractively presented by the friends of this measure, has already been substituted for the golden rule in Europe and Japan and England. "Do unto others as you would not have them do to you" is all there is left of the law and prophets among the warring nations in their treatment of each other. We are at peace with them; we are neutral. Shall we follow their example and substitute national pride and greed for national honor? They are compelled to take this course; it is a question of life or death. The sod of Europe is drenched with the blood of innocent men and boys. The living are crying out for protection for their lives and retribution for their dead. The fate of three hundred millions of people, perhaps the fate of the civilized world, hangs upon the result of this great struggle. History is powerless to help us, and prophecy is helpless. Laws, sacred and profane, are helpless. Do we, any of us, believe to-day that the peacemakers should and will inherit the earth? We all believe they should, but what chance is there that they will if we now substitute national pride for national honor? If this corporation is formed, it is formed for the purpose of deception only. We are afraid to do this directly, like a man, so we try to disguise the wolf in this shapeless but expensive and highly colored garment and start out a sweet and benevolent old granny looking for the first little Red Riding Hood that may happen our way.

Which one of the great nations now at war do you think will succumb to our blandishments? Which one will take the chances of losing her life under the spell of this splendid example of Mother Goose statesmanship?

The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, another Hamilton of finance so the President tells us, agrees with the Senator from Montana. There is no difference of opinion as to the effect of this law upon other nations. They will seize and try. If they condemn, what then? What will be the effect upon us? These boats will not belong to Richard Roe; they will belong to Uncle Sam, and when they have all been captured—as, of course, they will be as soon as they get beyond the 3-mile limit—the Government, in the name of its nameless counterfeit, will be haled into court and libeled, and let us assume that the court takes the view held by those who oppose this measure. Let us assume that the English judges agree with the great lawyers of this country who do not agree with Senator WALSH and Secretary McAdoo. We may next observe these vessels sailing bravely and safely upon the ocean bearing the English or French or Russian or Japanese flag, or if they fail to hold command of the sea we may expect to see them under the German or Austrian or Turkish flag.

What will happen? A few months ago the President declared war against Mexico and directed his Congress to fall in line with a similar declaration because of the irresponsible refusal of an irresponsible and private individual to discharge any gun he might be able to obtain a certain number of times in order that an adequate and complete apology for an imaginary insult to the flag might be properly and personally condoned.

I do not know what the President would do if ships owned by this Government should be seized and condemned and recommissioned under the British flag, for instance, or seized or sunk by German battleships; but I do know that the peacemakers in this country would have their hands full. Conditions are sensitive enough now. One overt unneutral act or one white feather shown by Uncle Sam in the performance of his sworn and sacred duty to preserve strict and constant neutrality might produce distressing conditions.

The tides of war will throw more and more wreckage upon our coasts. The process of gathering it is morally nonexhilerating, to say the least. Its profits will more and more excite the envy and distrust of those who can not share them.

Ardent sympathizers with the cause of Germany say that a large portion of these profits is blood money. British sympathizers would tell us the same thing, should the tables turn. Whether this be true or false, let us keep the hands of the Government clean of it. The streets and newspapers are full of assertions that the warring powers have already protested to our Government against the release of the ships. If this is true, we should know it. There is every reason to suppose that it is true. Shall we start the powder cart up and down our own streets when everybody's hands are full of matches and expect to escape the inevitable?

It seems to me that this is our time to save the inheritance of the peacemaker by preserving our national honor and common sense. These ships will be seized and held, and they will be held long enough to cause all kinds of irritation and recrimination and unfortunate complications in this country. Let us do something ourselves, and do it with our own ships—ships built in our own shipyards by our own citizens. If we want to do anything, let us help our own navigators and not drive them off the seas. If the emergency is acute enough to warrant the wrong kind of subsidy, it is acute enough to warrant the right kind of subsidy.

The only benefit that can accrue, therefore, as a result of this legislation will accrue to those who draw salaries as managers of this bar-sinister corporation and to those who receive commissions on the proposed purchases.

As I stated in the beginning, I am not afraid of the words "Government ownership." I believe there is a dividing line which courageous and wise experiment will soon find—a line that will leave upon the one side the things that belong to the Government and upon the other the things that belong to the individual, to the advantage of both and to the injury of neither. I believe that this line can be found by any set of men whose eyes are not blinded by mistaken zeal or by power or lust for more power, and it is to be deeply regretted that the Senate of the United States has not the wisdom and the courage to meet this emergency as it can and should be met.

There is nothing new in the need and there is nothing new or unknown about the remedy. The safe and sure way may be found in the experience of this or any other country.

Our hope and our responsibilities are greater to-day than have ever before been given to any other nation in this or any other age. If we had the courage and wisdom to take the right road and keep it, the world must follow us. We know the way; we have been pointing it out to ourselves for more than a century. We can not take the path pointed out by this bill and expect to save anything in our civilization that we now consider worth saving—that is, provided we follow that path to its end.

This bill is the fourth act in Mr. Wilson's "tragedy of trade," of which he is the author and in which he is the hero. In the first act he destroyed protection to American industries; in the second act he shot at high finance and missed, and apologies have been accepted; in the third act he shot at "big business" and hit "little business"; in the fourth act we see him now, pistol in hand, threatening the American merchant marine.

I have noted with interest the intense anxiety of the Democratic administration to aid the American merchant marine, the moribund condition of which is largely due to the Democratic Party. This anxiety indicates a stricken conscience, and would indicate a return to sanity but for the fact that the plan proposed to bring about this resurrection precludes the possibility of its success.

I have noted with great interest the celerity and assurance with which the caucus-bound Senators of the majority compliment and extol loyalty to conviction on this side and condemn and denounce it on their own side. An independent Republican is a statesman and a saint; an independent Democrat is a sinner and a traitor, a consort and defender of foul and crooked monopoly.

A short time ago, when the Trade Commission bill was under consideration, Democratic Senators who are now regular were then recalcitrant. How bitterly they assaulted the intimations that they were disloyal to the party and the President. How certain they were that the flag of the Republic and the Democratic Party were kept from the hands of treason by their superior wisdom and courage. Then it was the President who was the friend of monopoly because of his indifference to the inadequate penalties provided in that bill. Now these Senators are regular and others, who are loyal to conviction, are the target for all manner of accusation and innuendo. Of course this sort of thing is unfair and ineffective. In spirit, at least, it violates the rules of that body, and in fact it violates the truth. If there is a shipping trust, those who oppose the bill may well reply that the control of one monopoly does not properly lie in the creation of another.

A shipping trust or monopoly should not, and need not, be endured in any form. A Government monopoly is quite as offensive to principle as a private monopoly where the service sought can best be rendered by private enterprise. Ocean transportation, properly encouraged and regulated by the Government, will awaken private capital and sharp competition, and we may constantly expect increasing tonnage and decreasing rates, precisely what has already been accomplished in the coastwise trade. A Government monopoly means the elimination of all competition. It means arbitrary rates, destructive of incentive to reduce cost. I am exceedingly anxious that the Government should lend its aid to our merchant marine. If that all-important activity is now a monopoly, I would regulate and control it by rendering competition attractive and profitable. I would not try to remedy the existing evil by substituting another more pernicious in principle and of exceedingly doubtful utility. I am not moved to change my views by innuendo, which is founded in the hope that Senators can be led away from duty and conviction through fear that the public will be as unjust as the innuendo is false and offensive.

When it was openly charged that Senators who opposed this bill were either intentionally or unintentionally protecting a monopoly I assumed that Senators making this charge believed that the pending suits instituted by the Government against certain alleged combinations in restraint of trade upon the ocean were well grounded.

I hold in my hand an item which has been going the rounds of the newspapers for several days, and it reads as follows:

ENDS SHIP "TRUST" SUITS—FEDERAL COURT DISMISSES CASES ALLEGING TRADE CONSPIRACY.

NEW YORK, February 5.

The Government's antitrust suits against the Prince Line, the Hamburg-American Line, the Lamport & Holt Line, and others, charging restraint of trade in connection with freight and passenger steamship business between American ports and Brazil, and against the American-Asiatic Steamship Co. and others, whose steamships ply between New York and Asiatic ports, has been dismissed.

The Government's suits were filed about two years ago. That against the Prince Line and others charged that the companies composed the so-called Brazilian conference; defendants to the other suits were all members of the so-called far eastern conference, it was alleged.

I have every reason to suppose that this report is correct. So it now appears that the suits against the shipping trusts, some of them at least, have been dismissed by the new Democratic Attorney General. If the horrible octopus of the sea were as dangerous as has been depicted by those in favor of this bill, it would seem to be their duty now to question the integrity of the Department of Justice rather than that of Senators who oppose this measure. If the Democratic Attorney General has done his duty, it is quite safe to assume that there is no Shipping Trust, and the cause which moved certain Senators to bitter denunciation and inuendo does not and never has existed.

Everybody knows that the Department of Justice can successfully deal with shipping combines if they exist under the American flag; everybody knows that there was merciless competition between the German and English ocean carriers prior to the outbreak of the war, and everybody knows that now the question is one of torpedoes and mines and not of monopoly. If we concede to each Senator absolute honesty of purpose, which we may safely do, I think this circumstance ought to persuade us to deal with this question as patriots, for even then our task will be none too easy.

There are two or three Senators upon this side of the Chamber who insist that Government ownership and Government operation are the only ways out of the difficulty. These Senators are Republicans, able and honest, and anxious to do the only wise thing. Yet no suggestion looking to the Government ownership and operation of transportation lines that are not and can not be considered as natural monopolies has ever been able to creep into a Republican platform. Government participation in trade in competition with private enterprise for the express purpose of fixing prices by reducing the cost of production has always been denounced by both the great political parties.

On the other hand, Government participation in trade is the major premise and framework of socialism, and every Senator who supports this bill, in my opinion, votes to begin the destruction of economic liberty in this country. The fact that Senators who favor this bill are honest and able—the very fact that they believe in Government participation in trade is prophetic of more Senators of the same sort.

Mr. President, the steamship line that takes wheat from New York to Liverpool is just as definitely a producer of wheat as is the farmer who sows or reaps or thrashes wheat. Every penny that attaches to the cost of a loaf of bread to the consumer is a part of the cost of producing that loaf of bread. I am just as heartily in favor of Government assistance to our merchant marine as any man in this Chamber. I fully realize that we are facing an emergency which may never—and we all hope will never—come again. If the means provided by this bill to secure the ends desired were the only means at our disposal, I might shut my eyes and vote for it, so eager am I to remove any obstacle which may interfere with our trade upon the ocean; but when the means proposed are clearly the most inefficient and dangerous in their operation and the most vicious in principle that can be devised I can not support them. When the Republican Party, as a party, subscribes to the doctrine of Government participation in trade for the purpose of creating competition in production outside of those public service agencies which may fairly be called natural monopolies I shall leave it. Or if I should change my mind and become convinced, as some of my colleagues are, that Government participation in trade in lines that can not be and are not natural monopolies is safe and wise, I shall join the forces which have stood for the Government ownership of the means of production for 3,000 years. We can not hide the future or cloud the issue involved in this discussion. If the people of this country vote their convictions in 1916 they will demand the restoration of tariff rates that will preserve our industrial independence and prosperity. That issue settled right again, and for a long period, the prosperity that will result will bring acute and persistent agitation for a more equal distribution of the national surplus.

The demand for social justice—a meaningless but exceedingly praiseworthy pair of words—will be construed by the demagogue to promise economic equality. I will not here indulge in argument to prove that economic equality is another term for economic slavery, which will no sooner be had than it will be hated as the worst calamity that can befall the people.

I merely wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that when the tariff question has been settled as it should be the two great parties will be called upon to embrace or reject the ever-increasing demand for an extension of Government participation in trade. The Democratic Party and the Republican Party will be called to the highest peaks of the mountain of practical politics, and all the kingdoms of power and immortality will be promised if they will accept and preach paternalism.

It will be asserted that Government regulation has failed and that Government ownership is the only alternative, and that disaster will follow the political party that resists and turns aside the tempter. It is most gratifying to me to see Senators from New England joining hands with Senators from Alabama and Mississippi and Georgia—joining hands to fight for the gospel that promises to every man an opportunity to make a man of himself and live a man's life. It is not for me to say that any Senator on the other side of this Chamber will vote against his convictions when he votes for this bill, but the time is coming when Jeffersonian Democrats and Lincoln Republicans will unite to send the tempter on his way and will join their forces in the fight against those who would now remove opportunity from the white man and substitute Government slavery in its stead. And I want to say to my ultraprogressive friends upon this side of the Chamber there will be room for three parties only. There will not be room for four. If the paternalists capture the organization and write the platform of either of the old parties it is unnecessary for me to predict results. We all know what must happen, and now is the time for us to deliberate and make no mistake.

We face an emergency which will soon pass. To meet that emergency we are asked to renounce the basic principle of our civilization—a principle which it will be hard for us to regain if once rejected. We can endure delay and inconvenience in transportation; we can not endure the loss of our natural rights as free men. We can survive excessive freight rates; we can not survive economic slavery. The putting aside of vital principles to meet an emergency has worked the beginning of the decadence of the nations that have failed and fallen. If we pass this bill we open a door that no democracy in history has been able to close. I shall hope that the United States will be an exception. I firmly believe that it will be an exception. I shall confidently expect that this door will be closed again some time, but the Democratic Party will never be able to do it if it passes this bill. When you pass this bill you throw away your arms and surrender to meet an emergency, to be sure, but all surrenders are compelled by emergencies. You do this to punish a marine monopoly which does not exist, according to your Attorney General. The next emergency will require Government interference in trade to punish combinations on land which do exist, and if you fail to answer the call other Democrats will be chosen in your places who will heed that call. We can regulate and control monopoly in some fashion and we can punish the monopolist in any fashion we choose, but we can not regenerate the adult wicked by law.

I believe in Government regulation and the punishment of lawbreakers. I am decidedly opposed to the destruction of individual opportunity and aspiration, and I am opposed to it, because, in my opinion, it is unnatural and wicked.

The party which creates and then follows a misguided and mistaken public clamor may have its day, but it will be a short day. It will not take the American man or boy long to see his mistake, and the party that induces him to make that mistake will regret it. It may take some time because the voice of paternalism is seductive and candidates for office want to be elected. Men are emotional, and, as President Lowell says, "organized emotion is the mainstay of the demagogue" when he leads Democracy to its doom, when he makes promises that he knows can not be performed. It may take some time for the laboring man to realize his mistake, but all in due time he will want and he will regain his freedom, and it will not be the "new freedom" which must be enjoyed within suffocating walls erected by well-paid Government officials. It will be the old kind of freedom—the kind his Creator gave him, the only kind worth having, if his life is to be worth living; the kind that the Republican Party stands for; the kind which the Democratic Party once stood for; the kind that will be taken away if this bill passes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have rarely risen to discuss a grave and important subject under more inspiring and encouraging conditions than those which now surround us. Senators have been 48 hours without sleep, and it may be that the weariness and fatigue of their bodies have brought their minds into that receptive state in which they can appreciate an argument upon what our Democratic friends say is the most vital measure that has been laid before Congress in the last decade. Nevertheless I am plagued with the suspicion that just now sleep instead of speech would be the more welcome.

Mr. President, I approach the duty I am about to perform with mingled emotions. I do not agree with much that has been said upon this matter by my colleagues upon this side of the Chamber. While I believe that the bill itself is one of the most vicious proposals ever submitted to the Congress of the United States, my opposition to it is not based upon the ground that it is unwise or unsafe for the Government of the United States to enter upon this enlarged activity. I am not very much concerned with regard to the consistency of the President of the United States, nor am I anxious with regard to the preservation of the teachings of Thomas Jefferson. I revere the men of the olden time, but they knew nothing more about the conditions which now confront us and about what the Government of this country should do at this time and under the developments which we now witness than we can know with respect to the Government and the practices of those happy spirits who have passed beyond and are enjoying the heavenly light of the new Jerusalem.

We have just as good and complete opportunity to judge the principles of government as had the forefathers. We have a vastly better opportunity to determine what is necessary for us in order to promote the public welfare and secure the general good than they possibly could have had. I do not intend, therefore, to draw into my discussion the abstractions of the men of the early days or the theories of those who have intervened between their time and ours. My understanding of the true office of history is rather to cultivate and train the mind so that we may draw just and fair conclusions from the circumstances in which we live, but we are not to accept blindly the application of economic or governmental theories announced a hundred years ago or more.

I felt that I ought to say this because I approach the subject from a different angle and look upon it from a different standpoint than that used or occupied by many of my very able friends who have preceded me.

A few days ago I laid before the Senate some observations with regard to this bill tested by a constitutional standard. I sought to impress the Senate with the conclusion that we have no constitutional power to adopt the legislation that is proposed in the bill. I have no doubt about the soundness of that conclusion. If my Democratic friends pursue this course and shall be successful in enacting this bill into a law, they will have been engaged in a vain undertaking, because upon the first challenge it will go down under the judgment of the courts. It is so plainly and so obviously beyond our constitutional authority I have sometimes thought that there are people supporting the bill along the lines that it has now taken because they know it will not endure the stress of judicial investigation. However, that is a conclusion that I draw from the circumstance and not because I have any evidence of it at all.

Mr. President, I am surrounded in the Senate every day by honest men. I do not indulge the habit of imputing wrongful and corrupt motives to my fellow workers in the field which we jointly occupy. I believe that every man in the Senate will decide the question that he must decide with honest, upright, and pure purposes.

I know that the Senators in this body who are proposing the bill and who are advocating and defending it day after day are patriots and intend to accomplish something for the general good. I can not believe that this bill is intended to benefit and enrich the great shipping corporation of which my friend from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] spoke the other day with so much eloquence and, as I think, with so much truth; but taking the bill itself, just as it is, without the evidence of my personal observation of those who are advocating it, if I had not known them, I would have believed that the bill was presented by men who desired to destroy whatever opportunity there may be to help the people of the United States in the exigency or emergency that is said to exist.

I intend, Mr. President, for the purposes of this argument, to accept the recital of the Senator from Florida with regard to the existence of a shipping trust. When I use that term it must be understood that I am not using it in its technical sense. There may be no shipping trust, tested by the standards of the antitrust law, but there is in the shipping business precisely, as there is in every other great business, a sympathetic communion of thought and concerted plans of action. If the Senator from Florida could believe, as I do, that this bill is precisely what a trust of that character desires, if any legislation is to be enacted, I am sure that his patriotism and his desire to serve the people would at once compel him to abandon the advocacy of the bill.

I intend further, so far as this argument is concerned, to accept the view of international law so ably and so conclusively announced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I believe his view of international law, so far as the purchase of ships is concerned, is a correct view. I do not believe in the declaration of London; especially do I not believe in article 56 of that convention. That article carries the civilization of the world back 300 years and leaves this subject just as it was when war was a normal condition and the rights of neutrals were not regarded or were negligible in the estimation of mankind.

That does not mean, sir, that I am in favor of buying the interned ships of belligerents—far from it. If the transfer is in good faith, if the purchase is a bona fide one, I believe we have a right to do it, and that the ship so purchased has just as good title to sail the seas as a neutral ship as though we had built it in our own shipyards; but we must all recognize that this view of international law is not accepted by the nations with which we must deal. Great Britain repudiates this view of the law, France never held this view of the law, Germany would reject it, Austria would have none of it, and the result would be that if we purchased one of these ships, even under the rule that I believe ought to prevail, yet we would be under the humiliating necessity of seeing her condemned in an English prize court, or a French prize court, or a prize court of any other nation that might seize her and carry her into port.

All this means that the present is not the time to attempt to change or modify international law. There is an old Latin maxim very pertinent and very applicable to the present situation—inter arma leges silent. I think it will be our highest duty when the war ends to endeavor to bring international law into the light of the twentieth century and to see if we can not advance somewhat the rights and the privileges of neutral nations. We shall fail in one of the great opportunities of the world if when peace dawns upon these warring nations we do not do something to develop and improve international law, as our domestic or municipal law has advanced and improved.

I have said so much because I wanted my position with regard to these two great peaks in the present campaign to be understood, for I am not one to scout the suggestion that there is the same sort of combination among those who carry on transportation upon the sea that there is among those who carry on the business of transportation on land. Capital is always sympathetic; capital is always intimate; it is not difficult to bring about concert and unanimity of opinion and unison in action without any definite agreement that would bring the conspiracy within the terms of the antitrust law.

I shall discuss this bill, Mr. President, from the standpoint of one who honestly and sincerely believes that the Government should buy or should build ships to the extent of $30,000,000 or more. I have believed that for many years, and I will undertake before I have finished to show why we should buy or build these ships entirely apart from the interests of commerce.

Nearly five years ago, Mr. President, when the proposal for a ship subsidy was pending before this body I introduced a substitute or an amendment which provided that the Government should build—I have forgotten whether the amount named was $25,000,000 or $30,000,000—should build ships as auxiliaries to the Navy, and I will demonstrate before I have finished how much we need them as auxiliaries to the Navy. I shall show before I have taken my seat that it is a crime, if foolishness can be a crime, for us to proceed with the development of a Navy of battleships and fighting ships without enough auxiliaries or aids to carry them 200 miles from shore if our strength were challenged upon the sea.

I have never been able to understand how Congress could go on year after year appropriating for two battleships or three or four battleships and for submarines and the like, blind to the fact that if we ever needed to use these ships we could not send them two days' journey from our own coast unless we could secure from foreign nations the auxiliaries or supply ships necessary to enable them to maintain our place upon the ocean.

It is just as indefensible for us to build battleships without accompanying auxiliaries as it would be to build battleships if we knew that we had no officers, no sailors, no crews with which to man them. It is just as foolish as it would be to build battleships and put no guns upon them, for our Navy would be as helpless in a contest with any foreign country if they were compelled to sail away as it would be if we had not a gun upon any of them. I shall demonstrate that by our history during the last few years. I am only suggesting it now, because I am examining the subject primarily from that standpoint.

I think we ought to have these ships, and I am willing, notwithstanding a depleted Treasury, notwithstanding my want of confidence in the administration under which we are now living—and the Lord knows there is not a man under the shining sun who has less confidence in the administration than I have—but I am willing to intrust $30,000,000 to this administration for the purpose of buying or building ships that will be suitable in the first instance as a part of our national defense; and I am willing—I am not only willing, I am anxious—that in the days of peace when these ships are not needed as a part of our national establishment the Government may either lease them or use them to help the people of the United States in any way in which such ships can be helpful.

It is the only practical method open to us, and I have hoped—or I had hoped, for I have no longer any hope—that before this controversy ceases my Democratic friends could see it is the only way in which we can do anything to meet what is said to be an emergency; but, more than that, to provide for that regulation in times of peace.

Nor, Mr. President, am I at all dismayed by the assumption of power on the part of the Federal Government. I was very deeply impressed with the argument or address made yesterday by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and with the gravity of the general situation. We must, however, deal nationally with every question which the development and growth of this country have made national.

The Congress of the United States is not at fault because substantially all the business of this country has become business between the States or with foreign nations. Our forefathers never dreamed of the country which we now see, never dreamed of its extent, never dreamed of the magnitude of its interests, never dreamed of the intimacy that exists between its people.

Why, sir, in my own State—which is an interior one, as you all know—more than 90 per cent of all the business done by our transportation companies is interstate business, and necessarily the function of the Federal Government in controlling and regulating that vast business has immeasurably increased in importance. What is true of my own State is true of every State, and what is true of transportation is true of every other kind of business; so that we might just as well confront the situation boldly and bravely and undertake the regulation and control of those things that have become, by reason of our growth, national in their character.

I agree, however, with the Senator from New York in this—that the very magnitude of the life that we have undertaken to protect and to regulate ought to correspondingly increase the sense of responsibility upon the part of those who are called upon to legislate for the people of the United States.

One more preliminary word: I am not opposed to Government ownership and operation in proper cases. Just where the line is to be drawn between the individual activity and the organized activity of the whole people no man can say, and no man will dare to say. It is a line that advances, and sometimes recedes, although rarely. It is a line that is determined at any particular moment by the best judgment and the experience of mankind. There is one thing, however, which the advocates of Government operation seem to have forgotten in this instance—I assume, of course, that nobody is proposing Government ownership and operation in the field of purely private enterprise; but we all understand perfectly the general difference between those activities that are public in their character and those that are purely private in their character.

The fundamental law of Government operation is that it shall be a monopoly. There is not a writer on the subject who ever put pen to paper but who has declared that as a fundamental proposition. I do not mean to say that it is an inflexible rule. There may be instances in which the Government must not only regulate an activity but compete with it at the same time. They are, however, so exceedingly rare that they need not be taken into account.

We ought not to enter the transportation business as such unless we monopolize the business. A city ought not to acquire one heating plant and compete with a private heating plant; it ought to do the whole of the work. A city ought not to acquire a gas works for the purpose of competing with another gas works. The city ought to own all the lighting utilities or facilities of the municipality.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not know that the city of Seattle owns its own electric-light plant and has by its operation made prices in that city very reasonable?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of it, and I am thoroughly in favor of it.

Mr. LANE. It has been absolutely demonstrated to be a success, too.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad the Senator from Oregon says so, because he and I agree about that. I believe every city ought to own its own waterworks, ought to own its own gas works, ought to own its own electric-light works.

Mr. LANE. In competition with private plants?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it ought to own it as a monopoly and ought to serve the people of that community and serve them, of course, in the interest of the general good. The position of a competitor and the position of a regulator are inconsistent.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, the Senator did not understand me. The city of Seattle owns and operates these works successfully in competition with private works.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course the Senator knows whether or not that has been done in Seattle; but it never ought to be done, although I have so much confidence in western enterprise and genius that I am very slow even to criticize anything that has been done successfully in that very flourishing part of the United States. I simply insist as a general principle that the municipality, when it undertakes to operate a public facility or public utility, ought to operate it to the exclusion of all other utilities or other facilities serving the community over which the municipality has jurisdiction. I do not say that there are not some instances in which there must be an exception. I will point out one presently in this very case, but I only pause to impress Senators again with this idea:

Here is the city. It has the power to fix a rate for electric light or for gas or for street-railway fares. It therefore has the fortunes of its public-utility company in its own hands. It exercises that right as a sovereign, as the law-making power of that community. It then enters upon the same business itself. What is the rule of that business? Is it doing business upon the same basis as the company that it regulates? The law says that the company which it regulates has a right to maintain itself and to earn a fair reward or return upon the capital invested or the value of the property. That is the rule of its sovereignty, and if it violates that rule it violates the Constitution of the United States and probably of the State under which it exists. It enters the business, however, as a competitor. What, then, is the rule which guides it? Can it reduce the rates so that the private company can not earn a fair return upon the value of its property?

Before this discussion has gone to its end—and that, I am sorry to say, seems a long way off—I should like some one who is interested in this subject to say what rule will govern the sovereign as a competitor. If it is declared that the same rule shall guide the sovereign as a competitor that guides it when it imposes a regulation upon the utility, then you have substantially destroyed the efficiency of your municipal enterprise.

I have no doubt whatever of the general soundness of that proposition: That when organized society—I care not in what form it is found, whether in a municipality or in a State or in the General Government—specifically enters a given field that is public in its character for the purpose of possessing it and carrying on the business that is appropriate to it, it ought to occupy, and by all the rules of fairness and reason and justice it must occupy, the entire field, for I assert that the attitude of regulation in fixing prices and the attitude of competition in fixing prices are utterly inconsistent with each other, and so repugnant that the two can not exist at the same time.

All that I have said would apply to the present instance, if these ships are to be purchased for the purpose initially, primarily, of entering the business of transportation. If, however, the United States has ships, as I think she ought to have, purchased for the emergencies of war, and which alone will make our Navy strong and helpful in time of war, then, when those ships are not needed for that purpose, it is right for the United States to employ those ships in peaceful pursuits, to employ them as agencies of transportation. But—and here again I may widely differ from some of my friends upon the other side—in that instance the United States ought to employ the ships where they will do the people of the country the greatest good without any reference to rates. The Government ought so to employ them as to promote in the highest degree the general welfare, even if the Government operates the ships for nothing and carries the freight for nothing. That is the only function of the Government in this respect. We ought, then, to seek those routes into which private capital has not been attracted, where business can be developed and the international trade of the United States increased, and use these ships primarily there.

I do not say—far be it from me to say—that in the case that now confronts us of inadequate shipping facilities between established ports and along accustomed lines, we ought not to use the ships to help the people of the country with regard to such business. I think we ought, and if we had these ships now I think we ought to take them wherever they are most needed and carry the freight which seeks an outlet beyond our shores.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. WALSH. The comments of the Senator are of very deep interest to me. They correspond, as I follow him, with the ideas expressed in the substitute offered by the Senator under date of February 2. I wish to ask the Senator a few questions about that matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am in a dim way outlining my substitute. I will come to it directly, specifically, before I finish; but I think the Senator from Montana is right about that.

Mr. WALSH. If I understand that aright, it contemplates the expenditure by the Government of $30,000,000 in the acquisition of ships, either by purchase or by construction.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And those primarily as naval auxiliaries and secondarily for use in foreign commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is right.

Mr. WALSH. And then it contemplates that the Government, in time of peace, shall operate such of those ships as it finds profitable employment for.

Mr. CUMMINS. It gives the Government the power to do that.

Mr. WALSH. And those which it does not find the opportunity to operate successfully it authorizes to be leased.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the purpose of the Senator, then, to tell us wherein that bill differs in principle from the one before us? If not, I should like to have the Senator advise me.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that is the very purpose for which I rose. I am approaching it by degrees, because I did not want to be misunderstood. There are so many different views in the Senate Chamber with regard to the propriety of the Government purchasing or building ships and operating ships that I wanted to be fully understood on that general subject before I came to the immediate matter suggested by the Senator from Montana. The real truth is—and I want to confess it now to the Senator from Montana—that the address I am now making is being made largely, if not entirely, on account of a remark made the other day by the Senator from Montana, which, as I remember it, was that he could see no substantial difference between the bill under consideration and the substitute which I proposed.

Mr. WALSH. That was why I address the inquiry now to the Senator. I can, of course, perceive some difference in the details of the two bills, but I have studied hard to find out in what respect they differ in principle. They both contemplate the acquisition of ships by the Government for two purposes, one for use in foreign commerce and another for the use of the Navy as auxiliaries. They both contemplate the operation of these ships by the Government in foreign commerce. They both contemplate the leasing of those ships that can not be conveniently or profitably operated in foreign commerce. One, the substitute offered by the Senator, provides for the purchase and the operation by the Secretary of the Navy; the other, by another agency of the Government called the shipping board.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, of course, I yield only for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is understood.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not yield the floor. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, however.

Mr. WALSH. I came into the Chamber especially, when I noticed that the Senator was speaking, to have some enlightenment upon that particular matter—not a difference in detail, because I can perceive that, but a difference in principle.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Montana will give me his attention, because I repeat that my principal purpose is to show that while the bill proposed by the administration and ratified by the Democratic caucus is, in my opinion, a bill that ought to be entitled "A bill for the encouragement and protection of the Shipping Trust," the substitute which I have offered is intended to accomplish and will accomplish the welfare of the whole country.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. The Senator from Montana will remember that in July last the Senate passed, without a dissenting vote, a bill for the employment of the ships we now have in commerce in the same way that I propose to employ these ships, not exactly in detail, but substantially, save that in the bill to which I have referred there was no authority to lease.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator refers to the bill introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], I dare say.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Amended, upon the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], so that those ships may be employed in the commerce of Europe as well as South America.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the way the bill passed.

Mr. WALSH. The operation to be carried on by the Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. WALSH. I likewise am unable to ascertain wherein the difference in principle exists between that bill and this.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad the attention of Senators is being centered upon this question, because if I can show, and if I can not I have lost my power of reason and observation both—if I can show that the bill proposed by the other side will not accomplish the purpose but will be an aid and encouragement to the very forces which are now committing their depredations upon the American people, I expect the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Florida to join me in support of the substitute which I intend to offer.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Iowa will pardon me——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. WALSH. And if the Senator from Florida will desist for a moment, I desire to remark that I listened with intense interest yesterday to the impassioned appeal of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] not to have the Government committed to the proposition of operating ships in transportation, and I supposed he was arraigning the substitute of the Senator from Iowa and the bill which he himself voted for, introduced some time since by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CUMMINS. Answering the Senator from Montana, I will say that before he came into the Chamber I felt compelled to dissent from some of the views that had been expressed upon our side of the Chamber. I am not an opponent of Government operation in the way in which I have endeavored to establish it in the substitute which I have offered, but the Senator from Montana must know that upon this side of the Chamber every man holds the view to which his reason and conscience lead, and we are not in unison upon the fundamental proposition with regard to the proper extension of governmental activity.

I yield now to the Senator from Florida for a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not want to interfere with the Senator's arrangement of his remarks in his discussion of the subject, and it may be that he will deal with it a little later, but I was struck with the suggestion that he claims the pending measure is one that would work out a very substantial and material benefit to what is called the Shipping Trust. It may be that the Senator means to dwell upon that later. I will be very much interested to know how, if he will develop that, in view of the well-recognized attitude of the gentlemen interested in large shipping enterprises regarding this measure. I think it is quite well understood that they are opposed to it and are using their influence through commercial organizations and other bodies to have their views impressed upon Congress. Of course, it may take the Senator some little time to go into it, but I will be very much obliged to him if he can tell us how he reaches that conclusion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will answer the Senator from Florida. I am about to enter upon it, but I want first to say to the Senator from Florida that I do not know anybody connected with the Shipping Trust. I heard the Senator from Florida read the names of the directorates of various corporations interested in ocean transportation. I never heard from anybody connected with the Shipping Trust, but I assume that private ownership in ocean transportation is opposed to any legislation upon this subject. That is natural, and I therefore did not doubt it for a moment. I have no question but that these interests, however they may be interlaced or interlinked, would, if they could, prevent all legislation upon the matter; but if legislation is to come—and legislation will come just so surely as time will run—there is not a shipowner or a ship corporation in the world that would not contribute largely to secure the legislation for which the Senator from Florida stands as opposed to the legislation for which I stand. I arrive at this conclusion because the Senator, if he is successful, is about to put into the hands of these men an instrumentality that will enable them to neutralize and destroy all the benefits which it is sought to be secured by this bill. I will proceed now to show the Senator that this is true.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am, of course, very much interested in the Senator's discussion. Before the Senator reaches that I should like to have him suggest further wherein he considers that the scheme and plan as outlined in the bill differ in principle from the plan that was involved in the amendment by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the bill providing for the construction of a railroad in Alaska. That amendment is found on page 2321 of the RECORD——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly familiar with it.

Mr. FLETCHER. As the Senator will recall, it provided that the President was authorized to construct ships, 10 to 20 in number, to engage in trade between Alaska and ports on the east and west coast of South America, through the Panama Canal, and so forth, and the ships to be constructed under the direction of the President were to be leased to the Panama Railroad Co. and operated by that company. That company, as the Senator well knows, is now a Government agency, at least in a way. The United States Government owns all the stock in the company, and it was proposed that it should operate those ships. The pending bill provides for a corporation, the Senator will concede, somewhat analogous, anyhow, to that feature. Wherein does the Senator draw a distinction between this plan and the plan that would be put in operation under the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the Alaska railroad bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I will gratify the Senator from Florida before I have finished. Let me say at this point, I never have been in favor of the Government operating through a corporation. I would much have preferred when the Senator from Nebraska offered his amendment, the amendment to which the Senator from Florida refers, that the Government should have owned the ships and should have operated them directly. The Panama Railroad Co. came to us as an incident of the construction of the Panama Canal. Its stock, or a large part of it, was owned by the French company, and as a part of that purchase the United States became the owner of the stock, or a great deal of it. It was a mere accident, if you please, inasmuch as the French company had been operating through the medium of an American corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of New York. But the Senator from Florida will not forget that we at once proceeded to secure all the stock in the Panama Railroad, and we now own it.

It is a mere fiction. I am opposed to it. I think the Government ought to take it over and own it. I shall show presently why it ought to take it over and own it, because, as I view it, it simply gives an opportunity for irresponsible power, and I am not in favor of irresponsible power. I believe that every function of the Government ought to be performed under the sanction of the law and according to rules laid down in the law. But, of course, the critical, the vital difference between the organization of this corporation and our work through the Panama Railroad Co. lies in the fact that we own all the stock in the Panama Railroad Co. and we will not own all the stock of this corporation; nor is it intended that we should own all the stock, for reasons which I shall presently point out.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. WALSH. I think the Senator from Iowa will not object if I state in no controversial way what is my recollection, and it is quite definite on that point. The suggestion of utilizing the Panama Railway Co. in connection with the ships that it was contemplated would be operated in connection with the Alaska railroad came from the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], who insisted that we had a ready and convenient instrument at hand which could be utilized for that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true, although the amendment to which the Senator from Florida referred was offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I had no objection to the amendment at all, and yet I am opposed to the intermediary of a corporation between the Government and the object which it seeks to accomplish. But now I come——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the Senator if he knows how the Senators present who are favoring this bill voted on the amendment I offered to the Alaska railroad bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not able to answer the Senator from Nebraska; but possibly, if he will put it in the form of a question, he will give me the information, because I very much desire it.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. WALSH. Inasmuch as I was very much interested and took a somewhat active part in the Alaska legislation, I feel in justice to those who have been interested in that measure to say, in answer to the question of the Senator from Nebraska, that a great many of us voted against his amendment feeling no antipathy to it at all. I speak for myself, certainly. It was felt that to incorporate that amendment upon the bill at that time would result in its defeat. I feel sure the Senator from Nebraska knows that that was the frame of mind in which most of the supporters who were actively engaged in the passage of the bill stood.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. May I make a response to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. So far as I am concerned, I was not present at the time the bill was voted on, and was paired. I have to plead an alibi.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, now we reach the interesting and vital difference between the Democratic proposal and my substitute; but in order to understand that difference without compelling a constant reference to the bill, I propose now to remind Senators of just what the Democratic measure consists. First, the corporation is to be organized under the law of the District of Columbia; a corporation—mark, now—for pecuniary profit. It is not an altruistic, benevolent, or charitable corporation. It is a corporation which, under the law which will give it life, is to be conducted for pecuniary profit. Its capital, in the first instance, is to be $10,000,000. Of this capital the United States is to subscribe 51 per cent, or $5,100,000.

Mr. WALSH. Not less than that.

Mr. CUMMINS. The remaining part of the capital stock is then to be opened for the general subscription of private persons. If the capital so offered to the public is not taken, then and only then is the Government authorized to subscribe for the remaining part. I want to impress it upon the Senate, because this bill provides a method by which private interest can become an owner of stock in this corporation, and nothing that the shipping board, nothing that the Government could do will prevent private subscription if any person or corporation seeks to become the owner of a part of the stock.

I proceed. The corporation can increase its capital stock to any amount, so that the investment of the Government in the increase shall not exceed $10,000,000. That means, of course, that if private interests acquire 49 per cent, or $4,900,000, of the original stock, the capital of the corporation could be increased to $20,000,000. But, mark! Let me read what the bill says:

> The shipping board, with the approval of the President, may consent to or may cause an increase of the capital stock from time to time as the interests of the corporation may require, but without authority of Congress the portion of such increase to be paid for by the United States shall not exceed $10,000,000, neither shall the proportion of stock held by the United States at any time be less than 51 per cent.

The very law, Mr. President, under which this corporation is to be organized requires that there shall be a concurrence of two-thirds of the capital stock before any addition to it is made. I should like to know how the shipping board and the President can increase the capital stock if private interests subscribe for 49 per cent of the original capital. I do not know that it will be material; there may be no desire or no interest or no necessity of increasing the capital stock; but the bill in this respect simply keeps the promise to the ear, and breaks it to the hope. It is a deception to provide in the bill that the capital stock may be increased to $20,000,000—for that is substantially it—upon the consent of the shipping board or the action of the shipping board and the President, when the law, under which the corporation is to be organized, requires the assent of two-thirds of the capital outstanding in order to accomplish that result.

I will, however, proceed with the bill. It then provides, as pointed out by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] a day or two ago, as follows:

> The officers and trustees of said corporation shall be citizens of the United States, but need not be citizens of the District of Columbia. Such officers and trustees shall be subject to removal at any time by vote of a majority of the stockholders at any meeting thereof.

Senators who are so desirous of protecting the Government of the United States, and so desirous of being helpful to the people in this great emergency, ought to explain why it is that the majority of the stockholders—not of the stock—are given the right to remove all the trustees and all the officers at any meeting of the stockholders at any time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. I take it, however, that this must be a mere oversight. I can not imagaine that it was really intended by the Senator from Florida, or whoever drew this bill, to put the people in jeopardy in that way, to give over this corporation to the control of a majority of the stockholders who will become such, as I shall presently show, if they follow the natural instincts of avarice and greed and power—who will become such for the very purpose of destroying the object and the effect of the legislation. I do not dwell on that, because it can be easily changed so as to be put beyond any doubt; that, I must assume, will be done. I only mention it in order that it may be done; because, while I am opposed to this measure, if it does pass I want it to pass in such form as that it may be of some service to the people of the country.

I have given in a general way the method of organizing the corporation and the method of increasing its capital stock. Let me again have the attention of the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Montana, because I come now to answer the very pertinent and material inquiry, What is the difference between the substitute which I have offered and the Democratic measure?

First, when a corporation is organized and the Government has taken its 51 per cent of the stock, and then opens the subscription books to the world for additional subscriptions in order to dispose of the 49 per cent of stock that the Government has no authority to take in the first instance, who will take that stock? There will not be a man in all the world so blind and foolish as to take the stock simply in order that he may secure a fair return upon the money which he invests in the stock; but, Mr. President, if I were counsel for the Shipping Trust, and if they were to ask me to advise them how they could overcome substantially the effect of this bill, my instant and emphatic instruction would be for them to buy a million dollars' worth of this stock, or some amount of this stock, and I would undertake, if I were practicing law, which I am not—I sometimes wish I were again—but if I were practicing my profession, I would undertake to so cripple the operation of this corporation on the part of the Government as to make it worse than useless as an instrument for affecting the regulation of freight rates. I will come presently to the poison there is in the mere intercourse, conference, and consultations between opposing stockholders. That is bad enough.

Think of it! The Government is organizing a corporation. What for? Not to make money. It is not investing $5,000,000 because it wants to secure interest on $5,000,000. It is entering this field in order to promote the general good through a regulation, it is alleged, of foreign commerce. That is its purpose; it does not make a whit of difference whether the United States makes money or not; it ought not to make money; it is not in the business of investing money; it is not in the business of trying to gain profit. Its business is to govern the people of the United States, and to so govern them that the common good and the general welfare may be protected and preserved. That is the office of the United States. It organizes a corporation, and it takes this capital stock solely for the general welfare and the common good. Suppose that an agent of the Shipping Trust, or a dozen of them, if there is such a thing—and I have no doubt that there is the combination of which the Senator from Florida spoke—suppose that 20 or 25 agents or representatives of the Shipping Trust take a million dollars of this stock. I will not speak of their ulterior motives; I will speak of their legal motives. Why do they take it? They take it because the corporation is organized for the purpose of earning a profit upon the capital invested. They take it because in the operation of the corporation money can be made.

Does the Senator from Montana, who occupies, I know, a high plane in the consideration of all vital public problems, believe that the Government as a stockholder, subscribing to $5,000,000 of stock, paying out $5,000,000 of the people's money in order to render general justice throughout the country, without a thought of gain to organize society itself, should enter into a partnership with a private interest that subscribes for a million dollars of stock, or $4,900,000, because those who subscribe believe that they can make 4 per cent or 5 per cent or 10 per cent or 20 per cent upon the money which they invest in the enterprise? Does not the Senator from Montana, does not the Senator from Florida see that here are two irreconcilable forces? There is no way of accommodating their diverse interests in this corporation; they have not entered it for the same purpose; their objects are as wide apart as the poles; and yet you are preparing to offer to the people of this country a corporation in which the Government is to be a stockholder, in order that everybody may be helped by the expenditure of this money, while the private interest is asked to take stock because that private interest can make money out of the particular enterprise. Such a thing, Mr. President, was never proposed before in the history of mankind. There has never been an honest partnership between the government of any country and the private business of any country.

It reminds me of the old cooperation of the corrupt sovereign in the business of his subjects, where he has employed his power through private business to enrich his own treasury; but no civilized nation ever did such a thing.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. WALSH. Did not the Government of the United States own stock in the United States Bank?

Mr. CUMMINS. That was a wholly different proposition.

Mr. WALSH. And did not private stockholders own stock in that bank?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly; but that is a wholly different question.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; but it was a case of the Government owning stock in a corporation in which private individuals held some stock.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. Of course I am not defending that, but there is a difference——

Mr. WALSH. I am not, either. I am adverting to a historical fact which the Senator has apparently overlooked.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the historical fact does not refute what I have just said in anywise. The Bank of the United States was the fiscal agent for the United States, and, while it seemed wise to the people of that time to carry on their business in that way, if I had been considering the charter of the United States Bank, while I could not have made opposition upon just the same ground that I am making opposition now, my opposition would have been as firm and unyielding as it is to this proposal.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I think I should have taken the same attitude that the Senator says he would take. I referred to it as a historical matter, but I desire to say in this connection, because the Senator in a way addressed his inquiry to me, that I see no reason why people who are willing to take 5 per cent or 6 per cent upon their investments should hesitate to take stock from the Government that would be likewise content probably with about that amount in return for the money it has invested in the enterprise.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, the Senator from Montana assumes that the Government is going into the undertaking to make money. I do not so assume. I assume that the people of this country are contributing $5,000,000 to promote the general welfare, the general good, and they are going to use that money wherever it will promote the general good without regard to earning a dividend or any return upon the stock at all. If it is the real purpose to make money, then many other objections will arise which are obvious.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me further?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Montana assumes that the Government may make, and hopes it will make, approximately 5 per cent upon the money invested in this enterprise, not for the sake of making money at all, but for the purpose of developing our foreign commerce and providing ships in which merchandise may be carried to and from our ports, and that such a return will quite satisfy those people in this country who may be induced to take stock.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it matters not whether the Government may make 5 per cent or 4 per cent or nothing; that is not the motive for the passage of this legislation. If it is the motive, then all merit disappears, because I have assumed it was the purpose of the Congress in some fashion to relieve the people of this country from a burden which they are now bearing, and that this money will be used to do it, no matter whether or not it earns a return.

Mr. WALSH. But I dare say the Senator from Iowa will have no objection at all if this enterprise can be carried on without loss; that is to say, if the Government shall receive a return equal to the interest it has to pay upon the money invested.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not know. Of course I will come to that objection to this bill presently. That is one of the troubles about this bill. I will depart for just a moment from the point I was considering.

You propose to create a shipping board. Now, we will assume that it does manage the corporation absolutely, instead of in cooperation with its private partners. What is its rule? What rule will it employ in determining what routes its ships shall enter upon; what freight rates shall be charged? If there is a chance to favor one part of the country and not another, how will the shipping board conduct itself? I will speak of that presently. All I have to say now is that the shipping board, if it has control of this corporation, is a body set afloat without chart or compass, without any rule of law to guide or direct it; a board governmental in its character without a single legislative suggestion with respect even to the objects that it ought to accomplish.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly the same as the Secretary of the Navy would be in case the Senate adopted the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Ah! The Senator from Montana has not done me the honor to read carefully the substitute. He has caught its main features, but if he will read it again he will remember that there is in my substitute a provision that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall prescribe the rates for the ships that are operated by the Secretary of the Navy, and the ships that are operated under lease, and that any person has a right to apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rates for the transportation it carries on.

Mr. WALSH. Then, let me understand very clearly what distinction the Senator makes between his bill, which gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix the rates, and this bill, which gives the board of directors of the corporation put in by the shipping board the power to fix the rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. This is the difference: That we have given to the Interstate Commerce Commission a rule to guide it. I regret to say that it has not always followed the rule, but, nevertheless, I hope and pray that it will follow it in the future; and we have surrounded it with explicit instructions, so far as the legislature can give instructions. We have directed it, we have given it a standard, we have declared that the rates that it establishes must be just and reasonable rates, and the courts have declared what just and reasonable rates are, so that there is no longer any difference of opinion with respect to that subject, although there is great difficulty sometimes in applying the rule to a given case.

But I recall myself to the proposition I was endeavoring to present.

I have pointed out the wide difference between the motives that actuate the United States in taking its stock and the motives that actuate the private subscribers in taking theirs. The one says, "We are about to set afloat a corporation to be operated for the public goood. We have endowed it with sufficient capital, and have given it a credit of $30,000,000, and we have said to it that it ought to go on and do what it can for the benefit of all the people of this country." The private subscriber, however, viewed from the standpoint of the law, says, "I enter this corporation in order to make money. I enter it in order to get the largest possible dividend upon my stock, and to be sure that at the end of the activities of the corporation my capital will be returned."

There you have the two partners. You can not serve God and Mammon, so the Bible says, and yet the Democratic proposal is a living repudiation of that sacred and time-honored maxim. You are endeavoring to unite, if I may say so reverently, God and Mammon in this enterprise. You are harnessing these forces together, and you expect that they will operate peaceably and effectually. You will be disappointed. You are bound to be disappointed. It is utterly indefensible to proceed with a measure hampered and crippled and tainted by the interposition of a corporation in which private stockholders are permitted to invest. If it were required that the Government should take all the capital stock, so that the corporation would be simply a governmental function pure and simple, there are some objections to that, but the objection which I am now urging would, of course, disappear.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Montana for a question.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he recalls whether that feature of the organization of the United States Bank was invested, in experience, with any of the difficulties that the Senator now foresees?

Mr. CUMMINS. They had no trusts in those days, as I understand. Does the Senator from Montana agree with the Senator from Florida that the principal purpose of this measure is to meet and overcome a shipping combination that has grown so large and powerful that it controls not only coastwise rates, but rates of transportation all over the world, and that nothing less than the governmental arm can break this mighty concert? If he does, then, Mr. President, the conditions are very different now as compared with those which existed when the United States bank was organized.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Florida for a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator simply long enough to say that his definition or description of my position I am not prepared to accept as he puts it? It is not my claim that the purpose of this legislation is to meet and overcome a great combination or organization of shipping interests. I mentioned the fact that these large interests were so combined and interlaced, by rebate agreements and by conferences and otherwise, as to practically control rates in foreign shipping as well as coastwise shipping, perhaps; but it was not my purpose to establish here a basis or beginning or start, as you might call it, of a merchant marine for the United States simply to meet that sort of a combination or to compete with that sort of a condition.

The idea is, first, there is an emergency here; there is a condition which has come upon us rather suddenly, but which is pronounced and far-reaching, extending into our agriculture, our manufacturing, our mining, and all our industries, affecting them seriously, against which we ought to furnish some relief. That is the primary purpose—to meet this emergency—and, furthermore, my view would be that whatever may be the shipping combination or shipping interest, they have not sufficient ships in the service and they are not sufficiently serving our needs at the present time, and are inadequate, as far as ships are concerned, to take care of our commerce. It is not for the purpose of breaking down a combination.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood perfectly, I think, the position of the Senator from Florida. It was very clearly stated the other day, and he now simply reiterates it. I hope I have not misrepresented his position in any way. It is his opinion that this combination is sufficiently strong so that it can make rates at any point which it desires, and that the people of this country are at its mercy. He pointed out a great many instances in which the rates had risen unconscionably, as one would think, from a comparison of the rates now with the former rates. That could only happen in the face of a combination, unless the dangers of the sea have grown so great that in order to compensate the ship owner or operator for those hazards the rates have been necessarily advanced to the high point where they now are. But I understood the Senator from Florida, and I understand him now, to say that this combination is able to fix such rates as it desires to fix, and that one of the reasons for this measuse is to furnish a competitor with that combination with enough influence to coerce the trust into reasonable rates. That must be, or all this argument that we have heard goes for nothing.

I have already pointed out what a strange, not only strange but extraordinary, scene would be presented when the United States takes its share of this capital stock and some member of the trust takes its share. I say—and I say it with a good deal of acquaintance with the ways of trusts; I know something about their designs; I know something about the way in which they operate—I say, and it is a prediction only, that if this stock is opened for public subscription it will not be 24 hours before enough of it is taken by the shipping combination to give it the standing in the councils of the corporation and in the courts of the land which I shall presently point out.

I am sure that the Senator from Florida can see with what ease the executive controlling power of the Shipping Trust would secure some measure of influence in this corporation. If it had to subscribe $4,900,000, it would subscribe that sum. It could not invest that money in any other way so advantageously as to become the partner of the Government in this enterprise. I do not know, of course, whether it would feel that it was necessary to take the entire $4,900,000; but I want the Senator from Florida to remember this prophecy, that if this bill passes in its present form one sun will not go down after the books of subscription are open until the great shipping forces of this and other countries will have acquired such an interest in this corporation as to give them all the rights and all the influence which pertain to minority stockholders. They do it all the time. It is a common method—the commonest sort of method in the history of trusts and combinations. Dozens of times they have acquired a little interest in some rival organization in order that they might exercise the greater influence and have the greater rights.

Sir, in the case of a private corporation they could only have the right, of course, of inspection of the books, and so on, because the object of the two classes of stockholders would be the same—to make money. But what would their rights be in this corporation? Sir, any good lawyer—and there are many in the Senate—will be compelled to say that if the shipping trust or combination, or whatever you call it, had a substantial minority interest in this corporation, it could prevent the corporation from accomplishing substantially anything beneficial to the people of this country.

What are the rights of minority stockholders in a corporation organized for pecuniary profit? I intend to assume now that the Government, with its stock control, will select the officers and trustees. I am going to assume that the shipping board is an honest one, understands its obligations to the public, and wants to discharge those obligations and really make this corporation an instrumentality for good in the country. Let us see.

In the first place, it is the right of a minority stockholder at an annual meeting to be consulted about the business, not only that has been done but that is to be done during the ensuing period. I just want the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Florida to think a moment of such a stockholders' meeting with Mr. McAdoo at the head of the table. I say nothing against Mr. McAdoo. I have no reason to believe that he is inspired by any other than a pure motive and a public purpose. There sits Mr. McAdoo at the head of the table; the Secretary of Commerce is there; the three members of the shipping board are there. They are stockholders in this corporation. Around them at the same table, we will say, sit J. P. Morgan, very closely connected with shipping interests; Mr. Schiff, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., very intimately associated with the shipping interests; and so on. I might mention a dozen others of high reputation and great power. They sit down together to consider what that corporation ought to do for the ensuing year; and these minority stockholders have a right to be there in close and intimate association with the representatives of the Government, and they are both bound to consider what is best for that corporation—not what is best for the people of the United States. That is the business, of course, of the Government; but we have chosen to do that business through the medium of a stockholding interest, and we have chosen to organize a corporation under a law that provides for the organization of corporations for pecuniary profit.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. Is it the Senator's view that the minority stockholders would control the policy of this corporation?

Mr. CUMMINS. Did the Senator from Ohio just come into the room?

Mr. POMERENE. Just this moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I just stated the other way. I have been assuming that the shipping board would control the policy; that it had the power to control the policy. I am simply drawing a kind of word picture of an annual stockholders' meeting, with Mr. McAdoo, one representative of the Government, Mr. Redfield another, and the three members of the shipping board in communion with the minority stockholders—because the minority stockholders have the right to be there and they have the right to be heard. They sit down to consider, and what ought they to consider? The minority stockholders, as they sit there, have a right to call upon the officers for their reports. They must know what is being done by this corporation and why it is being done. That is their right; that is their unchallengeable right.

There they sit—New York, and London, too, sitting around this table—because, of course, the shipping people of Great Britain will be stockholders of this corporation as well. There they will sit to consider what this corporation should do and to pass judgment upon what it has done last year. If that is not a shocking sight in the eyes of the American people, my imagination is incapable of fancying one. What does the Senator from Ohio think about that spectacle presented to this great Republic?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, when we resort to imagination we can conjure up a good many evils which never occur. If I have understood the argument which has been made on the other side of the Chamber, it has been largely to the effect that this was going to be an unsuccessful venture; that private parties would not take any of this stock; and the Senators have insisted, therefore, that the entire burden of this investment would have to be borne by the Government.

I am disposed to think, looking at it from my personal standpoint, that the Government will take practically all the stock, at the beginning, at least. If the argument which has been made in that behalf on the other side of the Chamber be true, then certainly it must follow that there is but little danger to be apprehended from the suggestions which have just been made by the Senator from Iowa. Certainly both those propositions can not be correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Ohio will give attention to my argument and not to those which have preceded mine. I am standing on my own ground; I do not stand on anybody else's ground. I support or oppose a bill for reasons which seem good to me, not for reasons which seem good to anybody else on earth; and he must not hold me responsible for what has been said.

I had explained, before the Senator came in and was good enough to honor me with his attention, just why there would be private stockholders and who they would be. Of course, we do not know, but you have industriously—I mean, now, the administration has industriously inserted and obstinately maintained this provision in the bill for minority private stockholders. It is for some purpose. I do not know what the purpose is in the mind of the Senator from Ohio, but I know perfectly well how quickly the trust will take advantage of that opportunity.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, this is the first corporation I have ever heard of in which it would seem—at least, judging by the argument of the Senator from Iowa—that the policy of the corporation would be dominated and dictated by a minority holding. It does seem to me——

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not said that.

Mr. POMERENE. That has been in effect the Senator's position, as I understand it.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. POMERENE. It does seem to me that in all justice we ought at least to go on the theory that with the representatives of the Government, with a majority control of this corporation in the Government, the people's interest would be comparatively safe. I am disposed to think that they would be quite as safe as in the hands of a Senate which differed so radically in their reasons for their opposition to the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not at all asking for any power in the matter. If the Senator from Ohio was really as innocent as he looks, he would be a very dangerous man. But the Senator from Ohio is worldly wise. The Senator from Ohio has had great experience. The Senator from Ohio has seen at close range the workings of trusts and monopolies. I agree with him that no man simply for his own interests would take one dollar of this sum. But I tried to say before he came in that the moment the doors are open for the public subscription, if the shipping monopoly is as keen in the protection of its own interests as I believe it to be, if it is as efficient in the employment of such instruments as are here given to it as I believe it to be, it would take this minority stock.

I repeat again—I am sorry that I have to say this all over for the benefit of the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am going to address you individually and severally. I do not intend to omit anything that will——

Mr. POMERENE. I shall be very glad to read the remarks the Senator has made.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no.

Mr. POMERENE. It will not be necessary for him to occupy the valuable time of his colleagues on the other side of the Senate to instruct me in that behalf.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio can not escape me in that fashion. I know he is in good faith when he says he will read my remarks in the RECORD, but it will take longer, anyhow. They may not be as interesting in the RECORD as they may be here.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator is always interesting, unless he talks at length during midnight hours.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not talk at midnight. I do not like midnight sessions. I am wondering now how long you are going to impose that cruel punishment upon men like myself, who are trying to accomplish the public good.

Now, I am going to say this, and if the Senator from Ohio reads it in the RECORD, so much the better: Any lawyer—and the Senator from Ohio is a good lawyer, of long-established practice—will agree that a monopoly or a trust as a minority stockholder of this corporation can cripple its energies. He can confine it to the business of money making. I am presently coming to that.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may ask the Senator another question I will not interrupt him again.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall be glad to yield for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator advise us as to just what extent trusts and combinations interest themselves in minority stockholdings?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can. The Senator from Ohio needs no information on that question. If he would just recall the vivid and lurid story told by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] the other night with regard to the interlocking and interweaving of the great shipping interests he would know how much they interest themselves in minority stockholdings.

Sir, there is scarcely a manufacturing interest in the land that the persons interested in the United States Steel Corporation are not minority stockholders. I mean one doing business of the same character. It is the common plan; it is the accepted method even as between private concerns to secure a minority interest in order to work out now and then the rights of minority stockholders and secure all the information that a stockholder is entitled to.

But I observed, Mr. President, that the Senator from Ohio was himself rather shocked with the picture that I was attempting to draw, which I will trace again. Here is a meeting of the stockholders in the city of Washington of this corporation, and with the Secretary of the Treasury at its head, the Secretary of Commerce at his right, one of the shipping board at his left, and so on, and with Mr. Morgan, Mr. Schiff, and Mr. Warburg, and all the other saints of Wall Street who now seem to have possession of the administration, sitting there to consider what this corporation has done and what it shall do during the next year. I am afraid to leave these representatives of the Government in that position. They would need to pronounce the Lord's prayer constantly and underscore the phrase "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

I am not willing, speaking seriously, that the Government of the United States in the execution of its sovereign power to control the destiny of 100,000,000 people, must, in the performance of such a duty, consult with private interests in regard to the way in which a duty has been performed or as to the way in which it shall be performed in the future. It is shocking. It is so wrong that the proposal overturns, as it seems to me, all the conception of a free Government. It is a return to the old days when the sovereign regarded himself not as the protector and the guardian of all the people but as the State itself. A State to be carried on for his benefit and not for the well-being of those over whom he ruled.

Suppose now that these representatives of the Government making up the shipping board are strong enough to resist this temptation; and mark you, it is a recurring temptation. I do not know how many special meetings of the stockholders there will be, but at least it is a temptation that will recur every year. There must be at least a yearly meeting of the stockholders. Suppose we have always men in this board who are as immaculate, as high minded, as immune from temptation and evil influence as our present administration. What then? What are the rights of a minority stockholder? Will you tell me, in a corporation organized for pecuniary profit, what are his rights, moral as well as legal? His moral rights are to insist that the corporation shall go on in good faith and make all the money it can for him. Such are his moral rights. No one will question that.

I said before the Senator from Ohio came in, we are not organizing here an eleemosynary institution. We are not organizing a charitable corporation. We are proposing to organize a corporation for pecuniary profit. These men take the stock. Why do they take it? They take it because they know that month after month and year after year they will be brought into association with the officers of the Government under circumstances that will enable them to exercise all the influence that can be exercised over Government officials. They will be brought together under those circumstances which compel all Government officials to listen to them and to listen to their rights, concerning which there can be little dispute. Do you want a government run in that way? Do you think that when the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of Commerce or the President of the United States is about to do some great thing for the benefit of the people of the country he ought to call in these men, who have nothing but a selfish interest to serve, in order to consult with them as to the best way in which it can be accomplished?

I beg you to review your determination in this respect. Reverse what you have done and stand all four square for a Government function, operated by the Government, without the intervention of any private interest or without the necessity of consulting with any private interest.

But suppose they are able to withstand all that temptation. What then? Now, I am assuming this must happen: The Government board, the shipping board, says: "This corporation was organized to make money, but our purpose is to so manage it that the interests of all the people will be served. This corporation was organized to regulate commerce; it was organized to cut down and reduce freight rates; it was organized to supply facilities where they are not now found, and we do not want to make money. We want to serve the people of the United States." Of course, the whole prospectus of the corporation, the whole manifesto, is one of service to the people of this country.

Now, what do Mr. Morgan and Mr. Schiff and Mr. Vanderlip and anybody else who may become stockholders in this corporation for the purpose I have described say? They say: "Mr. Government, we belong to a corporation organized for pecuniary profit; we invested our money in order to make money out of the investment; we care not one whit about the general welfare; we are not the servants of the people; we belong to a corporation organized to increase our fortunes, and we expect you to so conduct this corporation that it will make fortunes for us, or at least make a fair return upon our money. We expect you in good faith to use this corporation precisely as any other corporation is used which is organized for pecuniary profit." Senators, that is a demand which the minority stockholders can enforce in any court in the land.

Suppose the Government says, as it must say substantially, "We are operating this corporation for the general good"—that is one of the accepted facts—the minority stockholders say, "We want it to be used for our benefit; that is, the benefit of the money that we have invested in it; and if you go forward upon your philanthropic governmental plan we will resort to the courts to direct you and enjoin you; you must do that business which is profitable if you have a choice between profitable and unprofitable business."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question at this point. Of course the Senator told us at the beginning that if he were the attorney for the minority stockholders he could harass and annoy the corporation a great deal. I was trained in a school that taught that the majority of a corporation was able to control its affairs, and I have usually advised my clients in that way.

I should like to inquire of the Senator if he would give us a concrete case in connection with the statement he has just made? For instance, a profitable business can be conducted by the carrying of freight to European ports. A majority of the directors—that is, the Government directors—believe that it would be wise to put the ships into the South American trade. Would the Senator, in the pursuit of the policy of harassing and annoying the corporation as much as he could on behalf of the minority stockholders, believe that he could through the court control the discretion vested in the majority of the board of directors and compel them to keep the ships in the European trade instead of in the South American trade?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Montana has omitted an essential element which I will supply. If, in addition to the facts stated in his inquiry, it were shown that the particular venture upon which the ships proposed to enter was not entered upon in good faith to make money, then the courts would enjoin.

Of course, the courts will not enjoin the discretion of a board of directors as to ventures upon which a corporation shall enter, provided the directors are acting in good faith; but if the directors of this corporation were entering upon a particular route between our country and South America, not to make money eventually out of the business, but to encourage the general trade of the United States, there is not a court in the land but would enjoin the corporation from using its capital in that way.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but would not the question as to whether it was profitable rest entirely in the discretion and judgment of the directors, assuming that they were acting in good faith?

Mr. CUMMINS. I answer very emphatically, no. This corporation is organized under this law. This law is a law for pecuniary profit. The Government is taking that road toward this regulation of foreign commerce; and it must take that road, if it does it, with all the disadvantages and burdens which are incident to that path. I will not appeal to the Senator from Montana—I have done that too frequently already—but there is no man who has examined with care and without prejudice this subject who can doubt that the presence of these minority stockholders would hamper, harass, cripple, and oftentimes destroy the energy or the effort of the Government to help the people of this country.

There is no reason for it. You can not give any reason for it. There is no reason, except that somebody desires to serve an ulterior purpose; there is no reason for it except that away back somewhere—I do not think there is a man in this Chamber who is actuated by any such motive—but somewhere there stands a man who inspires this provision of the bill, or insists upon it, who does know what he can accomplish by maintaining it in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. May I inquire of the Senator from Iowa if the minority stockholders of the United States Bank ever felt called upon to appeal to a court of justice against the oppression of the directors?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am afraid the Senator from Montana, great lawyer as he is, is a slave of precedent. There is no lesson to be drawn from the United States Bank for this time and for these conditions. When the Senator from Montana elaborated the international law with regard to the purchase of ships of belligerents a few days ago he did it in so convincing a way that it seemed to me that every open mind must accept his conclusions; I accepted them; but you could go into the archives of almost any nation in the world and draw an instance that would be out of harmony with the argument that he made.

The United States Bank was an institution of comparatively short life, and what life it had was a stormy and political one; and the conditions of those days were so radically different, and the purpose of the bank was so radically different, that there can be no parallel or fair comparison instituted between what happened then and what is now proposed.

I have given to the Senate my reasons for believing that as between a measure which authorizes the Government to enter directly into commerce with such of its naval ships as are not needed in the Naval Establishment and this proposal, the shipping combination would prefer the latter. I have gone into it fully, and I have shown you why you are preparing an instrument that will be used by the very forces that you are endeavoring to overcome. While it is a mere conjecture, of course, I do not hesitate to say that the shipping combination or force in this and other countries would give, if there has to be any legislation at all—and I frankly say that they would rather have none; that is perfectly obvious—but if there must be legislation that invokes governmental activity, they would give millions of dollars to have the Democratic bill rather than the bill which I have proposed, for there is no crevice in my substitute through which influences of the sort which I have tried to describe could enter. I have not heard yet any good reason for entering into partnership with those who may be in harmony with the purpose of the Government or may be out of harmony with it, or with those who are the bitter opponents of the policy which the Government is trying to execute.

Mr. President, there is another reason for the elimination of the corporation. What I have said up to this time has been directed against allowing minority stockholders in the corporation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in view of what the Senator has just said as indicating his belief that the shipping interests favor this bill rather than the one which he has presented——

Mr. CUMMINS. I would think so.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, what I was going to ask the Senator was this: Can the Senator point out a single shipping interest, great or small, that has indicated any prejudice in favor of this bill or any shipping interest that has even suggested that, as between these two measures, it would favor the so-called Fletcher substitute to that offered by the Senator himself?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no intimacy with these interests. All the information about them seems to come from a few Senators. I never heard anyone who is interested in shipping say a word about either measure. I have never received any communication, with regard to either measure, from anyone connected with shipping in any form. I am reasoning as a man of observation. I know—and the Senator from Ohio knows—what is good for the combination and what is bad for it. He knows that just as well as anyone else. He is a man of trained experience, and the very moment a proposal is made affecting industrial or transportation systems he knows whether it can be availed of by monopoly and by combinations or whether it is protected against both. It is not necessary for me to go into conference with the Shipping Trust in order to know which one of these measures will be best adapted to carry out its purpose.

But, sir, even if the bill were so amended as to require the Government to take all the stock, so that the corporation would become really a governmental arm or a function without the disturbance or interference of divers minority interests, I would still be opposed to the intervention of a corporation at all. There is no reason for it; it is full of danger, and it can not be as effective as though the Government were to operate directly, and I will show you why.

Mr. President, this bill has been argued upon the theory that we were creating a corporation with $10,000,000 of capital and giving it a credit of $30,000,000, and that all that was involved in the subject was $40,000,000, with the possibility that the capital stock might be increased so that the entire investment of the Government would be $20,000,000 as a part of the capital. I wonder if it has been observed that we are proposing to create a corporation without any limitation at all. Instead of being able to buy $30,000,000 worth of ships from the Government, as is proposed here, with an end of its purchasing capacity, this corporation, if it has credit enough, is authorized to buy $500,000,000 worth of ships. Will that be disputed? There is no limitation whatever. If its full power is exercised, it will have a capital of $20,000,000. The Government gives it a credit of $30,000,000; that is, it sells the corporation ships to the extent of $30,000,000 and takes its bonds for the purchase price. Then the corporation has a debt outstanding of $30,000,000 to the Government, and it has a capital of $20,000,000; but it can go into the market and buy or build—because its power to build is just as broad as its power to buy—it can go into the market and buy or build ships to an unlimited extent. It is confined only by its credit.

Does the Senator from Ohio or does the Senator from Florida think that it is wise to put into the field of business a corporation, of which the Government is the controlling or majority stockholder, without any limitation at all upon its right to use the governmental power? What would the Senator from Ohio say if it were proposed here to give to some person the right to involve the credit of the United States to an unlimited extent? Suppose it were suggested to give even the President of the United States the right to issue bonds to any amount he might think necessary for the good of the people of this country—an absurd and preposterous proposition; and yet that is just what you are doing in this bill. This corporation can buy all the ships in the world if the people who own the ships are willing to trust the corporation for the purchase price.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, does it not occur to the Senator that that is a pretty big "if"?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, Mr. President, that is just the difficulty with the Senator from Ohio. He seems to be indifferent with regard to the power that he gives to or bestows upon this board. It may be a good board, composed of honest men. I have no doubt about that; but when did the Senator from Ohio reverse his political doctrine? When did he become so violent a radical and so extreme a consolidationist as to be willing to place all the power that can be gathered into any government in the hands of one man or five men without any restriction whatsoever? It is a conversion on the part of the Senator from Ohio, and I am sorry to see it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not know that I have changed my political faith in the least, but I am not in the habit of "seeing things at night."

Mr. CUMMINS. "Seeing things?" I did not quite catch that. Undoubtedly it was some very wise and witty suggestion, but I did not quite catch it. I have no doubt that if this were a Republican administration, and if a Republican President were authorized to appoint the members of this board, and a Republican President had selected the two Cabinet members, the Senator from Ohio would see more force in the suggestion I have made than he now does. I do not ask him to escape from the bond of the caucus, of course. I understand the binding effect of that solemn obligation. I know very well that I am speaking to men whose intellects are bound just as securely and as permanently, so far as this measure is concerned, as would be their hands if manacles had been clasped upon their wrists. I understand that. There is no possibility of convincing anybody of anything here with regard to this bill. I am sorry for it.

That leads me to say all that I have to say with regard to the asserted obstruction upon this side of the Chamber. I have no sympathy with a so-called filibuster. I was opposed to it when our Democratic friends filibustered for three months against the confirmation of appointments during the last Congress. It was indefensible. I do not like it now. The only possible justification for an effort on the part of a minority, after a full and fair and free expression of opinion, and after argument is reasonably exhausted, lies in the belief that we have before us a measure that originated in an executive office, and not in the legislative or law-making branch of the Government; that it became possible because it was ratified by two-thirds of the Democratic Members of the Senate in caucus, who sealed the obligation which many of you feel toward the Chief Executive, and imposed his will and the caucus order upon a reluctant, dissatisfied minority of your organization.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire for a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator quite startles me, as a layman, when he asserts that this bill gives unlimited authority to the shipping board to purchase and build ships ad libitum. The Senator has given one reason why the filibuster has some justification. If what the Senator asserts with reference to the powers of this board be true—and I assume it to be true—unless the bill were changed in that respect, would not that be a pretty strong justification for using every means in our power to prevent its enactment into law?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would be a very strong provocation, Mr. President; but my training leads me to believe that where there can be fair and free discussion in a legislative body, when the discussion is ended the majority ought to rule, even though in ruling it overturns a vital principle of government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just one further question. Inasmuch as the debate which has been considered by our Democratic friends as being unnecessarily long has resulted in changing this bill four times, and we now have before us an entirely different bill from that which we had before us when we commenced, is there not some justification in that prolonged debate?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think where I possibly disagree with the Senator from New Hampshire is in this respect: A very large part of this discussion ought not to be characterized as a filibuster. It has not been a filibuster. I suppose some speeches have been made that were longer than they otherwise would have been or possibly ought to have been, but it is the action of the Executive and the action of the caucus, precluding fair discussion and enabling a minority of the Senate to control its legislation, that provokes, and always will provoke, just such delay as has been witnessed in the consideration of this bill. This country never will see the end of filibustering until its legislative bodies enter upon the consideration of any question free and untrammeled, until they enter upon the consideration of a measure at liberty at the close of the discussion to do what their judgment and their conscience direct them to do. The very moment a caucus is interposed, so that a minority of a body actuated or directed by the Executive head of the Government can determine legislation, you will always find rebellion. Men have always rebelled and revolted against that sort of procedure and they always will.

This bill should not have come into the Senate as a party measure. There is not a party principle involved in it. There is nothing here upon which any political party has ever declared save as parties have declared for the building up of a merchant marine in a certain method. But the subject is not partisan. It ought not to be partisan. It is a high assumption, a bold audacity, for the President of the United States to undertake to make it a partisan measure. If he—I do not know; I am only reiterating what I have heard here day after day and hour after hour—if he so far forgets his constitutional duty as to bring to bear an unauthorized influence upon the legislative power, the Senate and the House ought to be strong enough and independent enough not only to resist but to protest against it. If the bill had come in the proper way, first as representing the sentiment or view of a majority of the members of the Committee on Commerce, and then being open for debate, and all of us had felt that every argument made here for or against it, for amendment of it, for elision from and addition to it, would be duly weighed and considered, there would have been no delay; and I am sure that long ago there would have been a vote which would have registered the real judgment of a majority of the Members of this body. Until we are willing to proceed in that way, the spectacles that we have witnessed, the unhappy scenes of the last few days, will be repeated from time to time.

But I renew the statement which seemed to astonish the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and which I have not heard mentioned by any Senator so far, that we are organizing a corporation to enter into a certain business without any limitation whatever on its authority. Its operations will be limited only by the trust and credit the people are willing to repose in it; and, as I said a moment ago, it can build all the ships it wants to build, if it costs us $100,000,000 or $500,000,000, or buy all the ships it wants to buy, no matter how much might ultimately be invested in the enterprise.

I wonder if that is what was intended by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the acting chairman of the Committee on Commerce? I wonder if they intended to intrust the five men—two of them the mere hands of the President and part of his Cabinet and three others holding a more or less stable tenure of office—with power to pledge the credit of the United States to any extent whatsoever?

Mark you, in ordinary cases there might be some limitation in the mere fact that the capital of the corporation is only $10,000,000, or something like that. That might be some limitation ordinarily, but it would be no limitation with respect to this corporation, for there is no man in the world, there is no country in the world, that would not give to this corporation any credit that it desired to ask. With the Government as the owner of a majority of its stock, recognized all over the world as a governmental corporation, what the corporation does the Government does; and even though the work of the corporation entails no legal obligation upon the Government, we could not with honor refuse to discharge the obligations of the corporation, the officers of which and the trustees of which had been elected through the shipping board.

I wonder if it is the view of our Democratic friends that we ought to allow any such corporation to embark upon the troubled seas of commerce? I can not imagine it. Suppose Congress were asked to come down here once a year and say: "We will give to a certain number of men five or six or seven, a billion, dollars, and we ask them with that money to run the Government for the next year. We prescribe no rules; we impose no guide and no standard upon them. Here is the billion dollars; discharge the obligations of the Government; and if that is not enough, borrow all that you think the Government ought to have." That is an exaggeration, of course, but it illustrates the danger of the precedent that we are now establishing.

Why is any Senator willing to create an instrumentality of that kind with the power that I have suggested? It is not enough to say that in all probability it will not be done. That can be said about every law. If that is a sufficient answer, we need not be careful about the provisions of any law. If that is a sufficient answer, we should put no restriction upon any man who occupies a public office. We should say to every postmaster that he can charge a cent or 2 cents or 10 cents per letter if he wants to do it, or we might say it to the Postmaster General, if you go up higher in the scale of officers. That is not consistent with the principles of free government. It is not in harmony with the progressive thought of this age.

I want to remind some of my friends who are the very embodiments of progressivism in the United States, who have been distinguished in the movement which, I think, has carried civilization to a higher point than it ever before attained, that this measure, instead of being progressive, as I remarked the other day, is medieval in its character; it is arbitrary, tyrannical, irresponsible in its make-up. So far from carrying the Government forward to a larger field of operations in order to do justice everywhere, this is simply committing the helpless and the weak to the unguided and unlimited and undirected will of a few men.

Not long ago, when we were arguing the bill which created a trade commission, I was for that bill. If I had gone into a Republican caucus—if I had done as you people do—there would have been a majority in the Republican caucus against it; but there was no Republican caucus upon it. However, if the Republican Party had followed the practice of our friends the Democrats, I would not have been at liberty, I suppose, to have been for that measure. It was an administration measure, too. But when I find a thing good I am for it. I may not always be right in my judgment, but I am free in my actions.

When we were considering the trade-commission bill there were some very eloquent speeches made on the Democratic side. I remember one made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], I remember many made by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and possibly some others, in which the horror, the tyranny of the creation of a commission without any rule of law to guide it, direct it, or limit it were painted in most vivid colors. I am not sure but that my friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] was affected a little in the same way. We tried to give that commission a rule of law. It may have been a flexible one, although I thought it sufficiently certain. But what do the same Senators propose to do now? They propose to create a commission with powers of unlimited indebtedness, with powers of unlimited governmental operation, and there is not a suggestion in this bill from the beginning to the end with respect to the manner in which the powers which we devolve upon them shall be exercised—not one word. There is no student of this measure who can point out the least indication of the manner in which this corporation is to be managed. I challenge my Democratic friends to indicate a single guidepost from the beginning to the end where it is to begin and where it is to end, how much capital it shall use, how it shall use it, what rate shall be charged——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield——

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has several times made a statement that the power——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. I am going to ask a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then he may ask his question.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has several times made the statement that there is a power of unlimited indebtedness in the bill; that the power of incurring unlimited indebtedness was placed upon this corporation. I would like to know what provision there is in the bill upon which the Senator bases that statement?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio, I hope, is familiar with the bill?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think I am, and that is just the reason why I ask.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am going to assume that you are familiar with the bill. We create a corporation under the laws of the District of Columbia with a capital of $20,000,000 or about that; that is, that may be its capital——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Ten million dollars, with the power of increasing.

Mr. CUMMINS. So that the Government part of it shall not exceed $10,000,000 of the increase. That corporation is organized to buy, build, and operate ships. That corporation has all the power to incur indebtedness that an individual has, unless it is limited in the law which creates it. I now ask the Senator from Ohio to point out the limitation in the law.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in the first place, this corporation is to have an initial capital stock of not over $10,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. That has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will wait a moment, I will get to the point.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ought not to have asked the Senator from Ohio to do that, unless I understood——

Mr. POMERENE. Very well; I will do it in my own time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite willing to have the Senator ask the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will preserve the right of the Senator from Iowa to the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I shall be very glad if the Senator from Ohio will continue.

Mr. POMERENE. So that the initial capital stock is $10,000,000, in which the Government is compelled to own 51 per cent. In section 2 there is this provision:

> The shipping board, with the approval of the President, may consent to or may cause an increase of the capital stock from time to time as the interests of the corporation may require, but without authority of Congress the portion of such increase to be paid for by the United States shall not exceed $10,000,000, neither shall the proportion of stock held by the United States at any time be less than 51 per cent.

So it clearly appears that without the authority of Congress the capital stock can not be in excess of $20,000,000, and at least 51 per cent of this shall be held by the Government.

On page 3 there is this paragraph:

> The powers of said corporation shall be limited to the purposes of this act and to such as are necessarily incident thereto.

That is, incident to a corporation of $20,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no.

Mr. POMERENE. There is another paragraph which provides for the sale of certain vessels for bonds, and the shipping board is limited as to what shall be done with these bonds:

> SEC. 4. That the shipping board is authorized to transfer the vessels purchased or constructed as herein provided to such corporation, and such corporation shall issue to the United States in payment thereof its gold bonds, bearing interest at not less than 4 per cent per annum, and upon such further terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the shipping board, such bonds to constitute a first and paramount lien upon such vessels thus transferred and upon all the property of such corporation: Provided, That the amount of bonds received by the United States in payment for such vessels shall not be less, at the then par value, than the total amount expended by the United States in the purchase or construction of such vessels, and same may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion and with the approval of the President, to reimburse the Treasury for expenditures made in the purchase or construction of vessels.

So when these vessels are sold bonds are received, and when these bonds are sold the proceeds therefrom must go back into the Treasury, and you have, therefore, a limitation of $20,000,000 as the amount of stock which the Government may own.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if I did not have the very highest opinion of the legal learning of the Senator from Ohio I would say he was trying to becloud this question. But I know he is not. He has fallen into an error. The fact that the capital of the corporation is limited to $20,000,000, practically speaking, has nothing whatever to do with the objects of the corporation, the purposes of the corporation, which are to buy, build, and operate ships. Those are the objects of the corporation, and it does not make any difference how much the capital stock is. It is only a question whether people having ships or who desire to work on ships in construction are willing to trust the corporation.

Now, the United States has said we will trust this corporation to the extent of $30,000,000 by buying ships of that value and transferring them to the corporation and taking the note of the corporation for the purchase price; but the corporation can become indebted in any amount unless it be limited by the act which creates it. If the Senator from Ohio can find anything of that kind in the act under which the organization is made he will have been able to discover what I have not. I say that this corporation has the legal capacity of becoming indebted in any amount.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That anybody will credit it with.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course it would not have the money, but if anybody was willing to give it credit, then it could buy all the ships in the world if it wanted to do so.

Let us see whether anybody would credit it. If it were purely a private corporation, I would say there was not much danger of anybody extending a credit of millions and millions of dollars to it, but it is not or will not be in the popular esteem a private corporation. The Government is a stockholder. Officers of the Government will control and will operate the corporation. I repeat, there is not a man with a ship in the world or a country with a ship in all the earth that would not be willing to trust this corporation upon the faith of the fact that the United States is the majority stockholder in it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is not this, however, true: The Government or the shipping board is authorized to spend $30,000,000 in the purchase of vessels and turn those vessels over to this corporation. When the Government does so, it requires the corporation to execute a first-mortgage bond or bonds, secured by a first mortgage to the Government, to secure the entire amount which the Government is going to furnish. Does not this suggest to the entire public that the limit of the Government's interest is to be the capital stock which it pays in, and that outside of that the Government intends to treat this like any other corporation, and is not this shown to the public by the Government requiring bonds secured by a first mortgage for the $30,000,000?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not draw that inference. The Government when it sells the ships to the corporation takes the note of the corporation. That note is secured and made a lien upon the ships that are sold. But suppose the corporation proposes to buy German or English ships, it could give Germany or England a first lien just as it will give the Government of the United States a first lien upon the ships that it buys from our Government. No, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My only reason for asking the question is that I would not like, if the bill were passed, for the senatorial construction to attach that the Government was going to assume responsibility for any indebtedness the company made, because I would object myself most seriously to its spreading out and making additional purchases for which the Government was to be in any way responsible.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Georgia does object to that course, he ought to make his objection now in order to make it effectual. We are using this corporation as an instrument of the Government, and honor will require that we discharge any obligations which the corporation incurs. There is not an American anywhere who would not resent the repudiation of an obligation of the corporation. Let us restrict and limit it now or let us not employ it at all. It is only an instrument of danger. It is only a source of scandal. It never can accomplish any good, and we are abdicating what we ought to do and transferring the authority to five absolutely irresponsible men, because they are irresponsible, not for want of character, but they are irresponsible because we have not told them and do not propose to tell them what to do or how to do it.

Mr. President, I have in my mind to review the circumstances under which this bill was brought before us. There are a great many other things that we ought to be doing rather than spending our time upon this bill. Just think of it, last session there were three branches of the President's program. One was the Trade Commission bill. One was the Clayton bill. The other was the Rayburn bill, or the railroad securities bill. The House passed them all. They came here, were referred to the proper committees, and we passed two of them. The Committee on Interstate Commerce spent two months perfecting the bill to regulate railroad securities in order to see to it that in the future the markets of this country should not be crowded and overcrowded and flooded with baseless and worthless stocks and bonds issued by railroad companies.

We have just seen some evidence as to whether it is worth while to protect our people against such financial crimes. We have just had the railroad rates in this country advanced in order to make good in the markets of the country these over-issues of stocks and bonds. The President very wisely—and I intend before the consideration of this bill is over to call attention to it—the President very wisely brought that to the attention of Congress, and we presented a bill here. But suddenly, somewhat contemporaneously with the visit of certain great people to Washington, that bill, although reported by the Interstate Commerce Committee, and although a part of the President's program, was, as I have been informed, through his influence put into the discard, and there it lies now in the wastebasket of legislative activities. Why do we not do something with that bill? It contained a provision, too, which would have been of infinite advantage to the people of this country, who are now every day being deprived of their just rights when their property, especially the live stock of the farmers of the country, is injured or destroyed upon a railroad, by the limitations which the transportation companies have put upon the recovery of damages.

We can not get consideration for such things, but we can get consideration for a measure like this, which, in my judgment, is simply an invitation to the shipping combinations and trusts of the world to enter partnership with the United States in order that our interference may be as little inconvenient as possible.

Mr. President, I shall take occasion at some other time to comment upon some of the details of the substitute I have offered. I earnestly hope that it will be adopted, and I sincerely believe that it will be vastly more effective in bringing to the people of the country some relief from a situation which I deplore as much as my friends upon the other side can than the measure now before us.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that somebody ought to call attention to the fact that what has been going on in the Senate for the last few weeks illustrates, as I have said on occasions before, the necessity of this body adopting some rule by which in an orderly and fair way debate may automatically come to an end, so that we may automatically reach a time in the consideration of every bill when a majority in favor of a bill or resolution will have the right to see it passed by this body.

I have said before, and I repeat now, that I am not complaining or finding fault with any Senator for doing that which the rules give him the right to do, and one of these things is the right to filibuster.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] the other day outlined what, in his judgment, would be a sufficient reason for a filibuster. He satisfied his mind, and perhaps the minds of others, that in the instances he gave a filibuster would be justified. The trouble is, Mr. President, that the Senator from Mississippi sets up a standard for himself and says if a measure comes within its limits a filibuster is a patriotic and a good thing, but if it does not come within its limits, then a filibuster is unpatriotic and a very bad thing. Some other Senator will outline what to him is a sufficient reason for a Senator to engage in a filibuster, and the two outlines will vary and be as far apart as the rising and the setting sun. Thus it is that each man outlines for himself what he considers a sufficient justification for engaging in a filibuster, and that is proper under the rules of the Senate. The man who outlines for himself, and who is the judge of his own conduct as to when he will engage in a filibuster, must, if he be fair, concede to every other man the same privilege, even though the grounds that he may give may be vastly different.

It seems to me it leads us to the inevitable conclusion that whenever a Senator or a number of Senators, under the rules of the Senate, consider that a filibuster against a proposition is proper and are willing to assume the responsibility, then they have an honorable right to engage in it under the rules of the Senate, and, so far as I am able to see, can not be censured for it.

Why, Mr. President, these filibusters are increasing. Years ago they happened very seldom. They happen now at every session, and, in a small degree, they happen on nearly every important bill that passes this body. As a rule, we see an endurance test for a limited length of time when we come to a culmination of the consideration of almost every important bill that passes the Senate.

We boast of the fact that this is a body where unlimited debate takes place, and yet unlimited debate is one of the first instrumentalities of a filibuster. I would not desire to limit, except within reasonable bounds, the right of any Senator to participate in debate or to offer amendments and to discuss them. I have been criticized because I have advocated what is technically known as a cloture rule in the Senate, because it has been said that when I was a Member of the House of Representatives I opposed such a rule. The fact is that the House of Representatives represents one extreme in legislation, where a gag rule is sometimes invoked that prevents debate, amendments, consideration, and deliberation, while the Senate represents the other extreme, where the length of debate and consideration and deliberation is limited only by the number of men who can participate in it, engage in it, and keep it up.

It seems to me that it is a sad commentary on this body that we can not reach a conclusion on any bill of any particular importance as to which there is considerable disagreement without, before concluding it, we must have a test of physical strength. We must test the physical endurance of the Members to see how long they can stand punishment. Mr. President, to me that seems barbarous. It seems to me that is a relic of barbarism. Away back in ancient times when two men disputed they provided by rule a regulation for a wage of battle. The strong overcame the weak, might prevailed, and the right was often crushed to earth. That is what a physical endurance test means anywhere, at any place on earth. It does not mean that logic and reason will prevail in the decision of the question. It means brute force will prevail, right or wrong.

The time was, even in this country years ago, when juries retired to deliberate on their verdict; that the judges would lock them up, without permitting them to eat or drink, until they had agreed upon a verdict. Of course it would only be a matter of time until the weak would succumb; but was that any indication that justice prevailed in the case? Those things happily are all in the past with us now. The only place where they linger and remain is in what is supposed to be the greatest deliberative body in the world—the Senate of the United States.

Why, Mr. President, what has happened in this particular filibuster on this particular bill? Let me say before I take that up that neither side of this Chamber, in my humble judgment, has any right to criticize the other on the question of a filibuster. You will find just about as many filibusters conducted on the Democratic side as on the Republican side, the only difference being that they are increasing in number now, because those who oppose legislation know under the rules how effective that method is. On this particular bill that has been before the Senate for several weeks I believe that both sides of the Chamber have been guilty of filibustering. First by the Republicans, and then one day it dawned upon the Democratic side that they did not have a sufficient number of votes to pass the bill, and it was necessary for them to filibuster to prevent a vote until absent Democratic Senators could be sent for. A filibuster is simply dilatory tactics, whether by talking or by dilatory motions, to prevent a vote on the main question. We saw all last week Democratic Senators in this Chamber talking against time. They were afraid to let the bill come to a vote lest it should be defeated. Having myself been in favor of the bill, with the amendments then proposed and now pending, I sympathized with that filibuster. I should not have hesitated, had it been necessary, to help take up some of the time to hold the Senate in statu quo until the absentees could be brought here. First, you waited for a Senator to return from North Carolina, where he was on account of sickness.

When he came it was discovered that some one on this side had arrived who had not before been present. Then you needed the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and one from South Carolina, and you had to delay a vote until these absent Senators got here.

I mention this not in criticism; I think it was justifiable, but it was a filibuster, it was delaying the vote just the same, with the Members on this side then clamoring for a vote; and when enough Senators arrived so that side had a majority, this side again began filibustering.

Mr. President, if to-night two, or perhaps three, Democratic Senators should have their near relatives taken suddenly ill or stricken by the hand of death, making it necessary for those Senators to absent themselves from the Senate, in the twinkling of an eye the filibuster would shift from this side of the Chamber to the other. Then opponents of the bill would be demanding a vote, and Democrats would again filibuster until absent Senators could return.

I mention these things, Mr. President, first, to show that, so long as the rules permit a filibuster, any Senator who wants to take the responsibility has an honest right to engage in it; and, second—and what I believe is more important than this legislation and more important than any other legislation that we can pass—the rules of this body should be so amended that this kind of business can not continue indefinitely. We ought to make it impossible for either party or anybody to delay legislation by filibustering.

Mr. President, we say we have no cloture; but a filibuster is a cloture; it is the most unreasonable cloture, the most illogical cloture, the most unfair cloture, the most inhuman cloture that any legislative body can possibly adopt. I have given notice that I would introduce a proposition to amend the rules; and, as a matter of fact, this very filibuster, this continuous session of the Senate without any morning hour, has so far made it impossible for me, under the rules of the Senate, to formally offer the amendment to the rules of which I gave notice. I desire to read my proposed amendment to the rules now. It is a proposition to add a new rule, and it is as follows:

It shall be in order during the morning hour to make a motion that any bill or resolution then on the calendar shall be considered under the terms of this rule. Such motion, when made, shall lie over one day and shall then be decided without debate. When it has been decided to consider a bill or resolution under this rule, the same shall first be considered in general debate, during which time no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall be allowed to speak more than 3 hours. At the close of general debate the bill or resolution shall be read for amendments, and on any amendment that may be offered no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall speak for more than 15 minutes: Provided, That any Senator who has not spoken for 3 hours in general debate shall, in addition to said 15 minutes, be allowed additional time, but in no case shall such additional time or times, including the time used by such Senator in general debate, exceed in the aggregate 3 hours. When the bill is being read for amendment all debate shall be confined to the amendment which is then pending.

Mr. President, that proposition is tentative. To my mind 3 hours is a longer time than we ought to have for debate; but if it is not long enough, make it longer. If 15 minutes is not time enough to debate each amendment, make it more; but why not adopt some rule that shall apply to all bills, that automatically will in the end bring the Senate to a vote on the main proposition so that the majority shall have the right to enact their will into law? I believe this rule would do the business. It would bring us automatically to a time when the end of debate would bring a final vote. It would end not by brute force prevailing, but action coming from the application of the aggregated logic and wisdom of the entire Senate.

Mr. President, did it ever occur to you that these filibusters, these tests of physical strength, that run along one night after another are really ludicrous? They would be really foolish if it were not for the fact that their consequences are sometimes serious and that they are engaged in by serious men.

I was brought up here the other night by the Sergeant at Arms a little after 12 o'clock—perhaps about 1 o'clock. I found a Senator speaking, four or five Republican Senators sitting around on this side of the Chamber, most of them dozing in their chairs, and just a solitary, lone Democrat on the other side. That was the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE]. What a foolish spectacle for the United States Senate. If it occurred anywhere else, the participants would have been taken before a board of insanity commissioners, but since it happened in the Senate, it is supposed to be an exhibition of statesmanship. And yet the Senate was in session; the RECORD showed, if you would examine it, that a quorum of the Senate was present; and we were going through the necessary rules and regulations to bring about a cloture of this body, no one listening, no one caring what was said, either by those who were present or by those talking, except to kill the time—and, incidentally, kill the Members as well. It does not seem to me that in this civilized age the Senate of the United States ought to engage in that kind of a farce.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say a word further about this particular filibuster; and I do not see why we should not call it a filibuster. I have no part in it. I have no sympathy with it. I regret exceedingly that it is now proceeding. We must all recognize, however, that our ancient and much revered rules permit it.

What is the condition? We have been in session more than two days and two nights continuously. We have been in session lacking 15 minutes of 56 hours without any let-up. Will any man contend that human beings in continuous session that long are capable men, and are able to do the best that their ordinary energies and abilities would enable them to do for the country? Can we, at such a time as this, expect good legislation? Can men engaged continuously in one session for that length of time still retain all their mental faculties?

Why, Mr. President, I do not know what day of the month it is; I do not know what day of the week it is; but I know it is in the month of February, and that it is not very long until the 4th of March. I know and you know, Mr. President; every Senator here knows, and God knows, that when about one-half of the Senate of the United States are engaged in a filibuster under its present rules, and the time is as short as it is until the 4th of March, they will be able to conduct that filibuster up to the 4th of March.

I do not believe there is anybody here who doubts their ability to do that. Why not admit it? If that be true, then this bill must fail unless it is passed in an extra session. Mr. President, I am in favor of this bill, and with the proposed amendments now pending I would vote for it now if I could, or at any other time at which I could get permission. I should like to see it amended in some other particulars. When it gets back, if it ever does, and an opportunity ever presents itself, I am going to vote for some of those amendments; but the success of those amendments is not necessary for me to vote for the bill. I have long favored something of this kind. I am in favor of it, not as an emergency measure, but as a permanent policy of the Government of the United States. But, Mr. President, if the rules of the Senate do not and will not permit us to pass it until the 4th of March, I can not for the life of me see anything to be gained by wasting all the time between now and the 4th of March, and subjecting ourselves to the inconveniences that must necessarily follow from continuous sessions and from a continual filibuster.

I understand upon reliable authority that it is already announced from the White House, through one of the leading Democrats in Congress, that if this bill does not pass there will be a special session of Congress called immediately, or at least soon after the 4th of March. I think we have a right to assume that that is true. If we should continue this filibuster until the 4th of March, there would have to be an extra session, anyway, to pass the great supply bills to keep the Government going during the next fiscal year. I doubt very much whether even now we have sufficient time to pass these supply bills before that time; but if we go on and the filibuster continues we will reach the 4th of March with absolutely nothing done, and then will have to take up this bill at a special session, just the same as though we passed some other important legislation and let this go to a special session—to the same special session.

So, in my judgment, there is nothing to be gained and much to be lost. There is some extremely important legislation on the calendar of the Senate, some of which has passed the House of Representatives, and only awaits the action of the Senate to make it law. There has been ordered out from the Committee on Privileges and Elections a resolution to investigate the expenditure of money in senatorial primaries and campaigns during the last election and the last primaries. That report has not yet been made to the Senate, for the simple reason that this filibuster makes it impossible for the chairman of the committee to make a report, because with this filibuster going on there can be no morning hour. In my judgment that resolution is even more important than this legislation, which I regard as important, and would bring more benefit to the country by bringing out the true facts, whatever they may be, in regard to the enormous expenditure of money made in attempts to get seats in this body.

Mr. President, on the calendar is a convict-labor bill. It has passed the House. It has been reported favorably from the committee here and is on the calendar. If it is not passed by the 4th of March, it is then dead. You will have to commence from the beginning to get it.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] mentioned another bill—the bill that regulates the issuing of securities, stocks, and bonds by interstate railroads. That bill, a promise first made in the Democratic national platform, passed by the House of Representatives in an attempt to carry out that platform, recommended by the President of the United States in the same way, taken up for consideration by the Interstate Commerce Committee and considered by the committee for months, and reported to the Senate at the last session of Congress, must die. I suppose it would die anyway, because it is generally understood that the administration has changed and does not believe in the redemption of that part of its platform, and that it is not in favor of that bill. It is in the wastebasket. In my humble judgment it was more important than any other part of the President's program. When we look at the New Haven, the Rock Island, and the Frisco systems of railroad and see what has happened in the way of loot and robbery it seems to me that we ought to take some action here to prevent a repetition of that kind of thing. One of the objects of that bill is to prevent such things.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska to tell us what authority he has for that statement.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator doubt it?

Mr. REED. I do not ask in a critical way, Mr. President. I simply ask for information.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the reason this bill stops all at once? Why is it? Why, after this bill has been reported by the Senate, has not anything further been done? The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] said—and I think I have the same authority, although I did not get it quite as directly—that the instruction came from the President himself that nothing more should be done with that bill; and if it did not, why, when the President is able to carry anything else, has he laid down on the railroad securities bill?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator has replied by asking a question. The fact that a bill has not been considered in the Senate is no evidence whatever that the administration has sought to kill it or that the Democratic Party evades it. We have one great bill here before the Congress. It is in every sense of the word an emergency bill——

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. And that bill—I am only going to interrupt the Senator for a moment further——

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. REED. That bill we have been pushing, and we have had some very good aid in that respect from the Senator who has the floor, and with that out of the way much undoubtedly could be accomplished.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Missouri does not believe that if we keep that bill before the Senate we are going to get it out of the way before the 4th of March, does he?

Mr. REED. I do not think it is possibly practical to do it now; but I think if this bill had not been obstructed, and the obstruction aided by the conspirators, there would have been a different situation.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; I am referring to this bill. I mean the one before the Senate now. I do not believe anybody here will say that the President of the United States wants the railroad-securities bill passed at this session of Congress. If he had, we would have had it up long ago.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHILTON. Does not the Senator recall that the Clayton bill has a section in it which meets all of the difficulties of which he has spoken in regard to the Frisco, the New Haven, and other roads, and makes the transaction of which he complains one involving a penal offense by confinement in the penitentiary? Probably that is one of the reasons why there is no need to pass the other bill.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, of course, has his own opinion, and has a right to it. I do not believe the Clayton antitrust bill does anything of the kind. To my mind, it does not do anything. It is a makeshift, a delusion, a snare, and a fraud. I think it is only a shield for big business, while it lets the punishment go on for the little man; and I can get lots of authority over on that side for that statement, too. But we differ on that. There is no question on earth but that the command came from the White House to stop the railroad-securities bill and not go any further with it. And yet it was a platform pledge. The bill now before the Senate was not.

Mr. President, I am not belittling this bill. I am just as earnestly in favor of legislation of this kind as any Senator on the other side, although perhaps for different reasons. I want to see something of this kind enacted; and when the special session comes, as it will, we can take up this bill and we can pass it.

I want to suggest to my Democratic friends that the first thing on the program ought to be some rule like I have proposed here or some similar rule by which we could regulate all bills that come before the Senate. I know that the rule which I have introduced probably can not become a law. It will have to have a Democratic name attached to it. But there will not be any trouble of that sort. It does not make any difference to me where it originates; if I believe it is good, I am going to support it. We can enact this very bill just as quickly if we go on and pass some of these other measures as though we waste the time from now to the 4th of March in a useless and senseless filibuster, where we are absolutely helpless.

That is my position. It does not seem to me that it is a part of wisdom for us to waste this time when these bills I have mentioned will be dead on the 4th of March. I have only mentioned a few that are on this calendar. There is a large number of others that I will not take up the time of the Senate to mention now. We are face to face with a condition brought on here by these rules of the Senate, with the 4th of March just ahead of us, where we are unable to enact legislation, especially where there is practically one-half of the Senate opposed to it and a large part of that number engaged in a filibuster to prevent a vote. We are up against an impossibility. We ought to do the best we can. We ought to take up some of these bills that are going to die and pass them before the 4th of March, and then at the special session pass this bill, together with any appropriation bills that we are unable to pass before March 4, and we will get this bill through just as quickly and we will save the other things that I have mentioned and several others that I have not mentioned, besides saving ourselves.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. President, we might as well face the reality that every man must know exists. It seems to me the easiest thing in the world is to conduct a filibuster, with the large number of men engaged in it who are engaged in this, from now to the 4th of March. There may be some dead Senators along the way, but we might overlook that. However, we ought not to overlook the fact that when the 4th of March comes we will have nothing done, and the other way we will accomplish something. But when the extra session comes I am going to do all I can to get this bill enacted into law, and I will be glad to assist in every way I can. I only want to suggest—this is only my judgment, and I may be wrong—that when the extra session comes and you take up this bill again you ought to bring it before the Senate without any coercion, without any restraint, and without any caucus rule behind it. There are a good many men over here in favor of a great many, at least, of the principles enunciated in this bill. There are men—and it is perfectly natural that it should be so—who, when you make a bill partisan and in a secret caucus say "We will vote down every amendment that a Republican may offer"—it is natural, I say, that men should resent that kind of conduct and come into the Senate with an unfriendly feeling; men who ought to be with you; men who believe in many of the same things that you do, driven away by caucus action.

I have tried in this case, Senators, not to let such a thing influence me. If it has, I have been unconscious of it. But I want to say that it has been humiliating to know that when I honestly and conscientiously favored some amendment and wanted to bring about the enactment of the fundamental principles that are in this bill, I had always to be told, "The caucus will have to pass on it first." Members of this body—not one, but many—said, "I believe you are right on that proposition." Many of them said "I think both the amendments you have suggested are right, but the caucus must pass on them first."

Why not let this bill come out like the Trade Commission bill? You have boasted of that bill all over the United States. It came out without a caucus rule. You got a good many votes on this side of the Chamber, and no man will honestly deny but that you got valuable assistance on this side of the Chamber, particularly from the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who was an expert on the subject, and who, without casting any reflection upon any other Senator, knew at least as much about the subject as any other Member of this body. If you had made a caucus measure of it you would have driven him to the other side; that is inevitable.

Now, Mr. President, I have said all I care to say. I am in earnest about it. I would be willing to come here night after night and keep this session up indefinitely if I knew that we could pass this bill by the 4th of March. But I do not believe there is a ghost of a show on earth to do it. There will not be such filibustering in the extra session, because the session will be unlimited. This filibuster is kept alive because they know that just a few days ahead of us is the time when the session must end.

Mr. NEWLANDS and Mr. O'GORMAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator first, and then I will yield to the Senator from Nevada if he desires.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understood that the Senator had yielded the floor. I wish to take the floor at the close of his remarks.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. KERN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. RANSDELL's name was called). I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is necessarily absent, and that he is paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). On this vote and for the day I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]. I withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 48, nays 46, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to, and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m., Wednesday, February 10, 1915) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 11, 1915, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 8, 1915.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee, O God our Father, for all the great reforms which have come and which are coming under the influences of the higher civilization of our day which tends to bind the hearts of men into a common brotherhood. Especially do we thank Thee as American citizens for the gracious privilege vouchsafed to us by the Constitution of our Union, which removes all barriers, takes away all restrictions, and permits us to worship Thee according to the dictates of conscience. Thus by the light of an open Bible, and united under one flag, help us to move forward to yet greater attainments under the leadership of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, February 6, and Sunday, February 7, 1915, was read and approved.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, there is a portion of the Private Calendar which has never been called by unanimous consent. I would like to submit a request that on next Wednesday, at half past 5, the House stand in recess until 8 o'clock; that at 8 o'clock the House resume its session, to continue not later than 11.30; and that bills on the Private Calendar only be considered, beginning at the point where the call was concluded at the last meeting. I will also ask as a part of the request that bills be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that on next Wednesday the House at 5.30 o'clock take a recess until 8 o'clock; that the session shall not extend beyond 11.30 o'clock, for the consideration of all bills on the Private Calendar which are not objected to, beginning where the call left off at the last session; that no other business shall be transacted; and that the bills be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21318, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I hope that motion will not prevail. This is District day, and we have some important bills that ought to be passed. There is an abundance of time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes a privileged motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make a point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 168, nays 106, not voting 149, as follows:

[Roll No. 58.]
